v. Aim, &c.

JAMES BARRIE AIM, Seventh Party.—Dickson.

Succession—Testamentary writing—Deed purporting to convey or bequeath land—Titles to Land Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict.), c. 101, sec. 20.—There was found in the repositories of a deceased an informal holograph document in these terms:—"All furniture, books, and personal effects to A absolutely, and the free liferent use of all my other means and estate. After A's decease, the whole of the estate to turned into cash at the time my trustees deem most suitable for best realising, and proceeds safely invested for disbursing as under." There then followed certain pecuniary legacies and a bequest of residue, and a nomination of trustees "for carrying out the foregoing." Held that this document being conceived in terms applicable to the deceased's whole estate, heritable as well as moveable, and being a clear expression of his last will, and therefore sufficient to confer on the trustees named "a right to claim and receive" his moveable estate, was also by virtue of the 20th section of the Titles to Land Act, 1868, equivalent to a general disposition in their favour of his heritable estate.

2D DIVISION.

I.

JOHN AIM died on 24th February 1880 at Bournemouth in England. After his death there was found in his repositories the following document written upon two sides of half a sheet of note-paper, and addressed to his mother, "Mrs John Aim":—"All furniture, books, and personal effects to Mrs Jno. Aim, absolutely, and the free liferent use of all my other means and estate. After Mrs A's decease, the whole of the estate to turned into cash at the time my trustees deem most suitable for best realising, and proceeds* safely invested for disbursing as under, viz., to John Aim, son of W. L. Aim, Pollokshields, on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, £300. In event of his predeceasing, the same to be equally divided between his two sisters, Catherine and Mary Jane, or the survivor of them (on their attaining their majority)." After two similar bequests, and a bequest of residue, the writing continued—"Trustees for carrying out the foregoing, I wish to name my two brothers and brother-in-law, and Mr Richard Lennie. JOHN AIM, 8 March 1877."

The deceased left a cottage at Kilbride, Dunoon, worth about £500, containing furniture and other personal effects to the value of £35. He also left moveable property consisting of shares in the Dunoon Gas Light Company, and of money in bank to the value of about £1700.

Peter Hastie, the deceased's brother-in-law, was the sole accepting and acting trustee.

James Barrie Aim, his immediate younger brother, was his heir-at-law.

The estate having become divisible by the death of Mrs John Aim, the testator's mother, a special case was presented to the Court for the various parties interested under the will on the following questions in law:—"1. Whether the document referred to is a valid testamentary settlement and conveyance of deceased's heritable and moveable estates in favour of the parties therein named as trustees, and whether the succession of the deceased is regulated thereby; or whether the deceased must be held to have died intestate as regards his heritable and moveable estate, or either of them? 2. Whether the party of the first part, as sole acting trustee foresaid, is entitled to complete titles for effectually vesting him in the right and estate of the deceased; and whether the said James Barrie Aim, as heir-at-law of the said deceased is bound to make up a title to the heritable estate and convey it to the trustee acting under the said will? 3. To what portion of the moveable estate, in the event of the will being sustained, did the testator's mother, Mrs Aim, succeed under the clause, 'All furniture, books, and personal effects to Mrs John Aim, absolutely'?"

Aim's Trustees
v. Aim, &c.

Argued for the trustee, and for the beneficiaries under the will;—1. The document in question was a valid testament, informal no doubt, but distinctly expressing the last will of the deceased. It was, therefore, sufficient to confer upon the trustee a right to claim and receive the moveable estate of the grantor. Prior to 1868, admittedly, it would not have in any way affected heritable estate, but the 20th section* of the Titles to Land Act of that year rendered it effectual to confer the same right to claim and receive heritage which formerly it would have conferred to claim and receive moveables only, provided its words of bequest or expression of will bore reference to heritage. Now, here the testator gave his mother the life interest use of "all my other means and estate," that is, other than his furniture and personal effects, and after her death he directed "the whole of the estate to be turned into cash." These expressions were wide enough to shew that he was dealing with his whole estate, and did not mean to except therefrom the cottage in which he had lived, which was his only heritable property. The 20th section of the Act of 1868 therefore made this document sufficient to carry this heritage to the trustee to the same effect as the moveable property. 2. Under the 20th section of the Act of 1868 the trustee might either make up his title by notarial instrument, using the will as a general disposition, or he might call upon the heir-at-law to make up a title and grant a conveyance in his favour. The former course was facilitated by the 46th section of the Act of 1874. 3. Mrs John Aim was only entitled

v. Aim, &c.

Argued for the heir-at-law, and for the next of kin, both of the testator, and of his mother, Mrs John Aim ;—1. The document in question was a mere jotting of particulars, evidently intended as instructions for an agent, and could not reasonably be regarded as the deliberate and completed expression of the testator's last will.¹ 2. But even if it was a proper testament it only carried moveables. It did not meet the requirements of the 20th section of the Act of 1868. That section validated deeds purporting to be settlements of lands, but not expressed in the terms required by the then existing law or practice for the conveyance of lands; but it applied solely to deeds the bequeathing words of which bore reference to lands. But here there were no words having reference to lands at all. There was nothing either express or implied to shew that the testator was making any attempt, however informal, to convey his heritable property. To such a case the enactment was not intended to apply.² 3. Mrs John Aim, the testator's mother, was entitled under the term "personal effects" to the whole personal or moveable property of the deceased.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I see no reason for entertaining doubt here. This document was found in the repositories of the deceased enclosed in an envelope addressed to Mrs Aim. It is a carefully written and distinct document. Whether it was intended or not as a memorandum of instructions to a law-agent for the preparation of a formal settlement is of no moment.

The first question we are asked to decide is, whether it carries heritage under the 20th section of the Act of 1868? Now, some questions may arise no doubt under that enactment, but I am of opinion that the construction of the section is clear enough. It provides (1) in reference to heritage that it may be conveyed by mortis causa deeds or writings. (2) It provides that the word "dispone," which was formerly essential, shall be so no more. (3) It provides that heritage may be conveyed by testament provided words are used in regard to the heritage which if used in regard to moveables would have been sufficient to carry them. And then (4) that such testamentary deed or writing shall be equivalent to a general disposition under the 19th section of the Act, and shall create an obligation on the heir-at-law to make up a title and convey to the granter accordingly, or the granter may make up his title as on a general disposition. That, I take it, is the meaning of the clause.

But then it is objected that in the present case heritage is neither conveyed, nor bequeathed, nor even referred to, there being merely a direction that the whole of the truster's estate is to be turned into cash and the proceeds safely invested for disbursing in manner directed. This, however, I cannot think to be a sound objection, and I am of opinion that this document will effectually carry heritage under the 20th section of the Act of 1868; and looking to its whole language I am of opinion that it is perfectly clear the deceased meant to convey his heritage, and under the above section of the Act competently did so.

The cases which have been quoted to us are not on all-fours with the present. The case of Lowson v. Ford, 4 Macph. 631, was a very remarkable one, but far narrower than this. There was no testament nor words of bequest, but simply a list of names with sums of money appended. It was certainly signed, but the Court refused to give effect to so bare an expression of the intention of the person who framed it.

I think, then, it is clear (1) that the first question must be answered in the affirmative. The conveyance is a good one, because words have been used in it with regard to heritage sufficient in regard to moveables to carry them. (2) It follows that the heir-at-law is under obligation to make up a title under the 20th section of the Act of 1868, and besides section 46 of the Act of 1874 also applies, and will enable the trustee to make up a title notwithstanding that there is no direct conveyance to him. (3) This question is chiefly a matter for common sense. The collocation of words, however, seems clearly to infer that Mrs Aim was to get the personal effects as contained in the inventory only.

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I have no doubt whatever about the case. It is true, I think, that the document before us is a proper will and no more. That which is commonly called a testament is not a conveyance of either heritable or moveable estate. It contains no words of conveyance. It has operation given to it, but that is in deference to the will of the deceased proprietor therein expressed. A will may contain a conveyance, and often does ; but it is not necessary that it should do so. I speak of it without reference now to the changes in the law made by the 20th section of the Act of 1868. Before it was passed the proper purpose of a will or testament was to express the will and intention of the deceased with respect to the disposal of his personal estate, and the written instrument under his hand doing so was given effect to as the last will or rather as the emphatic expression which disclosed the will in his mind at the last moments of his rational existence. If he himself named a person to carry his express wishes into effect, the law, by confirming him executor, armed that person with a title to the deceased's moveable property, and his duty was to execute the will of the deceased proprietor with respect to it ; and even where he named no executor, but simply stated what his will was, the law appointed an executor to carry out that will, and confirmed him, and vested him with a title to the property, his duty being to do with respect to it according to the mere wish of the testator.

That was the law of the land with respect to last wills and testaments before the Act of 1868. The only exceptional case was where the will contained an express conveyance of some specific subject. It then operated as a conveyance, and the party in whose favour it was made took independently of the executor altogether. This distinction will be found explained by the text writers and illustrated by decisions. But now, since 1868, according to my own view of clause 20 of the Act of that year, heritage is placed in the same position as moveables, not with respect to the conveyance, but with respect to the settlement of succession thereto. Formerly a proprietor, if he wished to settle his heritage, could not do so by simply declaring his will ; the only mode of effecting his purpose was by making a de præsenti conveyance, and I think it has been expressly held that a conveyance in words to operate as a conveyance on death or six months after death was bad, because it was not a conveyance de præsenti. A conveyance de præsenti, though not published, was requisite. But under the Act of 1868 wills were made applicable to heritage just as to moveables, and the words used in the Act are material, for not only may you now convey heritage in the same manner as moveables, but you may affect heritage by the use of any words which, without directly conveying, will give right to moveables. Now, what words would confer on executors a right to claim and receive moveables? Why, any words expressing distinctly the deceased owner's will. Suppose he said, "I wish £1000 to be divided amongst my three children," would the words be enough to confer on them a right to claim their share of the £1000? There can be only one answer. Well, the same words which would confer a right to moveables are under the Act of 1868 to confer a right to heritage if used with reference to heritage. Well, then, I use them with reference to heritage. "I wish my lands of A to be divided amongst my three children." I apprehend the effect of that is as clear as anything can be. Let me give another illustration. A list of legatees or persons intended to take the moveable estate of the deceased is quite good. If a proprietor say that he wishes his estate to be divided so that A shall get £500, B a house, C a bit of land, and so on; in short, if he places opposite the names of some sums of money, and of others houses or land, shall we say that the words which are sufficient to entitle the legatees to claim and receive the moveables are not sufficient to entitle them to claim and receive the houses or lands? To do so would be to contradict the language of the 20th section of the Act of 1868. Therefore, regarding this document as a will, as distinguished from a conveyance, and being of opinion that it was intended to settle the testator's heritable as well as his moveable estate, I am compelled to give it the same effect with reference to heritage as with reference to moveables. Parties being named for carrying that will into effect, they are bound to give it effect according to the testator's intention with reference to heritage as well as to moveables.

A question is put to us about the mode of making up a title, as the will does not contain a conveyance. No doubt to satisfy our system of titles to land a registrable conveyance is necessary. But that is hardly a matter on which to consult the Court. If we decide that the will is to have effect with respect to heritage the parties can have no difficulty in making up titles. The same thing came up the other day in the case of Studd, supra, p. 249.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find (1) that the document referred to in this question is a valid testamentary settlement and conveyance of the deceased John Aim's heritable and moveable estate in favour of the parties therein named as trustees, and that the succession of the deceased is regulated thereby; (2) find it unnecessary to answer the second question; and (3) find that the portion of the moveable estate of the testator to which Mrs Aim, his mother, succeeded absolutely under his will, comprised all furniture, books, and personal effects in the testator's house at his death, and no other personal estate."

Superior and Vassal—Relief—Claim of relief for composition by purchaser against seller—Conveyancing Act, 1874 (Stat. 37 and 38 Vict.) cap. 94, sec. 4—Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868 (Stat. 31 and 32 Vict.) cap. 101, sec. 8.—A proprietor of lands entered with the superior in virtue of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and liable to the superior for a casualty of composition, sold the subjects, and executed a disposition binding himself to relieve the purchaser of all casualties payable to the superior prior to the date of entry. The purchaser took infektment on the disposition, and the superior obtained decree against him for payment of the composition.

In an action brought by the purchaser against the seller for relief, held by the Second Division and four consulted Judges, rev. judgment of Lord Curriehill, (1) that at the date of the sale the seller was bound to clear the subjects of liability for the casualty then exigible; and (2) that the purchaser, by accepting the disposition and recording the same, had not barred himself from enforcing the obligation of relief.

Question, whether, apart from the obligation in the disposition, the seller would have been bound to relieve the purchaser.

Relief—Expenses.—A superior obtained decree for payment of composition due by a vassal against the latter's singular successor, who, after notice, had defended the action. The singular successor, having been found entitled to relief from the vassal of the casualty, was held to be entitled also to the expense of his unsuccessful defence.

The following narrative of the circumstances under which this action of relief was raised is taken from the Lord Ordinary's note:—

"The late Peter Brash, merchant in Leith, died on 8th November 1872, duly infekt and entered with the superior in the Straiton estate, described in the summons. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 6th February 1869, with relative codicil, dated 2d November 1872, by which he conveyed his heritable property, and, inter alia, the Straiton estate, to trustees, of whom the defender, William Walker Stephens, was the only acceptor. He made up his title to the said estate by notarial instrument, recorded in the Register of Sasines 9th July 1873, but his title was never confirmed by the superior, and the lands which had fallen into non-entry continued in that condition until the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, came into operation on 1st October of that year. By that statute the defender, in virtue of his infektment, became the duly entered vassal of the superior. Thereafter, by disposition dated 10th November 1876, he sold the lands to the pursuers, who expedite infektment therein by recording the disposition on the 15th of that month, and by the operation of the statute became the duly entered vassals of the superior.*

* The portions of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, referred to in the case, were thus summarised and quoted by the Lord Ordinary:—

"The present question depends upon the construction of section 4 of the statute, and its sub-sections. Sub-section (1) declares the granting of writs by progress to be unnecessary for the completion of the title to land, and to be incompetent, and has thus rendered it no longer necessary for the heir or singular successor of a vassal to resort to the superior for an entry or renewal of the investiture as a necessary step in the completion of the title.

v. Stephens.

"On 8th May 1877 William Henry Revell Bedell Sivright, the superior, raised a summons against the pursuers in the form prescribed by the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, concluding that it should be found and declared that, in consequence of the death of the said Peter Brash, the vassal last vest and seized in the subjects, a casualty, being a year's rent of the lands, became due to the superior on 15th November 1876, being the date of the infestment of the pursuers, and concluding for payment of £1930, 19s. 2d. as the value thereof. After sundry procedure the Second Division pronounced an interlocutor on 8th July 1879¹ fixing the amount of the casualty at £824, 6s. 1d., with interest thereon at the rate of five per cent from the date thereof till payment. The pursuers paid the amount to the superior, with the expenses of process, and they have raised the present action against the defender to recover from him the amount so paid by them, and the expenses incurred by them to their own agents in defending the superior's action.

"The grounds of this claim of relief are thus stated in condescendence 7:—The defender was at the period when the Conveyancing Act, 1874, came into operation liable in payment of a casualty or composition, being a year's rent of the subjects in question. This was a burden affecting the lands shall be deemed and held to be, as at the date of the registration of his infestment in the Register of Sasines, duly entered with his immediate lawful superior, to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the previously existing law, and that whether the superior's own title had been completed or not.

"But as the granting and delivery of a writ of confirmation in the absence of any reservation of the claim for composition operated under the old law as a discharge of the composition, whether the same was paid at the time or not, subsection 3 provides that 'such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of feu-duties which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of such entry; and all rights and remedies competent to a superior under the existing law and practice, or under the conditions of any feu-right, for recovering, securing, and making effectual such casualties, feu-duties, and arrears, . . . shall continue to be available to such superior in time coming; but provided always that such implied entry shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could, by the law prior to this Act or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering.' The term 'casualty,' I may mention, is declared by the interpretation clause of the Act to include the composition payable by a singular successor.

"Sub-section 4 is as follows:—'No lands shall, after the commencement of this Act, be deemed to be in non-entry, but a superior who would, but for this Act, be entitled to sue an action of declarator of non-entry against the successor of the vassal in the lands, whether by succession, bequest, gift, or conveyance, may raise in the Court of Session against such successor, whether he shall be infest or not, an action of declarator and for payment of any casualty exigible at the date of such action, and no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against such action; and any decree for payment in such action shall have the effect of, and operate as, a decree of declarator of non-entry according to the now existing law, but shall cease to have such effect upon the payment of such casualty, and of the expenses (if any) contained in such decree; but such payment shall not prejudice the right or title of the superior to the rents due for the period while he is in possession of the lands under such decree, nor to any feu-duties or arrears thereof which may be due or exigible at or prior to the date of such payment, or the rights and remedies competent to him under the existing law and practice for recovering and securing the same, and the summons in such action may be in, or as nearly as may be in, the form of schedule B hereto annexed.'

estate in the defender's hands, and for which decree might have been obtained against him by the superior. It was an implied condition of the contract of sale between the pursuers and defender that the pursuers should, upon payment of the agreed-on price, which was a full price, acquire the subjects free of all incumbrances; and this implied condition was, so far as regards casualties, made matter of express stipulation in the disposition of the subjects to the pursuers.' The express stipulation here referred to is the short clause usually inserted in all onerous conveyances of land, and is as follows:—'I bind myself, as trustee foresaid, and the trust-estate under my charge, to free and relieve the said disponees and their foresaids of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens.' By the 'Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1868,' section 8, it is declared that a clause so expressed 'shall, unless specially qualified, import an obligation to relieve of all feu-duties or other duties, or services or casualties, payable or prestable to the superior, and of all public, parochial, and local burdens due from or on account of the lands conveyed prior to the date of entry.'"

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defender having sold the estate of Straiton to the pursuers for a full price, and as an unencumbered subject, is bound to relieve them of the casualty which ought to have been paid by the defender on his entry to the lands. (2) In respect of the obligation of relief in the disposition by the defender to the pursuers, the defender is bound to relieve the pursuers, as concluded for. (3) The pursuers, having incurred expenses in consequence of the defender having refused to relieve them when the claim was made, are entitled to recover the amount thereof, and, separatim, are entitled to the expenses beneficially incurred on the defender's behalf in reducing the amount of the said casualty.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The casualty sued for not having been due and payable at the date of the pursuers' entry, and not being a burden of which the pursuers are entitled to be relieved by the defender under their disposition, the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses. (4) On a sound construction of the disposition, and of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, the defender is not, in the circumstances, bound to relieve the pursuers of the sums sued for, or any part thereof.

On 19th July 1880 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defender.*

* "NOTE.—This action raises an important question as to the operation of section 4 of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, in reference to the clause usually inserted in onerous conveyances of land binding the seller to relieve the purchaser 'of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens.' I had occasion to consider a similar question in the case of The Leith Heritages Company v. The Edinburgh and Leith Glass Company, my judgment (which was acquiesced in) being reported in the Scottish Law Reporter, vol. xiii., p. 731, under date 8th June 1876. The question, which is undoubtedly one of great and general importance, having been again very ably and anxiously argued in the present case, I deemed it right to reconsider with all possible care the views expressed in The Leith Heritages Company's case, but the result has been to confirm me in my former opinion.

"The circumstances of the present case are as follows:—"(given in narrative).

"Now, it is important to keep in view that, by the law as it stood prior to the commencement of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, although lands fell into non-entry immediately upon the death of the last-entered vassal, entitling the superior to the casualty of non-entry—i.e., to take and retain possession of the lands until the entry of a new vassal as heir or singular successor of the last vassal, and the payment by him of the relief or composition prestable in respect of such entry—the superior's right to the casualty consisted, to use the words of Erskine (Inst. II. v., sec. 29), merely of a 'claim which must be made effectual by an action for declaring that the lands have fallen into non-entry.' It must be observed, however, that this action was merely an indirect means of compelling the vassal's successor to enter and pay the composition, as the superior had no direct action to compel the successor either to enter or to pay the composition, the latter being only one of the conditions of entry. The lands, therefore, remained in non-entry, and in the hands of the superior, in virtue of his decree of declarator of non-entry, until the successor voluntarily came forward and asked to be received on payment of the composition.

"In short, neither the casualty of non-entry nor the composition (and the two things are entirely different) would ever be said to be 'payable or prestable' to the superior, until after his action was raised, and, in the case of the composition, until the successor had shewn his submission by asking to be received as vassal.

"It is thus quite clear that, had the Conveyancing Act of 1874 not passed, the present pursuers, after paying the price and accepting the disposition from the defender, and taking infestment thereon without reserving right to call upon the defender to complete any further title in his person, or to enter with the superior, would not, in the event of the superior raising against them an action of declarator of non-entry, have been entitled to insist upon the defender entering and paying the composition. It was no doubt not uncommon in practice for the purchaser, before accepting the disposition, to insist upon the seller entering with the superior and paying the composition.

"But where the disposition was accepted without reservation, the lands remaining in non-entry, no casualty was regarded as payable and prestable to the superior until an entry was demanded, or an action of declarator of non-entry was raised; and it was never heard of in practice that, on such an action being raised, the purchaser was entitled to call upon the seller to relieve him of the action and pay the composition. In short, by the law and practice prior to 1874, this was not one of the casualties falling within the clause of obligation to relieve of casualties, &c., contained in an ordinary disposition by a seller to a purchaser; indeed such a claim of relief would have been clearly untenable, because the defender, having been divested by the infestment of the pursuers before any judicial demand for an entry had been made by the superior, the casualty of non-entry, and the payment of the composition of a singular successor, would not have been a casualty 'payable or prestable' by the seller to the superior prior to the pursuers' term of entry. The pursuers, however, maintained that the effect of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 was to make the casualty of the year's rent actually 'payable or prestable' by the defender to the superior as at the passing of the Act on 1st October 1874, and, therefore, before the term of entry in the disposition, although no judicial demand was made by the pursuers until after that date; and they further maintained, that so soon as the judicial demand was made by the superior, the defender's obligation to relieve them of casualties took effect, and entitled them to call upon him to relieve them of the casualty in question. On the other hand, the defender maintains that the statute did not, according to its sound construction, impose any such liability upon him as seller."—(His Lordship here summarised and quoted the sub-sections of section 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, as above, p. 299, note.)

"According to the construction which the pursuers place upon these enactments, the sum of £824, 6s. 1d., being the casualty of a year's rent of the subjects in question, became, on 1st October 1874, 'payable or prestable' to Mr Sivright, as superior, by the defender, as the proprietor then duly infest in these subjects, although the superior had not demanded payment thereof, and the same continued to be 'payable or prestable' by the defender to the superior even after the pursuers had purchased the property, and, by the implied statutory confirmation of their own infestment in 1876, had become themselves the duly entered vassals of the superior. I am of opinion that this is not the sound construction of the statute. It appears to me that what has been done by the various sub-sections of section 4 is to substitute for an actual entry by confirmation, given to the superior under the old form, and as equivalent thereto, an implied entry by force of the statute taking effect on the completion of every infeftment; and further to declare that, notwithstanding the death of the last entered vassal and the non-infeftment of his successor, the lands should not be held to be in non-entry. But in order to protect the right of the superior to his casualty of composition which might have been held as extinguished by the statutory confirmation, and to take possession of the lands until payment of the composition, the statute substitutes for the old action of declarator of non-entry, in which the superior might have obtained decree of Court authorising him to enter into possession of the lands and appropriate the rents while the vassal lay out unentered, an equivalent action against the actual proprietor of the lands for the time, concluding for declarator that a casualty of a year's rent has become due, either by the death of the last entered vassal or by the infeftment of a new proprietor, and until the casualty is paid he is entitled to the rents of the property, and for decree against the proprietor for payment of the casualty personally.

"Now, as I read these provisions of the statute, it is left in the option of the superior to determine whether he shall raise such an action against the immediate successor of his last entered vassal, or against some remoter successor, just as it was optional to him under the old law to allow one or more successors of the last vassal to lie out unentered without claiming composition or without raising a declarator of non-entry. Under the old law, as already explained, the casualty of non-entry did not become 'payable or prestatable' until the claim was enforced by the superior in an action of declarator of non-entry. That action operated indirectly as a compulsitor upon the successor of the vassal to enter and pay the composition, because until he did so the superior was entitled to enter into possession of the lands and appropriate the rents; but until the action was raised the vassal was not regarded as contumacious, and was entitled to lie out unentered, to retain possession of the lands, and to withhold payment of the composition; and if he sold the lands to a purchaser who was infeft and took possession of the lands, the superior could not, with any effect, call upon the seller to enter or pay composition, and could make his right to composition effectual only by a declarator of non-entry against the purchaser, who, on the other hand, had no claim of relief against the seller. Now, I think there is no material change in this respect introduced by the statute of 1874. It appears to me that the vassal is not to be regarded as contumacious, and is not bound to pay the composition unless and until the superior demands it in an action in the statutory form.—See Ferrier's Trustees v. Baillie, 4 Ret., 738. But against whom is that action to be raised? It is not necessarily against the immediate successor of the last vassal, but against the successor, whether infeft or not, against whom the superior would have been entitled to raise an action of declarator of non-entry under the old law; but, as we have seen, it was against the party in possession of the lands for the time, that the declarator of non-entry was directed, although there might have been many intermediate proprietors between him and the last entered vassal; and I am clearly of opinion that, under the Act of 1874, the defender in the action of declarator and for payment of the casualty is to be the party in possession of the lands at the time as successor, whether immediate or more remote, of the last entered vassal, and especially is this the case where the several successors in their order have been infeft in the lands. Each successive infeftment makes the person infeft the entered vassal of the superior, and dissolves the feudal relation which has subsisted between the superior and the proprietor previously infeft. It follows, therefore, that the new proprietor, if a singular successor of the last entered vassal, or his heir, becomes by virtue of his infeftment the party against whom the superior may raise his action to constitute the casualty of composition as a debt 'payable or prestatable' to the superior.

"It is true that the statute provides that the superior is not to demand a casualty sooner than he could 'by the law prior to the Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter, or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entry.' But in the present case the superior did not demand the casualty sooner than under the old law he could have required the pursuers to enter. On the contrary, under the old law, he might have required an entry from the defender long before the date of his action against the pursuers, but he did not so enforce his claim. Had he chosen to constitute his claim against the defender before he sold the lands to the pursuers he would not have been entitled to demand the casualty from the pursuers during the defender's lifetime, because the defender would on that supposition have been in the position which under the old law would have been held by one duly entered by the superior as his vassal on payment of composition, during whose lifetime the superior could not have called upon a successor to enter. But though the defender had obtained implied entry by the operation of the statute, the superior did not, although entitled to do so, demand a casualty from him, and the statute expressly provides 'that no implied entry shall be pleadable' against the new action for the casualty. The meaning of that provision clearly is, that the proprietor infert against whom the statutory action was raised is not only not to be entitled to plead his own implied entry by confirmation as a discharge of the composition, but is not to be entitled to plead that by the implied entry of any of his predecessors the action is excluded, unless some one of such predecessors still in life has paid the composition.

"It appears to me, therefore, according to the sound construction of the Act of 1874, and of the obligation of the defender to relieve the pursuers of casualties contained in his disposition of Straiton—(1st) That the casualty for which the pursuers were sued, and which they paid to the superior in 1879, was the casualty exigible from themselves in respect of their own implied entry; (2) that the demand for that casualty was not made by the superior sooner than he was entitled to do so; and (3) that the said casualty is not a casualty 'payable or prestatable' to the superior by the defender prior to the term of entry of the pursuers under their disposition from the defender within the sense and meaning of the obligation to relieve of casualties contained in that disposition.

"In addition to what I have already stated, it may be well to point out that, if the pursuers' argument is sound, the defender, and not themselves, was the party against whom the superior should have raised the statutory action. But that plea was stated by the pursuers in defence against that action, and was over-ruled by the Lord Ordinary (Adam) and the Second Division.—See Sivright v. Straiton Estate Company, 5 Ret. 922, and 6 Ret. 1208. And I must assume that the judgment would not have been pronounced unless the Judges who decided the case had been satisfied that the casualty for payment of which they decerned against the pursuers was payable or prestatable in respect of their own implied entry, and not in respect of the defender's previous implied entry. But further, if the superior had raised his action against the defender instead of the pursuers, I think the defence of the defender would have been conclusive, viz., that he was not the successor of the last vassal who would have been called as defender in a declarator of non-entry under the old law, and that therefore he was not the proper defender in the new statutory action of declarator and for payment of the casualty.

"Before concluding, it is necessary to refer to the defender's averments to the effect that, during the treaty for the sale, and before the disposition was executed, the question of the casualty was expressly raised between the parties, and that although the pursuers urged the defender to pay the casualty he declined to do so, and that the pursuers assented to this declinature and agreed to pay the casualties themselves. These averments are denied by the pursuers, who

That alteration took the question out of the old law to which the Lord Ordinary had given effect. (2) The clause of relief here, when read in the light of the 8th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act of 1868, and the interpretation clause of the Conveyancing Act of 1874 clearly covered the composition sought to be repaid. It had been laid down and always acted upon before the passing of the 1874 Act that a seller who had not entered with the superior could not compel the purchaser to pay the price until he had entered and paid the composition.¹ This had been held to be law still in a recent Outer-House case, the judgment in which had been acquiesced in.* The mere fact that the company allege that the defender concealed from them the fact that he had not paid a casualty. If the clause in the disposition truly bears the meaning which I have now put upon it, then it is unnecessary to consider the relevancy of these averments on either side. On the other hand, if my construction is wrong, then it may become necessary to do so. But I may say that, as at present advised, I should not be inclined to admit these averments to probation. The alleged communings during the treaty of sale were prior to the date of the disposition, and if it had been intended to exclude the casualty in question from the seller's obligation to relieve the purchaser of casualties, the clause in the disposition should have been 'specially qualified' to that effect; and parole proof of such qualification would be clearly incompetent. On the other hand, the pursuers have not relevantly alleged on record any duty of disclosure which the defender failed to discharge. The result of the whole case is that the defender is assoilzied with expenses."

* Judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark in Lavrie and Scott v. Scott, 15th November 1876:—"NOTE.—In June 1876 the pursuers sold the estate to the defender, and by the action they seek to recover the price. The defence is that the last entered vassal died in 1868, and that though the pursuers have under the Act of 1874 an implied entry, they cannot enforce the contract of sale until they pay the composition which is now due to the superior.

"It is plain that under the former law the pursuers could not enforce the contract unless they had entered with the superior, and that they would have been bound to pay the composition which became due on their entry. But they contend that by force of the statute they are entered with the superiors, and that in consequence the defender is bound to accept the title which is tendered to him. On the other hand, the defender maintains that the composition has become due to the superior, and that the incumbrance thus created must be cleared off before he is bound to pay the price.

"The rule under the former law was settled by the case of Gardiner v. Henderson, M. 15,037. Looking to the report, the ground of judgment seems to be that, by reason of the lands being in non-entry, the title offered by the sellers was incomplete. Consequently the pursuers urge that, as they are entered, they tender a complete title. The Lord Ordinary is not satisfied with this view. It is true that the pursuers have the benefit of the statutory entry; but the lands are exposed to the claim which the superior has for the composition exigible on the death of the vassal last entered by him. They are thus liable to eviction from a cause antecedent to the sale. But the defender is entitled to the full enjoyment of the lands which he has bought, and to this end the sellers must, it is thought, clear them of all incumbrances existing prior to the sale. The right of the superior to claim the composition, if not paid, seems to the Lord Ordinary to be an incumbrance of this nature, for it owes its origin to an event which occurred before the lands were bought. This appears to be in conformity with the views which the profession have taken of the case of Gardiner, though it is perhaps wider than the special grounds of judgment assigned by the Court. See 2 Bell on Conveyancing, p. 645.

here had paid the price and recorded their disposition could not alter their position so as to deprive them of their right to be relieved of a debt truly due by the disponent. (3) Even had there been no clause of relief the company was entitled to recover their payment, which had been truly for a debt of the disponent; and the disponent having refused to pay before had caused the expense which had been incurred, and was therefore liable for that also.

Argued for the defender;—The company, by recording their disposition, became the entered vassal with the superior, and the composition due became their own proper debt. Their entry superseded the seller's entry, and what had been formerly his debt then became theirs. Composition was a debt resulting from the relation of superior and vassal, and the superior was only entitled to go against the vassal at the time in possession and entered with him. Whatever might have been the effect of the clause of relief before the disposition was taken and recorded the moment the disposition was put upon record the debt became the proper debt of the disponents, and the disponent had then no debt of which to relieve them.

At advising on 14th December 1880,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Lord Deas has been kind enough to communicate to me the substance of his opinion. I concur in the result at which he arrives, and I shall explain in a few sentences some difficulties which have led to this hearing.

The difficulty which I have felt in giving effect to this clause of relief in this conveyance has arisen from doubts how far the debt now sued for was truly due prior to the pursuers' entry to the lands. I imagine it to be unquestionable that without this clause of relief the purchaser would have had no claim, because, having accepted his title, taken infeftment, and entered with the superior, the price paid by him must then have been held to represent the value of the subject as it stood. Under the former law a purchaser was entitled to refuse to complete a contract for the sale of lands unless the sellers were entered with the superior; but if he accepted the title, and entered with the superior himself, he could have had no claim on his author to relieve him of the casualty. I am inclined to think that even under the statute of 1874 the same rule would hold good in both events, for although it could not be seen from the title whether the composition was paid or not, it was as much within the power of the purchaser to ascertain that fact as whether the feu-duty was in arrear, or what was the amount of the public burdens, or of the rental of the lands. The case therefore turns on the clause of relief. Now, although composition under the old law was not a casualty proper, but in truth a voluntary payment for an entry, which never became a debt due to the superior, the Act of 1874 has expressly declared it to be a casualty, and to be a debt due by the vassal infeft or by the possessor of the lands. Thus the only question remaining is, whether the composition in this case was due and prestable from the lands prior to the purchasers' entry? That there was a casualty due to the superior by the seller of the lands is certain, but whether that debt subsisted after the purchasers' entry I have found to be a question of difficulty. It was admitted at the notice of the Lord Ordinary; but he does not think that this judgment runs counter to that case. There the purchaser agreed to take the title as it stood, and the decision turned on the meaning of a clause of relief occurring in a disposition granted and accepted in conformity with that agreement."

debate that the composition now sued for was the proper debt of the pursuers ; and that could hardly be said to be due and prestatable by them before their own term of entry. But if the seller still remained liable to the superior, which might be questioned, or if in settling with the superior the pursuers were only bound to pay the amount due by the seller, which is not quite consistent with the principle on which the argument was placed, these difficulties would disappear. But as we are dealing with a statute from which we must discover a rule not very clearly indicated, I am content to acquiesce in Lord Deas' opinion, and to give effect to the pursuers' demand. Any judgment we may pronounce will leave some unsettled questions behind it ; but the object of this consultation will be attained if conveyancers are instructed as to the rule they are to follow for the future.

v. Stephens.

LORD DEAS.—By missives of sale dated 12th July 1876, Stephens, the defender, as trust-dispensee under the mortis causa deed of settlement of the late Peter Brash, sold to the Straiton Estate Company, incorporated by Act of Parliament, the estate of Straiton, in the county of Edinburgh, at the price of £58,000, payable £43,000 at Martinmas 1876, and the balance on 2d February 1877. This is the whole import of the missives. Nothing whatever is said on the subject of the title to be accepted by or given to the purchasers.

Peter Brash had been entered with the superior, but at his death on 8th November 1872 the subjects fell into non-entry ; Stephens, his trust-dispensee, obtained himself infest by expeding and recording a notarial instrument on 9th July 1873. He did not, however, enter with the superior. Thus stood the title of Stephens, the seller, at the passing of the Act 37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94, which Act had the effect (section 4, sub-section 2) of entering Stephens with the superior as at the date when the Act came into operation, viz., 1st October 1874. Stephens consequently became liable at that date to pay the entry-money which then became due to the superior. He did not, however, pay that entry-money, but from that time forward he was liable to be sued for it as his own proper debt at the instance of the superior. In this state of matters Stephens sold the lands to the pursuers, the Straiton Estate Company, by the missives referred to of 12th July 1876.

It is very clear that while as yet nothing had followed on these missives, the purchasers could have declined to pay the price and to accept a disposition so long as the seller was not entered with the superior. Long prior to the statute of 1874 it was settled (Gardiner, M. 15,037) that a purchaser under missives or minute of sale, silent, as the present missives are, upon the subject of entry with the superior, was not bound to accept the title as complete if the subjects were in non-entry till the seller had paid the entry-money and entered with the superior. There is nothing in the statute of 1874 to change the relative position in that respect in which the seller stands towards the purchaser under such missives as the present. The seller at the date of the sale was thus under an obligation to the superior to enter. He was under a similar obligation to the purchasers in order to complete his title. That obligation the statute implemented for him, so far as the entry itself was concerned, by enacting (section 4, sub-section 2) that "every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act, or thereafter shall be duly infest in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be as at the date of the registration of such infestment in the appropriate register of sasines duly entered with the nearest superior." But the statute did not relieve the proprietor of the relative obligation to pay the entry-money. On the contrary, it enacted (section 4, sub-section 3) that "such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, &c., which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of such entry." In case of non-payment of these casualties, sub-section 4 gives the remedy—"A superior who would but for this Act be entitled to sue an action of declarator of non-entry against the successor of the vassal in the lands, whether by succession, bequest, gift, or conveyance, may raise in the Court of Session against such successor, whether he shall be infeft or not" (that is, in this case, against Stephens, who was infeft), "an action of declarator, and for payment of any casualty exigible at the date of such action, and no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against such action; and any decree for payment in such action shall have the effect of and operate as a decree of declarator of non-entry according to the now existing law, but shall cease to have such effect upon the payment of such casualty and of the expenses, if any, contained in said decree." The effect of an action and decree of this kind against Stephens would have been to bring him back from the position of an entered vassal to the position of an unentered vassal, so long as he did not pay the casualty—that is, the entry-money—which had become due by him, and expenses, and consequently would have entitled the purchasers to refuse to pay the price and accept a disposition till he had reinstated himself in the position of an entered vassal who had paid the relative casualty,—that is, the entry-money,—the consequence of which payment would have been that an entry by the purchasers or any subsequent proprietor would neither have been necessary nor competent, as the lands would not again have been in non-entry.

 Co. (Limited)

That what is called in the statute "the casualty" includes the entry-money payable by Stephens, the seller, is clear from the interpretation clause, which bears, "'Casualties,' shall include the relief-duty payable on the entry or succession of an heir, the composition or other duty payable on the entry of a singular successor, whether by law or under the conditions of the feu, and all payments exigible in lieu of such duties and compositions, and all periodical fixed sums or quantities which may be stipulated for under this Act."

Now, it is true that the purchasers,—in place of taking their stand upon the missives, as they might have done, till the seller, who was entered by force of the statute, had paid the relative casualty due to the superior,—paid the price of the lands and accepted a disposition; but then that disposition expressly bore—"I bind myself as trustee foreshaid, and the trust-estate under my charge, to free and relieve the said disponees and their foreshaids of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens." Whether without any such clause the purchasers, who had accepted the title and taken infeftment, could have demanded relief, I do not inquire; I shall only say that would have been a different question. It is true that the clause is applicable only to feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens which were then past-due. But that was undoubtedly the case with the entry-money, or, in other words, the casualty in question. The statutory entry made the casualty a debt due by Stephens as at the date of the registration of his infeftment, and that is quite consistent with the enactment (in sub-section 3) that "such implied entry shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right, have required the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering," for by the law prior to the Act the superior could have required Stephens, the seller, to enter and pay the casualty so soon as No. 63.

Brash, the last entered vassal, died, viz., in November 1872.

As the output of minerals, and consequently the amount of lordships, varied at different dates, there may be, or might have been, some little puzzle, looking to the decision of the Second Division that minerals are to some extent to be taken into account as to how the entry-money fell to be calculated in this case; but I do not enter into that subject further than to say that I am very clearly of opinion that the casualty in dispute, whatever its amount, is not a casualty which became payable in respect of any statutory entry of the purchasers. There was no longer any room for such an entry. Stephens, the seller, stood entered at the date of the sale, and the only casualty payable was a casualty in respect of his entry. At the date of the disposition the casualty was past-due by him, and consequently it falls under the very words of the obligation in that deed by which the seller binds himself to free and relieve his disponees of all casualties. This short view appears to me to be conclusive.

v. Stephens.

LORD MURE.—The question here raised is one of general importance, but, in the view I take of it, it lies within a narrow compass; and it is this—What is to be the effect of a clause in a disposition by which the seller undertakes to relieve the purchaser of “all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens” due on account of the lands conveyed, in a case where, under the operation of the 4th section of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, both the seller and purchaser have been entered with the superior, by neither of whom any composition had been paid at the time of entry?

The facts on which this question mainly depends are not, as it appears to me, in dispute between the parties, and are shortly these:—

After the death of the vassal last infeft in 1872, the title to his property was made up by the defender as his sole accepting trustee by notarial instrument, which was recorded in July 1873, but this title was never confirmed by the superior. So standing the title, the Conveyancing Act of 1874 was passed, which had the effect of entering the defender with the superior, and making him liable for a composition for which no demand appears to have been made. In this state of matters the property was purchased by the pursuers in 1876, and the disposition in their favour, by which the disponer was taken bound to “free and relieve the disponees of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens,” was recorded in November of that year. By so recording the disposition the pursuers were themselves duly entered with the superior, and in May 1877 an action was raised against them by the superior to have it declared that in consequence of the death of the vassal last vest and seized in the property a casualty had become due, and concluding for payment of that casualty. In that action, after a variety of procedure, the pursuers were found liable in payment of the casualty, and it is for relief from the sum decerned for against the pursuers in that action that the present action has been brought.

If the action at the instance of the superior had been brought against the present pursuers, after their acquisition of the property, but before they were infeft, as it might have been under sub-sec. 4 of the 4th section of the Act of 1874, and they had then called upon the defender to relieve them of that action and its consequences in respect of the obligation of relief undertaken by him, I am unable to see on what grounds the defender could have successfully maintained a defence against that demand. He had himself become the entered

No. 63. Dec. 16, 1880. Straiton Estate Co. (Limited) v. Stephens. vassal of the superior by the operation of the 2d sub-section of the 4th section of the Act of 1874. Having been so entered he was liable in the casualties, to use the words of the 3d sub-section, "due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of such entry;" and by the clause of relief in the disposition granted by him to the pursuers in 1876 he had become bound to free and relieve them "of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens." Now, these words are, by the 8th section of the Titles to Land Consolidation Act of 1868, expressly declared "to import an obligation to relieve of all feu-duties or other duties and services or casualties payable or prestatable to the superior, from or on account of the lands conveyed prior to the date of entry," and when so interpreted appear to me to be conclusive of the question I am now dealing with. For it cannot, I think, admit of doubt that at the date of the sale to the pursuers a composition for an entry was "payable" to and "exigible" by the superior, according to the ordinary meaning of these expressions; and all difficulty as to the question which might a few years ago have been raised as to whether a composition was truly a casualty is removed by the interpretation clause of the Act of 1874, which declares that the word "casualty" shall include the "composition or other duty payable on the entry of a singular successor, whether by law or under the conditions of the feu."

But the circumstances under which the question has been here raised are somewhat different from those in the case I have just put, inasmuch as the pursuers were themselves entered with the superior by force of the statute before any demand was made against them by the superior, and it was strongly contended, on the part of the defender, that the composition claimed from the pursuers by the superior was a composition for their own entry in 1876, and not one due in respect of the defender's entry in 1874. I was at one time disposed to think that there might be grounds on which this contention might be supported—more especially if, as appears to have been at one time supposed, a larger composition was in those circumstances due and exigible than there would have been had the composition been fixed at the date of entry of the defender. But on further consideration I have come to the conclusion that this difficulty does not arise in the circumstances of the present case; for on looking into the report of the case between the superior and the present pursuers in July 1879 (6 R., 1208), I find that the question was there raised as to the period at which the composition was to be struck, and that the Court rejected the claim of the superior to have it fixed at the rental as it stood at the date of his action in 1879, and adopted the period of an average of the three years prior to Whitsunday 1874, two years before the date of the sale to the pursuers. That seems to me to be clear from the passage in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk, as reported at p. 1214 of the case, where his Lordship says,—“I think what I have already suggested in the course of the debate is a reasonable course, viz., that we should take the average of the three years ending at Whitsunday 1874.”

What, then, the defender will, in this view, be now called on to relieve the pursuers of will be the composition due by himself to the superior at the date of the sale to the pursuers, and of this it appears to me, on a fair construction of the statutes, that the defender is bound under the clause of relief to relieve the pursuers.

LORD GIFFORD.—I am of opinion that the pursuers are entitled to relief from the defender of the composition which the pursuers have been obliged to pay to the superior of the lands of Straiton and others, which the pursuers purchased from the defender under a disposition dated 10th November 1876, and therefore I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled. I abstain, however, from giving any opinion as to how far the claim of relief will warrant decree for the full sums concluded for in the summons, because on this question of the extent of relief there has been no completed argument, indeed, no argument at all, either before the Second Division or before the seven Judges. There is also a question as to the defender's liability for the expenses found due to the superior. These questions I leave open, and confine myself to the single point whether the defender is bound under his obligation of relief or otherwise to free the pursuers of the composition of a year's rent payable on the entry of a singular successor. I think the defender is so bound.

v. Stephens.

The subjects sold fell into non-entry on 8th November 1872, when Peter Brash, who was fully entered vassal, died. He left a trust-deed under which the present defender, as his sole trustee, took up the subjects, and completed a title thereto by notarial instrument, registered 9th July 1873, but he took out no entry with the superior. On 1st October 1874 the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, came into force, and by virtue of that Act the defender became by implication under the statute entered with the superior, the non-entry ceasing by the operation of the Act. The same Act provided that although the lands should not be deemed to be in non-entry the superior should have the same pecuniary rights as he would have had under the former state of the law, and I take it to be clear that if the superior had chosen to sue the present defender any time after 1st October 1874, and before the defender sold the estate to the pursuers, he could have compelled the defender to pay to him one year's rent of the estate. I think this is plain. The defender would have had no defence if the superior had demanded from him the casualty of a year's rent.

In November 1876 the defender sold the estate to the present pursuers, and we have now been furnished with copies of the missives of sale. Neither in the missives of sale nor in any other writing was any special agreement made regarding the composition then exigible by the superior. The formal disposition by the defender to the pursuers was granted on 10th November 1876, and was registered 15th November 1876.

The next point, which also I take to be clear, is that the pursuers at any time before accepting the disposition in their favour by the defender might have required the defender to pay the composition of a year's rent which was then demandable by the superior. Under the old law a seller who had sold lands in non-entry might have been compelled to complete his title by entering with the superior before the purchaser was bound to accept of a disposition, and I think that it follows that under the existing law, although an entry is no longer required, that being implied by the seller's infestment, still the seller must pay any non-entry duties or duplicands or compositions which have become due to the superior, and are payable under the statute in the same way as if the seller had taken out an entry.

Now, in the present case this was not done. Although the superior was undoubtedly entitled to exact from the seller at the date of the sale a year's rent of the subjects he did not do so, and the seller, without making any payment to the superior, proceeded to grant a disposition to the purchasers in common form. The disposition, however, contains the following clause of relief and obligation upon the seller :—" I bind myself, as trustee foresaid, and the trust-estate under my charge, to free and relieve the said disponees and their forebears of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens." Now, I am of opinion that this clause of relief and obligation undertaken by the seller, which, in terms of the statutes, is interpreted as meaning all feu-duties, casualties, and others due prior to the date of the purchaser's entry, entitles the pursuers to insist in the present action. The word "casualties" certainly includes the present claim, and indeed can refer and be applied to nothing else but the present claim. It seems to me to be quite as effectual as if the clause had been more fully expressed, and had borne that the seller was to relieve the purchasers of the casualty of one year's rent which became due to the superior and was exigible by him in consequence of the death of Peter Brash, and of the implied entry in virtue of the statute of 1874 of Mr Stephens, as his trustee. Of course if the clause had been so expressed this would have removed every doubt, but as there is no other possible casualty to which the obligation of relief can apply I think the clause is quite as effectual as if it had been expressed in the fullest detail. I am aware that this short form of the obligation of relief was introduced by a statute passed long prior to the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and that the word "casualties" occurs in it when it could not have the same meaning as that contended for in the present action. But I am not moved by this consideration. When I find the clause occurring in a deed executed in November 1876 I must hold that it refers to the state of the law at that time, and that the parties had the statute of 1874 in view. The use of all these clauses and of the shortened forms of conveyancing are optional, and the clauses or the words given as examples therein may be adopted in whole or in part, so far as applicable, and they may be varied so as to make them applicable to each particular case. Although the word "casualties" occurs in the earlier statute, no conveyancer is bound or entitled to insert that word if it has no application to the case with which he is dealing. But if that word is adopted by the parties, and if there is a casualty to which it is directly and strictly applicable,—as fully applicable as if it had been devised on purpose to meet the present case,—then I cannot refuse to give effect to the clause according to express and unambiguous terms. To deny effect to the clause in the present deed, and in the circumstances in which that deed was granted, would, I think, be to deny effect to the explicit and most natural agreement of the parties.

It is worth notice that the decree pronounced in the action at the superior's instance for payment of the casualty expressly bears (differing in this respect from the conclusions of the superior's summons) that the casualty found due to the superior became due to him upon the death of the said Peter Brash. Apart from this, however, I think it is quite clear that under the statute the casualty of one year's rent became due and exigible, or, in the words of the statute, "payable, or prestable," to the superior by the seller prior to the date of his sale to the present pursuers, and this is enough for the purpose of the present action.

I am therefore for altering the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, but reserving in the meantime the exact amount for which the pursuers will obtain decree.

LORD SHAND.—It cannot, I think, be doubted that after the pursuers purchased the lands of Straiton, in terms of the missives of sale of 12th July 1876, the defender was bound to pay the composition then due to the superior so as to free the purchasers from liability for the amount. This view is in accordance with the law as it was understood long prior to the statute of 1874, and as settled by the case of Gardiner in 1799, and universal practice, and it is, I think, plain that the law continued to be the same after the statute, as was, indeed, found by Lord Rutherford Clark in the recent case of Laurie v. Scott, supra, p. 305, n. The legal principle on which the law rests appears to me to be simply this, that the seller of a heritable property is bound to free the subjects of all burdens and incumbrances affecting it which are not like feu-duty of a permanent and annual continuing nature, unless in so far as the purchaser has specially contracted to take upon himself such liability. The liability of the property to the superior's claim for composition in lieu of non-entry duties is in truth as much a burden or incumbrance as any heritable debt affecting the property. It was so, as I think, prior to 1874, for the superior's claim might lead to eviction of the proprietor in an action of non-entry unless the composition were paid; and it became even more clear after the statute of 1874 in a case like the present, in which the seller, the successor of the last entered vassal deceased, was infeft in the lands, because the seller had obtained an implied entry to the same effect as if the superior had granted him a charter, and with the direct result of rendering him and the lands liable for the composition as a debt due to the superior.

The ordinary rule of law is that the delivery of a disposition which is intended merely to pass the title to the lands, with such warrandice as may have been agreed on, does not affect the seller's obligation to clear the lands of all incumbrances; and I see no good reason for holding that this rule does not apply to the liability of the lands for the composition of a year's rent, which is a burden or incumbrance often of very substantial amount. Whether the burden be a heritable debt of £800, or the claim of the superior for that sum as a composition due to him in respect of an implied entry taken by infeftment, the liability of the seller to relieve the purchaser is the same. I am unable to see any good reason for holding that the acceptance by the purchaser of a title to the lands will relieve the seller of his obligation under the contract of sale to free the subjects of the composition any more than it would relieve him of his obligation to have the heritable debt discharged. I am not prepared to say that the taking delivery of a disposition prior to the Act of 1874 would have had the effect of relieving the seller of his obligation to pay the composition, as the Lord Ordinary assumes; but even if this would have been the case on the narrow and technical ground that the superior's claim was one to non-entry duties and not composition, because the vassal was not entered, the case is, I think, now essentially different under the Act of 1874, for the seller having obtained an implied entry, the composition is at once a debt due to the superior and a burden or incumbrance affecting the subjects, and as such the seller is bound to have it discharged in the same way as any other burden.

Accordingly it appears to me that even if the deed of conveyance in this case had not contained the special clause of relief of all casualties, the seller would have been bound, notwithstanding the delivery and acceptance of that deed, to pay the composition due to the superior, for it was quite as much an implied term of the contract of sale that the seller should free the subject of incumbrances as that he should give a title, and the giving of a title did not in any degree supersede or affect the other obligation. Even, however, if this were not so, I agree with the Court in opinion that the clause of relief expressly reserves the pursuers' right to the relief asked, just as that right existed before the disposition was delivered, and in the same way as if the disposition had not been granted. I see no other meaning that can be given to the word "casualties" in the clause, occurring as it does in company with the word "feu-duties," than to hold that it applies to the composition then due and payable or prestable to the superior in respect of the death of the former vassal and the implied entry of the seller, the successor of that vassal.

It was maintained that the composition paid by the pursuers was not that for which the defender was liable, but this contention is, in my opinion, unsound.

The casualty which was due at the date of the purchase became payable in consequence of the death of the last entered vassal, the predecessor of the defender, and it was this casualty that the pursuers were obliged to pay, although the obligation arose from their acceptance of the conveyance, or from that acceptance and the infeftment that followed. If the defender is able to shew that the sum paid is in excess of the amount due to the superior by him in respect of his implied entry I do not say he is liable for that excess, for I do not think the delivery of the disposition enlarged the defender's obligation under the contract of sale. On this point there has been no argument, and it raises a subordinate question only. It may be fairly contended, I think, that the amount of the composition for which the defender became liable to the superior must be fixed as at the date of his own infeftment, or rather at 1st October 1874, when the Conveyancing Act came into operation, for on that date he was actually entered as vassal by force of the statute; that it was the benefit of this entry only that he was bound to give; and that his obligation in its pecuniary consequences should not be carried beyond the sum for which he was liable in that view. The pursuers, I understand, get the benefit of an entry in their own favour as at a later date, and if it be the fact that they have paid for this a composition of larger amount than the defender could have been called on to pay to the superior—a point as to which we have not been informed—I am not prepared to say that the defender is liable in the full amount claimed. On this question, and the question of the defender's liability for the expenses of the former litigation which are sued for in this action, I express no opinion. On the general question which has been raised for the opinion of the consulted Judges, and which alone has been the subject of argument, I am of opinion, differing from the Lord Ordinary, that the pursuers are in the right.

LORD YOUNG.—The question for decision depends, in my opinion, on the meaning of the clause in the disposition by the defender to the pursuers binding the disponent to free and relieve the disponees "of all feu-duties, casualties, and public burdens," limited by the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, and probably also by the common law, to those payable or prestable "prior to the date of entry." At the date of the sale to the pursuers, of the disposition, and of the entry under it, a composition, being a year's rent of the lands, was "payable or prestable" to the superior—or, waiving for the moment a criticism on the applicability of these words, which I shall afterwards notice, the superior had a "right or title" to this casualty as the condition of permitting the proprietor, whoever he might be, to remain in possession of the lands. The defender did not in fact pay this casualty, and in consequence the pursuers were called on to pay it, and did so. I say "in consequence" because it was conceded by the defender's counsel that payment by the defender would have relieved the pursuers of the necessity of making the payment which they did, and of any obligation to pay, at least while the defender lived. The pursuers now ask relief from the defender under the clause which I have referred to, and No. 63. I am of opinion that their demand ought to be allowed.

The judgment of the Lord Ordinary, which is against the pursuers, seems to rest mainly on the view that the words "payable or prestable to the superior" are strictly inapplicable to a casualty of relief or composition—the casualty being, in truth, a right in the superior to declare a non-entry, and enter on possession of the lands to be retained till the proprietor may choose voluntarily to relieve them out of his hands by a money payment of ascertained amount, which, although the superior is bound to accept of it when offered, is not "payable or prestable" to him, inasmuch as he cannot enforce payment of it directly, or otherwise than by seizing and holding the lands till he gets it.

I should, I confess, have thought unfavourably of this argument as used to affect the interpretation and effect of a clause of relief irrespective altogether of the Act of 1874. In the common and familiar language of lawyers and men of business, a casualty of composition signifies the money payment on receipt of which the superior is bound when the casualty falls to permit the proprietor to possess the lands as his vassal and forego his right to resume possession, and it is as often as not taxed, as it is called, at a certain pecuniary amount by the name of casualty. The superior's right is, and always has been, spoken of as a right to demand money, and it in truth is so, none the less that his only, though singularly effective, mode of enforcing it is (or at least was prior to 1874) to seize and hold the lands till it is satisfied. The Act of 1874 in many places refers to these casualties in just such language as was always used regarding them. It speaks of them as "due or exigible;" of the superior's right to "demand" them; of the "rights and remedies competent to a superior under the existing law for securing, recovering, and making effectual such casualties;" and of the "payment of any casualty exigible." The Consolidation Act of 1868 also refers to "casualties" as "payable or prestable to the superior." To say that the casualty, strictly speaking, is, if not the occurrence or happening of the death of the last entered vassal, at least the superior's right thence resulting to seize and hold the lands till a certain fixed payment is voluntarily made, and that therefore the words "payable or prestable" are inapplicable, very much resembles a criticism on the words "sunset" and "sunrise" as inaccurate, inasmuch as the sun does not rise or set—the phenomena familiarly and even in statutes referred to by these words being caused, not by the sun rising or setting or moving anyhow, but by the rotatory motion of the earth. What men mean by "sunset" and "sunrise" is not more certain than what Scotch lawyers and conveyancers mean by casualties "due or exigible" or "payable or prestable" to a superior, and it is an idle thing to shew that their language is scientifically inaccurate whether the science involved be astronomy or feudal law.

I put it to the Solicitor-General whether on the contract of sale, assuming it to be in the terms indicated by the disposition that followed on it, i.e., such as the disposition would exactly fulfil, the pursuers as buyers could not have compelled the defender as seller to pay the casualty which the superior had then confessedly right to demand. The answer, candidly given, was that in a case exactly similar Lord Rutherford Clark had decided, on grounds which he (the Solicitor-General) was unable to controvert, that such was the buyer's right. The Solicitor-General, however, contended that this right was lost by the buyer's acceptance of the disposition. I pointed out that this seemed to be a strange result of accepting a disposition which contained an express obligation on the

The Solicitor-General, however, contended that this right was lost by the buyer's acceptance of the disposition. I pointed out that this seemed to be a strange result of accepting a disposition which contained an express obligation on the disponer to pay all casualties due prior to the disponees' entry. It was thereupon urged that the disponees (the pursuers) lost their right, and liberated the defender by recording the disposition, inasmuch as they thereby incurred a casualty on their own account, and in respect of their own entry as vassals in the lands, and that the defender's escape was nothing to them. The point of this argument is that by recording their disposition the pursuers annihilated the casualty theretofore due, and to which the obligation of relief applied, and created another in which they were themselves the debtors without relief.

I think this argument is fallacious. I assume of course (for that is the condition of the argument) that had the pursuers not recorded their disposition they would have been entitled to require the defender to relieve them of the casualty due at their entry to the lands, viz., Martinmas 1876, either by paying it directly or repaying it to the pursuers in case the superior exacted it from them, which, I need hardly observe, he might have done equally whether their disposition was recorded or not. The question then is, Did the pursuers discharge their right by recording their disposition? It is not reasonably supposable that they so intended, and although a valuable right may be unintentionally renounced or obligation discharged, I venture to think that it would be unjust, and contrary to the principles which usually govern our decisions, to attribute this effect to a formal act not intended to that end, and by which the party seeking a gratuitous and undesigned benefit was in no way prejudiced. It was conceded, and is clear, that the defender's original obligation under the clause of relief cannot be enlarged by the recording of the disposition containing it which he granted. But, indeed, it is not suggested that the casualty which the pursuers in fact paid was greater than that which was exigible by the superior at the date of their entry without reference to the recording of the disposition, or that they are now demanding more under the clause of relief than, ex hypothesi of the argument I am now considering, they were entitled to demand before the disposition was recorded.

That the pursuers may possibly (for there is no certainty) have a greater benefit, in a question with the superior, by the payment made after recording than they would have taken by a similar payment before, whether by the defender or by themselves, or, in other words, that the superior may possibly be prejudiced by the substitution of the buyer's life for that of the seller, is not, in my opinion, a pertinent consideration. The pursuers suffer no prejudice, for their payment is of exactly the same amount as it would have been had it been made before the recording, and the superior does not complain, and, so far as I see, cannot.

What I have hitherto said is in fact the judgment which I prepared to be delivered in the Second Division, when I thought the case might be decided there without the assistance of your Lordships of the First Division. And it will be observed that I have taken the case exactly as presented, viz., with an express obligation of relief, and without considering what would have been the rights and obligations of the parties hinc inde without it. But the case having been so dealt with as to make it eminently a case of "light and leading," I think it according to my duty to say that I should have been prepared to decide it in the same way irrespective of the express obligation, provided always there was nothing to shew that the parties had otherwise bargained. The maxim expressum facit cessare tacitum applies only when the expressum is at variance more or less with the tacitum—that is, with what the law would have implied in the absence of expression. When the two are in perfect harmony, the m is expressio eorum quæ tacite insunt nihil operatur. Now, I am of opinion with Lord Rutherford Clark, in the decision to which we were referred, that in the absence of express or necessarily implied agreement to the contrary it is the right of the buyer to require the seller to pay any casualty due to the superior at the date of his entry to the lands, and further, and beyond what Lord Rutherford Clark found it necessary to decide, that this right is not forfeited or the corresponding obligation discharged by the acceptance and recording of a disposition. Prior to the Act of 1874 the superior's right to the casualty strictly depended on the question, Is the fee full or are the lands in non-entry? So that if the seller was entered (or the fee otherwise full) the buyer had no occasion to inquire whether the casualty had been paid or not, for whether or not there was none due, and no call could have been made on him. Since the Act the superior's claim is independent of the fact of entry or non-entry, and subsists or not according as it has been paid or not. Under the existing law every seller with a recorded title is entered with his superior, but the superior's right to a casualty subsists nevertheless if he has not been paid any since the death of the last vassal who paid, and this right, if existing, must be satisfied either by the seller or the buyer. I say by either, for it was conceded that payment could not be demanded from both, and that payment by either would satisfy the right. Now, I am of opinion that the common law obligation of the seller on the contract of sale, in the absence of any contrary agreement, is to pay and to relieve the buyer, and that this obligation, which is merely pecuniary, subsists until it is fulfilled by payment, to the relief of the creditor therein, and is not discharged by his accepting and recording a disposition.

v. Stephens.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur in the judgment proposed. I am of opinion that the seller was bound at the date of the contract to relieve the purchaser of the burdens then due, and particularly of the composition, and that by reason of the clause of relief he is still so bound.

Whether he would have continued so liable without the clause of relief which we have here I do not say. It is not clear whether or not the obligation would have subsisted without the clause of relief.

The case was taken up by the Second Division on 16th December, when the pursuers moved for decree for the composition paid by them, and for the expenses paid by them to the superior, and also for those incurred by them to their own agent in the action at the superior's instance. It was argued for the defender that though he might be held liable in part of the expenses incurred in that action still he should not be held liable for the expense incurred in consequence of the Company having denied all liability to the superior, as that point had already been decided in previous cases.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—All reasonable expenses incurred by the party entitled to relief must be paid. The pursuers were entitled to state all available pleas, and the party found ultimately liable must keep them indemnitas. The party liable in relief might have prevented unnecessary litigation by coming forward and taking his proper place. But I think this is a case for some equitable

LORD GIFFORD concurred.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and am disposed to rest on even more general grounds. The superior raised his action against the present pursuers in May 1877. According to the unanimous decision of this Court the pursuers had no interest in the subject-matter of that litigation. It was no affair of theirs whether the superior's claim was well-founded, or, if well-founded, exaggerated. The seller (the defender here) was bound to relieve them of everything the superior could justly demand, and therefore they had no interest in the question, though they might have to pay in the first instance whatever was due to the superior. But they were entitled to entire relief. They accordingly intimated to the party liable in relief that the superior's action had been brought. The answer was, "I have nothing to do with it; defend the action if you choose. I am in no respect liable." What could they do? Defend the action they must. If, in so defending the action, they had been guilty of any impropriety, it would have been another matter, but if they defended the action justifiably, the party bound to relieve them must keep them indemnified. Neither are we to try a party's conduct by very nice rules in such circumstances. The conduct of the litigation having been thus forced upon the present pursuers, there was nothing approaching to impropriety in their stating the plea that the superior had no right at all. In fact after they had stated that plea the point was only decided in the case of Lamont v. Rankine's Trustees, by a majority in this Division, Feb. 28, 1879, 6 R. 738, and one of the two Judges who formed the majority intimated that his opinion concurred with that of the dissenting Judge, though he held himself to be bound by previous decisions. That case was afterwards taken to the House of Lords, and the question was only finally settled in February of this year, 7 R., H. L. 10. It was a question also whether the previous cases were applicable. The exact point had never before been decided. The present pursuers being therefore, from the necessities of the case, put either to acquiesce in the superior's demand or defend the action, I think that it is in accordance with a vast amount of practice that the party ultimately liable is responsible for the whole amount of expense incurred, and that it is immaterial that they failed in their defence.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—"In terms of the unanimous opinions of the consulted Judges, recall the said interlocutor, and decern in terms of declaratory conclusion of the summons, and also decern against the defender as sole accepting trustee under the trust-disposition and settlement of the deceased Peter Brash, merchant, Leith, to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £824, 6s. 1d., being the amount of the casualty or composition paid by them to William Henry Revell Bedell Sivright of Southhouse, immediate superior of the lands particularly condescended on, which became due and exigible on the decease of the said Peter Brash, and also to make payment to the pursuers of the sum of £100, 3s. 6d., being the amount of the expenses found due by them to the superior in the action at his instance against them as taxed, with interest on the said two sums of £824, 6s. 1d. and £100, 3s. 6d. at the rate of five per centum per annum from the 8th day of July 1879 till payment: Remit the account of £133, 12s. 11d., No. of process, being the account of expenses incurred by the pursuers to their own agent in the said action at the superior's instance, to the Auditor for his taxation, and report: Find the pursuers also entitled to the expenses incurred by them in this process, and remit," &c.

Partnership—Joint adventure—Rights of co-adventurers where copartnership trade extended on its natural line.—One of three parties to a co-adventure in the purchase and working of a river steamer upon the Clyde purchased three years afterwards, upon the credit of the co-adventure, a second steamer for the same trade. Eleven years later, the position and relations of the co-adventurers having somewhat changed, a third steamer was bought by the same party, the price being paid by aid of a security over the first. In an action of accounting and payment by one of his co-adventurers against the purchaser the Court, in these and the other circumstances of the case, held that the presumption that the second steamer was partnership property had not been rebutted, but that as regarded the third there was no sufficient proof of joint ownership or partnership.

THIS was an action by James Davie, marine architect, Dumbarton, calling upon William Buchanan to produce an account of his intrusions as managing partner of certain steamers upon the Clyde, and for payment. 1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

In 1864 the pursuer, the defender, and a Mr Cook entered into an adventure for the building of a steamer to be named the "Eagle," and to be employed upon the river Clyde service. The pursuer held two eighths, the defender five eighths, and Cook one eighth shares. The defender was registered as sole owner of the vessel. The pursuer's share of the capital was £1962, 10s. An accounting took place between the pursuer and defender for the profits of the first two years, viz., 1864 and 1865, but there had been none since up to the time when this action was brought.

Other three steamers were afterwards bought or built by the defender, viz, (1) the "Rothsay Castle" in 1867, the price, viz., £3500, being paid by funds advanced by the British Linen Bank upon a mortgage for £3700 over the "Eagle," the promissory-notes of Davie and Cook being granted as collateral security; (2) the "Brodict Castle" in 1877, the price being paid by an advance upon a mortgage for £3000 over the "Eagle," dated 18th January 1875, that for £3700 having in the interval been discharged, and another having been granted over the "Rothsay Castle," which latter was discharged upon the sale of that vessel in 1879; and (3) the "Elaine" in 1879, subsequently to the sale of the "Rothsay Castle," the price being obtained upon bills granted by the defender and other parties. These three vessels were registered in the name of and managed by the defender.

The pursuer averred that these steamers had been purchased with the partnership funds, and for its behoof, and he claimed to have an interest in them.

It appeared that from the time that the "Eagle" began sailing in 1864 down to November 1871 the pursuer had resided in London. He then went to Italy. Previously to 1866 he had received several small advances from the defender, and in that year he obtained from him an advance of £1000, as he was desirous of commencing business in London. The defender accordingly discounted the pursuer's bill for £1000, the pursuer's acceptance for this sum being renewed from time to time until, on 31st December 1868, the defender paid up the whole sum. In respect of this and other payments the defender stated that, while willing to account to the pursuer for his intromissions in the "Eagle," the latter had ceased, as at that date, to have any share in the co-adventure. He stated, further, that thereafter the pursuer did not concern himself with the management of the "Eagle," and that, subsequently to his taking up residence in Italy in 1871, he had become bankrupt, and had compounded with his creditors.

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender having been managing partner with the pursuer in the joint adventure for the purchase and working of the said steamers, and having failed to account for his intromissions as such, decree ought to be granted in terms of the prayer of the petition.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's demands are barred by mora and taciturnity. (2) The defender having all along been willing to account to the pursuer for his intromissions in connection with any interest retained by the pursuer, if he any has, in the said steamer "Eagle," he should be assoilzied. (3) The pursuer having no interest in the other steamers referred to by him in his condescendence, the defender is not bound to count and reckon with him in connection therewith.

After a proof, the result of which sufficiently appears from the above narrative, and from the judgments which follow, the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) on 21st May 1880 pronounced an interlocutor, finding, inter alia, that "it is not proved that the pursuer has ever been paid out, or ceased to be a partner" of the adventure in the "Eagle": "Finds that in April 1867 the defender, with the knowledge and approval of the pursuer, and the said John Cook, bought the steamer 'Rothesay Castle' for £3500, and afterwards employed her in the same trade as consort to the 'Eagle': Finds that the whole price of the 'Rothesay Castle' was obtained from a bank on the security of a mortgage over the 'Eagle' and of promissory-notes granted by the pursuer and Cook: Finds that the defender has failed to rebut the presumption thus arising that the 'Rothesay Castle' was purchased and employed as partnership property, and as part of the joint adventure: Finds that the 'Eagle' is still held and employed in the same trade under the defender's management, and that the 'Rothesay Castle' was sold by the defender in 1879: Finds that the pursuer has failed to prove that he is a joint owner or partner of the defender in the steamers 'Brodict Castle' and 'Elaine,' and assoilzies the defender from the prayer of the petition, so far as it craves an accounting for the profits derived from these steamships, and decerns: In respect of the foregoing findings, ordains the defender, within eight days, to lodge a full account of his intromissions and receipts connected with the steamers 'Eagle' and 'Rothesay Castle' from the end of the period embraced in the statement No. 22 of process, all as craved."

The defender failed to lodge the accounts, and on 15th June 1880 decree was given against him for £10,000.

He then appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) It was conceded that the pursuer was entitled to a count and reckoning as regarded the "Eagle." As to the "Rothesay Castle" the defender was registered owner, and had alone managed her, rendering no accounts to any one. They had never been asked for. It did not follow because the copartnery funds were used to pay for her, that therefore she was copartnery pro-party.¹ So, too, with the other steamers. (2) The proof allowed by the Sheriff was incompetent. Trusts such as this was said to be could only be proved by writ or oath,² and it was not too late to take the objection.³ The Act 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 63, sec. 3, which was relied upon by the pursuer, allowed the enforcement of equitable rights, but did not interfere with the restriction of proof. (3) It was true that a partner could not take the company funds for extending the same line of business to his own profit. But here it was joint adventure for use of a particular vessel on a particular trade. When other vessels were got the same law did not apply as in copartnery.

Argued for the pursuer ;—(1) A partner could not use copartnery funds for his own behoof, as was attempted here.⁴ (2) The objection to the competency of the proof was too late, and even if that were not so, parties having an equitable right in ships might vindicate it in any way they pleased.⁵ The Act of 1696, cap. 25, did not therefore apply. (3) There was no distinction as to legal consequences between partnership and joint adventure. They were nowhere treated separately. No one of several joint adventurers, especially the managing partner, might take any exclusive benefit from an undertaking like the present.⁶ The defender proposed to enter the same field with the joint adventure for the purpose of carrying on a rivalry. To entitle him to succeed it must be shewn that the pursuer agreed to let him have the whole interest in the "Rothesay Castle," &c. Walton v. Butler was a very special case, which went beyond the ordinary rule of law, and did not apply here.

LORD SHAND.—In this action, which originated in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, the pursuer, James Davie, a marine architect in Dumbarton, demands an account of intromissions and receipts in connection with the purchase and working of certain steamers on the Clyde, from the defender, William Buchanan, who is a steamboat master in Glasgow. He claims an accounting not only in regard to the s.s. "Eagle," which was purchased in 1864, and is still running on the Clyde, but also in regard to other three steamers. The Sheriff-substitute has found that the defender is bound to furnish an account as regards the "Eagle" and "Rothesay Castle," but has assoilzied him in reference to the "Brodict Castle" and the "Elaine." Both parties have appealed to this Court,—Buchanan maintaining that although bound to account in regard to the "Eagle," he is not so bound with reference to the "Rothesay Castle;" the pursuer Davie, on the other hand, maintaining that he is entitled to an accounting not only in reference to the "Eagle," but also with regard to the "Rothesay Castle" and the "Brodict Castle," though it is now admitted that he has not established his case with regard to the "Elaine."

The parties are agreed that there was a partnership or joint adventure entered into between them in 1864 with regard to the s.s. "Eagle." In the previous year 1863 a steamer of the same name was purchased by a copartnery, including Buchanan and Davie, and sold shortly afterwards at a profit as a blockade-runner, but we have nothing to do with that vessel in this case. Following upon that, however, parties are agreed that in 1864 a new steamer was purchased, of which Buchanan held five-eighths, the pursuer Davie two-eighths, and a Mr Cook one-eighth, and that steamer is the present "Eagle." This steamer after running during the years 1864 and 1865 earned considerable profits, which were divided in the proportion just mentioned. So that with regard to the "Eagle" there is really now no question that the pursuer is entitled to the accounting he asks. It appears to have been maintained in the Court below that Davie's share of the "Eagle" had been paid out or reduced, and that his claim for an accounting was thereby extinguished. But I have no doubt that the view of the Sheriff-substitute on this point is sound, and that the pursuer is therefore still proprietor of that vessel to the extent of two-eighths. The questions in reality in dispute between the parties relate to the s.s. "Rothesay Castle" and "Brodict Castle."

It appears that in 1867, three years after the purchase of the "Eagle," the "Rothesay Castle" was purchased, and as the "Eagle" had been registered in the name of Buchanan, although representing himself and his co-owners, so the title to the "Rothesay Castle" was registered in the same name. She was placed for some time on the same station, and then removed to Ardrrossan, where she carried the traffic between that port and Arran till she was sold in 1879 by Captain Buchanan. The question is, whether for this period from the time of her purchase in 1867 to her sale in 1879 the pursuer Davie is entitled to an accounting for the profits earned, and the Sheriff-substitute has decided in his favour. It appears to me, after full consideration, that the Sheriff-substitute has arrived at a sound result. The considerations which have led me, without difficulty, to this conclusion are, that the purchase of the "Rothesay Castle" was made by Buchanan for the purpose of working her as a consort boat with the "Eagle," and that the mode in which the purchase was made, and the price of the vessel raised, shew that the purchase was a transaction for the copartnery firm. The price was paid by means of a series of acceptances between Buchanan, Davie, and Cook, the co-adventurers, and as a security to the bank for their advances in addition to the acceptances the s.s. "Eagle" was mortgaged to the bank as the property of the copartnery. These considerations, even if they stood alone, would probably be sufficient for the decision of the case in point of law. For if the managing partner of a business extends that business in its natural line, and uses the copartnery funds for the purpose of a purchase, or as security for the price of the purchase, and his co-adventurers assist him by bills or otherwise in raising the necessary funds, the conclusion appears to be irresistible that the subject purchased is the property of the copartnery business unless an arrangement to the contrary can be clearly shewn. But the case does not stand there, for the various communings between the parties all go to shew that as a matter of fact the vessel was purchased by arrangement between them for the purposes of the joint adventure. It is a circumstance of considerable importance that about six months before the purchase the parties were in communication with a firm of shipbuilders in Glasgow about the building of a vessel to be put on the station. It is proved by the evidence of Mr Wingate the ship-builder and of Davie himself, corroborated by their correspondence at the time, that as the trade furnished a profit, the parties had it in view to build a steamer for themselves, and communicated with Wingate for the purpose, and that these communings would have led to the building of a new steamer but for the fact of the "Rothesay Castle" being then in the market. We have in November 1866 two letters from Mr Wingate's firm to Davie in which reference is made to the new steamer. The first, on November 10th, says—"We enclose an outline tracing shewing how Captain Buchanan would like the boilers, &c. placed. You will observe the machinery space is very long. It is wanted so, and the coal bunkers kept as small as possible in order to keep the tonnage down." That shews that the steamer was one in which Buchanan and Davie were taking an interest. Again, on 16th November they write—"We expected Captain Buchanan would have written you about the new craft. He seems to think now that he would prefer her to be flush-deck forward, as she would be allowed to carry more passengers." Wingate says that she was to be a Clyde steamer, and I do not find that Davie contradicts this. The suggestion that she was intended for sale as a blockade-runner is excluded by the evidence. And when Captain Buchanan is asked, he says with candour that it is quite possible the buying of a new steamer may have been discussed between them, and this occurs in a part of his evidence immediately following upon the questions asked of him with reference to the "Rothesay Castle." The further circumstance ought not to be lost sight of, that at the time when the "Rothesay Castle" was about to be purchased we find Davie writing to Buchanan and giving it as his opinion that she must be worth £3500.

Now, what is there to be placed against that evidence? It is said the vessel was registered in the name of Buchanan alone. But that I think of no moment. The same was done in the case of the "Eagle," and it is quite usual that a vessel should be registered in the name of one partner for the benefit of the other proprietors. Cook, no doubt, depones there was no intention to purchase the "Rothesay Castle" for the joint adventure, but I have not much confidence in that evidence, if it means that there was no such intention at the time of the purchase. Cook was then in difficulties, and had been getting large advances from Captain Buchanan, in respect of which it was arranged, at a later date, that all joint adventure with him was at an end. When that arrangement was made we do not know, but I have a strong conviction that at the time of the purchase Cook understood he was to have an interest in the vessel as well as Buchanan and Davie. This is corroborated by a remarkable letter from Cook when he was first written to by Davie on the subject, in which he says—"Mr William Marshall is still in life, and at the time the 'Rothesay Castle' was bought, him and I knew well enough she was bought for the owners of the steamer 'Eagle,' namely, Buchanan, Cook, and Davie, but I could not say the amount of cash you put in or took out." When the question was first mooted he thus plainly says, that the purchase was made for the joint adventure, and I am not prepared to accept his evidence now to a contrary effect.

Again, it is said that Davie had nothing to do with the negotiations as to the purchase, these being made by Marshall, a stranger, who was brought in. All that Marshall says is, that he was asked to make the purchase on the best terms

he could, and the object of putting him forward as a stranger is quite evident. Then we have letters written by Davie after getting into pecuniary difficulties, and which I think the Sheriff-substitute correctly describes as not very creditable to him. He mentions his difficulties with his creditors, and speaks of concealing his interest in the copartnery estate. He says in one letter to Buchanan—"Don't admit to anybody that I have any share or interest in the 'Eagle,' and in fact say nothing—deny it to anyone." But it would be putting too much weight upon that letter to hold it as excluding the "Rothesay Castle," although the observation was made with some force that he does not there mention that vessel. The "Eagle" was the main subject of the adventure. That was the vessel which had brought the parties together, and as the principal subject it alone is mentioned. Besides, evidently before the parties were involved in any dispute about this matter, we find Davie writing to Captain Buchanan on 3d December 1877—"If anyone asks such questions again, tell them I have nothing to do with the steamers—you are only a friend of mine." There we have the word "steamers" used, implying that there were more than one, when the parties were not in any dispute, and the terms of that letter appear therefore to me very much to take away the effect of the previous one. It was said, again, that the mortgage of the "Eagle" is a circumstance of no consequence, and it appears to be quite true that at a later date when Davie wanted £1000 for his own use he desired Buchanan to use the security of that vessel to raise the money. But as she was mortgaged really for the price of a new vessel the inference seems irresistible that that vessel must be regarded as the property of the copartnery.

There remains the question as to the "Brodict Castle," in the profits of which the Sheriff-substitute has held that the pursuer has no right to share. The question is not free from difficulty, but I think the conclusion to which the Sheriff-substitute has come must be held correct. It must be observed that the "Brodict Castle" was purchased at a much later date—in fact eleven years afterwards. And it is important to bear in mind the position of parties in the interval. Davie had not only been drawing largely from Buchanan, but his circumstances were such that he was now irretrievably insolvent. It was desired to continue to keep up the bills which he had granted, but his name was then of no value in the market, and Captain Buchanan had to find new ones. We find Davie writing again and again that he is in hopeless bankruptcy, and trying to conceal the fact as well as his share in the copartnery from his creditors. It seems to me that it would be very strong to hold against the defender that in the new purchase of a steamer he was buying not only for himself but also for a man in such circumstances. Besides, by this time (1878) Cook had no more interest in the steamers, and it would be difficult to hold that where one co-adventurer was leaving, the other was buying for a new copartnery between Davie and himself in the absence of all communication between them. Then, in the third place, we have the facts of the purchase. There was not only no communing between the parties as in the case of the "Rothesay Castle," but there is an entire failure to shew that the funds required for the new purchase were furnished by the copartnery or on its credit. The only evidence on this point is in that part of the proof in which Buchanan explained the history of the mortgage on the "Eagle." He says that "was discharged in 1874," three years before the purchase of the "Brodict Castle." "I granted a new mortgage on her on 18th January 1875 for £3000 in favour of the British Linen Company Bank. It was that last mortgage that was security for the price of the 'Brodict Castle.'" The pursuer's argument comes to this, that because the bank happened to possess a general security which may be regarded as one of the circumstances that enabled the defender to purchase the "Brodict Castle," the pursuer is entitled to have an interest in the vessel. I think that circumstance is not sufficient, looking to the facts, to entitle us to sustain the claim, and on the whole, I agree with the result at which the Sheriff-substitute has arrived, and would therefore suggest to your Lordships to adhere to his judgment.

Davie v.
Buchanan.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—In this case there is no difference between the parties as to the liability of the defender to account for his intromissions with the proceeds of the "Eagle." The dispute is confined to the other steamers. I have carefully considered the evidence and arguments stated to us, and have no difficulty in coming to the same result as that at which the Sheriff-substitute and your Lordships have arrived with regard to the non-liability of the defender to account for the earnings of the "Brodict Castle," and the "Elaine." But I have had considerable difficulty in coming to the conclusion that there is evidence sufficient to instruct that the pursuer is entitled to an accounting for the "Rothesay Castle." I do not dispute, but concur, in the general doctrine laid down by the Sheriff-substitute when he says—"It is a reasonable and proper presumption that when a partnership or joint trade is once established, and the profits derived from it on the credit of the partners are made the means of extending that trade or starting a new enterprise of the same kind, the new enterprise or the extension of trade shall be held to be undertaken by the same partners and on the same terms and conditions as the original concern, unless the party denying it and claiming the exclusive benefit of it shall bring forward evidence to shew that he has the sole interest." The presumption is well-founded in law, and is laid down by Erskine, iii., 3, sec. 20. But there may be circumstances sufficient to displace the presumption, and there seems to me to be difficulty in holding that there are here no such circumstances, and that the pursuer became a partner in the "Rothesay Castle," because the price of that vessel was raised by a mortgage over the "Eagle," of which the pursuer and Mr Cook, as well as the defender, held a share. The defender's name alone appeared on the registry of the "Eagle," and if that vessel had been mortgaged to its full value, in order to pay for the "Rothesay Castle," and the latter vessel in that way paid for with the money of the whole of the partners, it would then be a question of the company's money. But the difficulty is that the £3500 raised on the "Eagle" was less than the value of the defender's share of that vessel, so that he was really applying his own money alone in the new purchase. Cook explains that he had no interest in the new vessel, but he, notwithstanding, signs the bills along with Davie for the purchase money, so that there is as much reason as regards Cook to hold him a shareholder as Davie, and yet Cook was undoubtedly not a partner in the "Rothesay Castle." These circumstances appear to me to raise considerable difficulty, and it is not without hesitation that I do not differ from your Lordships in the result you have arrived at in regard to that vessel.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of the same opinion. I will merely say with reference to the difficulty expressed by Lord Mure, that I proceed chiefly upon the ground that the "Rothesay Castle" was purchased on the credit of the copartners and the copartnery estate. It suits Cook now to say he had no interest in the "Rothsay Castle," but I am satisfied that he had originally an interest as well as Davie. The money for its purchase was procured partly by the assistance of the three partners, and partly by a mortgage over the "Eagle." It may be that £3500 was less than Buchanan's interest in the "Eagle," and if Buchanan had made the mortgage, not of the "Eagle" but of his share in her, there would have been force in the observation. But the "Eagle" itself, the entire vessel, was the subject of the mortgage, and the result is that the "Rothsay Castle" was purchased by the partners with money raised on their credit and belonging to the copartnery.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of 15th June 1880 pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute: Find that in the beginning of the year 1864 the pursuer and defender and John Cook entered into a joint adventure or partnership for the building or purchase and working of a river steamer called the 'Eagle,' trading between Glasgow and Rothsay, that the defender's share was five-eighths, the pursuer's two-eighths, and Cook's one-eighth, that the said ship was registered in name of the defender as owner, and that the defender was managing owner and master: Find that the defender has accounted with the pursuer for the earnings or profits of said joint adventure or partnership for the seasons of 1864 and 1865, as shewn by the statements Nos. 6/1 and 22 of process, but that no accounting has taken place between them for the subsequent years during which the defender has continued to manage the 'Eagle': Find that it has not been proved that the pursuer has ever been paid out or ceased to be partner of said adventure: Find that in April 1867 the defender, with the knowledge and approval of the said John Cook, bought the steamer 'Rothsay Castle' for £3500, and afterwards employed her in the same trade as consort to the 'Eagle': Find that the whole price of the 'Rothsay Castle' was obtained from a bank on the security of a mortgage over the 'Eagle,' and of promissory-notes granted by the pursuer and Cook: Find that the defender has failed to rebut the presumption thus arising, that the 'Rothsay Castle' was purchased and employed as partnership property, and as part of the joint adventure: Find that the 'Eagle' is still held and employed in the same trade under the defender's management, and that the 'Rothsay Castle,' which was sold by the defender in 1879, was partnership property, and was employed as such from the time of purchase till the date of sale: Find that the pursuer has failed to prove that he is a joint owner or partner of the defender in the steamers 'Brodict Castle' and 'Elaine,' and assoilzie the defender from the prayer of the petition so far as it craves an accounting for the profits derived from these steamships, and decern: Therefore adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 21st May 1880, except in so far as it ordains the defender to lodge an account within eight days from the date of the interlocutor: Find no expenses due to or by either party in this Court: Remit to the Sheriff to proceed further in the cause, and to dispose of the expenses in the inferior Court."

Lease—Verbal alteration—Proof—Acquiescence—Rei interventus.—In an action by a landlord for payment of £1500 as the half year's rent of a coalfield, under a written lease, of which upwards of twenty years were still to run (with certain breaks in favour of the tenant), the tenant alleged that with the view of enabling him to resist demands of workmen for an increase of wages, the landlord, who had the option of a royalty or a fixed rent, had verbally agreed to reduce the fixed rent by one-third, and that on the faith of this agreement he (the tenant) had resisted the demands of the workmen and shut up the colliery for two months. Held (diss. Lord Shand, rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) that as the tenant had merely averred a verbal agreement to alter the rent from £3000 to £2000, unsupported by any facts which necessarily implied acquiescence on the part of the landlord in an alteration of the lease, he was not entitled to probation.

Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company, H. of L., 3 Macq. 467, and Sutherland v. Montrose Shipbuilding Company, Feb. 3, 1860, 22 D. 665, commented upon.

ALEXANDER KIRKPATRICK of Allanshaw, Lanarkshire, raised this action against the Allanshaw Coal Company, his mineral tenants, for payment of £1500 as the half year's rent due to him at Whitsunday 1880 under a written lease, dated 24th December 1873, in favour of Alexander Simpson. The lease stipulated for £3000 per annum of fixed rent, or, in lieu of that, for certain lordships, in the option of the landlord. The lease was for thirty years from Martinmas 1873, with breaks in the tenant's favour in 1876 and at the end of each subsequent period of three years, upon six months' notice to the landlord. There was this provision as to the rent:—"With power, however, to the second party, in the event of the fixed rent paid for any one of the years of the lease exceeding the lordships at the rates foresaid upon the output raised and carried away during that year, to make up and retain the short or deficiency from the excess of the lordships over the fixed rent of the three years immediately succeeding the year or years in which any such short or deficiency may have occurred, but of those three years only, and to the extent of such excess." The Allanshaw Coal Company, of which Alexander Simpson was one of two partners, were now in right of that lease. The defenders alleged that subsequent to the lease an agreement had been made with their landlord for a reduction of the rent from £3000 to £2000 per annum.

They stated upon record,—(Stat. 1) "The working of the coalfield in question has, since the opening of the pit a few years ago, been carried on with great expedition, and during the three years ending Martinmas 1879 the lordships have exceeded in amount the stipulated fixed rent. The defenders, however, found themselves at a considerable disadvantage in dealing with the men in their employment in consequence of the fixed rent being so high. At various times prior to the month of October 1879 suggestions have been made and discussed by the pursuer and the defender" (i.e. Alexander Simpson) "as to a reduction of the fixed rent, but no final agreement was come to. In the months of September and October 1879 the miners in the Hamilton district; in which the coalfield in question is situated, maintained an agitation for an increase of wages. The defenders experienced great difficulty in dealing with this agitation, in consequence of being compelled to keep up a large output in order to meet the fixed rent, and were in fact prevented from taking up a firm position with the men in consequence of this necessity." (Stat. 2) "On a day about the end of October or beginning of November 1879 the pursuer called at the colliery and had a conversation with the defender Simpson on the subject of the disputes between the masters and the miners. The pursuer expressed wonder that the masters did not take up a stronger ground, to which the defender Simpson replied that he was surprised that the pursuer should so express himself, as he had done nothing towards reducing the fixed rent, and so had left it impossible to stop working. The pursuer then said that the defenders should not allow that to stand in the way, that he did not require the money, and had never intended taking more than the lordship on the coal actually put out. He added that he would lose nothing by such an arrangement, as the coal would still be there. At the pursuer's request a meeting was then arranged to take place in the office of Mr Robertson, C.E., Glasgow, at which the matter might be discussed and settled." (Stat. 3) "On 3d November 1879 the pursuer, in terms of the above arrangement, met the defender Simpson in Mr Robertson's office, there being also present at the meeting Mr Robertson, and the Rev. T. M. B. Paterson, a son-in-law of the pursuer. After an arrangement had been come to as to the rate at which small dross was to be charged, the pursuer brought up the subject of the fixed rent, and asked the defender Simpson if a reduction of £1000 per annum would satisfy him. The defender replied that it would, and asked the pursuer to give him a letter to that effect, so as to put the matter beyond dispute. The pursuer said that his word was quite sufficient, and that there was no need for any writing; but, on the suggestion of the Rev. Mr Paterson, he undertook to indorse the agreement on the back of the lease." (Stat. 4) "On 15th November 1879 Mr Mitchell, salesman to the defenders, called on the pursuer at Allanshaw with reference to the receipt for the lordship due at the term of Martinmas which had been sent him, and in course of their conversation the proposed indorsation of the agreement on the lease was mentioned. The pursuer then said that the arrangement was concluded, and there was no need to put it in writing, as the defenders had his word, and that he had also entered it in his private note-book, and mentioned it to his trustees, and especially to his son-in-law, Mr Paterson, so that there could be no dispute about it even in the event of his (the pursuer's) death. The defenders thereupon, having then full confidence in the pursuer's honour and integrity, considered the matter finally settled." . . . (Stat. 5) "Immediately after the conclusion of this agreement, and in reliance thereon, the defenders took up a decided position with their men, who were, in consequence, out on strike from the beginning of December 1879 till the end of January 1880. In acting in this manner the defenders had full reliance on the binding nature of the agreement come to with the pursuer. But for this reliance they would not have thought of entering upon the struggle with the men to the extent they did; there would have been no strike, and the output from the colliery would have been kept up to an amount sufficient to cover the fixed rent. In order to cover the original fixed rent of £3000 the annual output of coal from the colliery requires to be 80,000 tons; and since the opening of the colliery the defenders have been able to turn out very little more than that quantity. About five-eighths of the total output is turned out during the winter months, or from Martinmas to Whitsunday, in consequence of the demand for coal being much greater in winter than in summer. The stoppage of work during the winter months thus seriously affected the defenders' ability to turn out such a quantity of coal as would suffice to cover the fixed rent. The pursuer was well aware of the nature of the defenders' controversy with their workmen, and also knew that in refusing to accede to the terms demanded by their workmen, which resulted in the strike by them as abovementioned, they were acting in reliance on the said agreement come to with him. The pursuer's residence is situated within 400 or 500 yards of the defenders' colliery, and in sight thereof. During the time the strike lasted, and for some weeks before it began, the pursuer was in the habit of visiting the colliery almost daily, and was fully aware of the whole negotiations between the defenders and their men. The pursuer knew quite well that, but for the said agreement with him, the defenders would not have allowed their men to go out on strike, and he never suggested that they were in error in so acting, or that the agreement which had been made would not be fulfilled. While the strike lasted, work in the colliery was entirely suspended. Had the colliery been in operation during that time there would have been an additional output of coal for the year of at least 12,000 tons."

Kirkpatrick v.
Allanahaw
Coal Co.

Mr Kirkpatrick denied the alleged agreement, and declined to take £1000 as in full of the rent for the half year ending Whitsunday 1880.

The defenders, inter alia, pleaded;—(1) The pursuer is barred by the said agreement from insisting in payment of the full fixed rent stipulated in the said lease. (2) The said agreement, having been finally concluded and acted on by the parties, cannot now be resiled from by the pursuer.

The Lord Ordinary allowed both parties a proof of their averments, the defenders to lead in the proof.

Leave being given, the pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The defenders' averments could not be admitted to proof. The acts on which the plea of rei interventus was based were not "unequivocally referable" to the alleged verbal agreement. Neither did they result from it. Either of these alternatives was necessary to substantiate rei interventus following upon a verbal agreement.¹ It was said that, with the pursuer's consent, the defenders allowed their men to strike. That did not amount even to acquiescence, which must arise from a permission of conduct at variance with the terms of the written lease. But rei interventus was necessary here. It was properly a bar to locus penitentie, or a mode of perfecting a hitherto imperfect contract.² That was not the nature of this case. The case of Emslie v. Duff, 2d June, 1865, 3 Macph. 854, shewed what was necessary to set up a verbal agreement. That was not to be found here. Wark's case had been frequently explained. It was a case of acquiescence in acts at variance with the written contract, and therefore did not apply. The judgment of the House of Lords in Wark did not trench upon the reasoning of the Judges of the Court of Session as applied to verbal agreements. The effect of the defenders' contention was that the landlord must abandon one-third of his rent for twenty-four years; but there was nothing to that effect in the alleged agreement.

The other side seemed to rely upon a class of cases of which Johnston v. Grant, Feb. 28, 1844, 6 D. 875, was one, where it had been held that it was unnecessary to prove that the person against whom rei interventus was pleaded had knowledge of the thing done. But proof of such waiver as the defenders averred here was quite a different thing from proof of a new agreement.

The defenders argued;—Proof should be allowed. The averment of the agreement was quite distinct; it included the date, the parties, and the subject. The averment of rei interventus was relevant. It included acts done in performance of the agreement. There was an antecedent consent on the part of the pursuer, and there was no need of actual

Where these were to the prejudice of the one party, and to the benefit Kirkpatrick v. of the other, and both followed upon a verbal agreement, though neither Allanshaw might suffice when alone to found rei interventus, yet juncta juvant.² Coal Co. In the Church of England Life and Fire Assurance Company v. Wink and Others,³ the Judges dealt with the question of the necessity for knowledge that the act was being done. The case of Wark laid down general principles. In it there was a distinct averment of a verbal agreement and of acts inferring acquiescence following upon it. Lord Chelmsford pointed out there that where there was a verbal agreement set forth much less was necessary to constitute rei interventus than where it had to be presumed. *Baillie v. Fraser*⁴ and *Gibb v. Winning*⁵ were cases in which previous agreements were presumed.

At all events, this was a case of pactum liberationis or waiver. The original agreement was brought within narrower bounds.⁶ There was enough to constitute that, although there might not be enough to found a new agreement.

If proof were not allowed, it would tend to undue restriction in such cases.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action for payment of the sum of £1500, being the amount of a half year's rent due at Whitsunday last under a mineral lease entered into between the pursuer, the proprietor of the mineral subject, and the defender Simpson, the original tenant, the fixed rent under the lease being £3000, the half year's rent accordingly being £1500. The defence to the action is an averment that the pursuer consented to reduce the fixed rent from £3000 to £2000. The lease is dated 24th December 1873, and its currency is for thirty years from the term of Martinmas of that year, so that it does not expire till the year 1903. The subject let is coal and fire-clay, and the provisions with regard to the payment of rent and lordships are very precise and detailed. The tenant binds and obliges himself and his heirs, successors, and assignees, to pay "the sum of £3000 per annum of fixed rent for the coal and fire-clay hereby let, and that during the whole years of this lease (subject to the exemption afterwritten for the first three years of the lease), and proportionally for any part of a year, and whether the second party shall work the minerals or not." Then there is an option given to the landlord in lieu of the fixed rent to claim lordships at a certain specified rate, and a restriction, as to the first three years of the lease, of the fixed rent, as it is expressed, "declaring that no fixed rent shall be exigible for the first three years of this lease ending at Martinmas 1876, for which period the for-said lordships only shall be payable upon such minerals as shall be raised and carried away out of the said lands." And then there is a provision for the period over which the landlord is to exercise his option of having the fixed rent or the lordships. There are two other very important provisions in favour of the tenant. The one is that he is to be entitled to renounce the lease at the expiry of every term of three years. The provision is that the tenant shall have right to break and renounce the lease at the term of Martinmas in any one of the years 1876, 1879, 1882, and so on, being the whole triennial periods embraced within the currency of the lease. And there is this further provision also, that he, the tenant, shall have the power, "in the event of the fixed rent paid for any one of the years of the lease exceeding the lordships, at the rates foresaid, upon the output raised and carried away during that year, to make up and retain the short or deficiency from the excess of the lordships over the fixed rent of the three years immediately succeeding the year or years in which any such short or deficiency may have occurred, but of those three years only and to the extent of such excess."

Kirkpatrick v.
Allanahaw
Coal Co.

No one could read these clauses of the lease without seeing that they have been the subject of very deliberate negotiation and contract between the parties, and a great many events are foreseen and provided for. And it is needless to say that in a subject of this extent and value the amount of the fixed rent is a matter of the greatest possible moment to the landlord. If the minerals are not worked the rent is still payable, although it is within the power of the tenant to put an end to that condition of matters by renouncing the lease at the end of three years. But if the fixed rent exceeds the amount which would be payable as lordship, the landlord is to have the benefit. On the other hand, there is a very equitable power in favour of the tenant to enable him to make up a deficiency of one year out of the surplus or excess of the lordships over the fixed rent of the three years immediately succeeding. Altogether I do not remember to have seen a better considered lease, or one which contained more explicit terms defining the respective interests of the landlord and tenant.

Now, the defenders' averment is that this fixed rent of £3000 has been reduced to £2000, and this is said to have been done by a verbal agreement. It is necessary to attend to the precise averments made on this subject by the defenders. They say that during the three years ending Martinmas 1879 the lordships have exceeded in amount the stipulated fixed rent, but that at the same time they experienced considerable difficulty with their workmen in consequence of being compelled to keep up a large output in order to meet the fixed rent, and that consequently the latter had them very much in their power. Indeed, they were compelled to yield to the demands of the workmen to prevent their going out on strike, which would have resulted in a failure to raise the amount of mineral necessary to payment of the fixed rent. The defender Simpson is said to have stated this to the landlord, who answered that he would not allow that to stand in his way, and that he would be satisfied with the lordships. And then the defenders go on to state more particularly what passed at a certain interview between Simpson and the landlord on 3d November 1879. The pursuer met the defender Mr Simpson in the office of Mr Robertson, civil engineer, in Glasgow,—“there being also present at the meeting Mr Robertson and the Rev. T. M. B. Paterson, a son-in-law of the pursuer. After an arrangement had been come to as to the rate at which small dross was to be charged, the pursuer brought up the subject of the fixed rent, and asked the defender Simpson if a reduction of £1000 per annum would satisfy him. The defender replied that it would, and asked the pursuer to give him a letter to that effect, so as to put the matter beyond dispute. The pursuer said that his word was quite sufficient, and that there was no need for any writing, but on the suggestion of the Rev. Mr Paterson he undertook to indorse the agreement on the back of the lease." Then (Statement 4) "On 15th November 1879 Mr Mitchell, salesman to the defenders, called on the pursuer at Allanshaw with reference to the receipt for the lordship due at the term of Martinmas, which had been sent him, and in course of their conversation the proposed indorsation of the agreement on the lease was mentioned. The pursuer then said that the arrangement was concluded, and there was no need to put it in writing, as the defenders had his word, and that he had also entered it in his private note-book, and mentioned it to his trustees, and especially to his son-in-law, Mr Paterson, so that there could be no dispute about it even in the event of his (the pursuer's) death. The defenders thereupon, having then full confidence in the pursuer's honour and integrity, considered the matter finally settled." And the bargain was held to be concluded.

There is a good deal of vagueness about these statements, and it is not quite clear upon the record, as it stands, to what the defenders allege the pursuer actually agreed. They say he agreed to reduce the rent from £3000 to £2000. They do not say that that was to operate during the whole currency of the lease. But I understand from the defenders' argument that that is what they intend to say, and that they do in fact claim immunity to the extent of £1000 a-year from the obligations of the lease during the whole remaining currency thereof. Now, that is certainly a very strange subject for a verbal agreement, and the defenders themselves seem to be conscious of that, because they say they wished very much to have it in writing. If anything of the kind passed, it is entirely denied by the landlord. Nothing can be more foolish or absurd than to allow such an agreement to stand upon words without being reduced to writing. It must be observed that this is not the constitution of an original and independent agreement by parole, but it is an alteration of a written contract by a parole agreement. These two things stand on a somewhat different footing in regard to their legal aspect and effect. The rule in regard to parole agreements respecting heritage is that they are not of any effect unless they can be proved either by the writ or oath of the parties. But with regard to the variation of a formal written contract by words only, the rule is that that cannot be done—that a formal written contract cannot be varied or altered by words merely. That is the rule we have to apply in the present case. Now, that being so there can be no doubt that, in so far as regards the averments I have hitherto read, the rule is plainly applicable, and I am therefore clearly of opinion that the defender is not entitled to prove this verbal agreement pro ut de jure.

The defenders farther contend that they have averred acquiescence and rei interventus sufficient to entitle them to get into an investigation into the whole proceedings between the parties as to this alleged reduction of rent. Now, before reading this averment, just let us consider for a moment what the variation is which is said to have been made by this verbal agreement. It is a reduction of rent by one-third, an alteration of the rent clause of the lease to that extent operating in the future, during a period of twenty-four years, and therefore involving an interest of £24,000. The sort of acquiescence or rei interventus which one would expect to follow upon that is payment of the short rent by the tenants and acceptance of it by the landlord in such circumstances as to be plainly referable to an agreement to reduce the rent for the remaining years of the lease. Anything short of that, I apprehend, would not be that sort of acquiescence and rei interventus which is inconsistent with the rent clause of the lease and its obligations. One could easily understand that a landlord might accept a short payment of rent for one term, or for several terms, and that the acceptance of that short payment might be referable not to such an agreement as this, but to an agreement of a very different kind, to give the tenant a consideration for losses sustained by him temporarily owing to bad times and bad markets. Such things are perfectly well known in practice, and if these short payments were referable to that, they would not constitute acquiescence or rei interventus of such a kind as to vary or alter the obligations of the rent clause of the lease. Therefore it appears to me that this is a kind of parole agreement which it is very difficult to fortify by acquiescence and rei interventus, unless it can be shewn that what was done or implied was plainly referable to an agreement of this continuous character, which was to last for the whole remaining years of the lease.

Now, let us see what the averments are. The defenders say that "immediately after the conclusion of this agreement, and in reliance thereon, the defenders took up a decided position with their men, who were in consequence out on strike from the beginning of December 1879 till the end of January 1880. In acting in this manner the defenders had full reliance in the binding nature of the agreement come to with the pursuer. But for this reliance they would not have thought of entering upon the struggle with the men to the extent they did; there would have been no strike, and the output from the colliery would have been kept up to an amount sufficient to cover the fixed rent." Then, it is said, that "the pursuer was well aware of the nature of the defenders' controversy with their workmen, and also knew that in refusing to accede to the terms demanded by their workmen . . . they were acting in reliance on the said agreement come to with him." Then they mention that he resides near the colliery, and was aware of the negotiations between the defenders and their men, the pursuer knowing that, but for the agreement, "the defenders would not have allowed their men to go out on strike, and he never suggested that they were in error in so acting, or that the agreement which had been made would not be fulfilled."

Now, what do these averments amount to? Simply to a statement that relying upon the parole agreement, on which they were not entitled to rely, the defenders did something which they would not have done if they had not supposed that that parole agreement would be fulfilled. Is that sufficient as rei interventus or acquiescence in a case of this kind? They were dealing with their workmen, and they took a firm position with them, which they would not have done if they had thought that they would be required to put out 80,000 tons of coal from the mine so as to enable them to pay the £3000 of fixed rent. That may be so, and we must assume that it was so; and if there had been a separate and independent agreement between the parties, stipulating, on the one hand, that the defenders should insist upon the men working at certain rates, or otherwise allowing them to go out on strike, a stipulation advantageous not merely to the landlord (although primarily to the landlord) but to the tenant also, and containing, on the other hand, a stipulation for a reduction of the rent,—the one being a consideration for the other,—if that, I say, had been contained in a separate original agreement, there would have been great force in the contention. The tenant having performed his part of the agreement, the landlord would have been bound to perform his also, and that would have been rei interventus following upon a parole and informal agreement.

But that is not the nature of the present case. Here we have nothing but an alleged verbal variation of one of the most important clauses of a formal written contract, and the acquiescence or rei interventus which is necessary to fortify that must be something done which is inconsistent with the terms of the written contract. It is here that the point in this case arises which involves a question of law of the very greatest importance. I should have thought that there was not much doubt about it but for the very urgent arguments that were addressed to us upon the case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company, 3 Macq. 467, as decided in the House of Lords. And it is most important that there should be no misunderstanding as to what the effect of that judgment is. If it be what the defenders contend for, it introduces a very serious and a very startling innovation upon the law of Scotland. But I do not think it does so. I think it only affirms a principle that is perfectly consistent with the law of Scotland as it has been hitherto understood and interpreted in practice. There are, no doubt—it is impossible to withhold the observation, but I make it with all due respect for the noble and learned Lord to whom I refer—some loose expressions in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor (Chelmsford) in that case, which are capable of being twisted and misunderstood. But I think the true principle of the case is to be found in a single sentence of Lord Cranworth's opinion, and it is not in the least inconsistent with that given by Lord Chelmsford, who preceded him. He says:—"With regard to the general principle I should be very sorry to think there was any doctrine in the Scotch law which rendered it at all possible, uniting law and equity together, that if a person having what we should call here a legal right under a lease, authorises something to be done by his tenant in contravention of that lease, and it is done accordingly—I say I should be very sorry to think that, according to the law of Scotland, the tenant is still liable as for a breach of contract, having done that which his landlord authorised him to do."

Now, that is in a few words what was decided in the case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company. In that case the tenant was prohibited by his lease from working within a certain distance of a barrier which separated his coal-field from the neighbouring coalfield. But he did work nearer—in fact he worked through the barrier. That was a contravention of the lease, and he justified it by alleging that his landlord had consented to it verbally, or at any rate that the fact was within the knowledge of the landlord, who had seen him do it and had not objected to it—in short, that the contravention of the prohibition in the lease had been with the landlord's knowledge and assent. Now, I think, taking the case in that point of view, that the doctrine here laid down by Lord Cranworth is such as would commend itself to the mind of every lawyer. There cannot be a doubt that if the landlord, having right to insist upon a certain prohibition, consents to dispense with it or allows his tenant to do something inconsistent with it, and the tenant, with his knowledge and assent proceeds to do that, then the tenant cannot be sued as for a breach of contract. That appears to me to be all the length that this case goes.

The case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company was within a year after the judgment in the House of Lords brought under the notice of this Court, and its import and effect were very seriously considered in the case of Sutherland v. The Montrose Shipbuilding Company, before the Second Division. That was a case of contract for the building of a ship, in which the time of finishing the vessel was a material stipulation in the contract, and the time had been exceeded. The contractors averred that there was an agreement to prolong the time, that in consequence of that agreement they delayed and took certain steps which they would not otherwise have done. Now, that looks very like the averments in the present case, indeed it is very difficult to distinguish the averments there from those in the present case. The defence there failed, and the clause in the contract was given effect to in accordance with the case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company. In commenting upon Wark's case, Lord Cowan, who gave the leading opinion in Sutherland's case, says:—"The recent judgment in the House of Lords in Wark v. Bargaddie Coal Company recognises no more than this, that acts of acquiescence at variance with the terms of a written agreement may be the subject of parole proof." In that opinion Lords Wood and Benholme concurred, and in making some additional observations, I, being then in the chair of the Second Division, said:—"The rule of law as standing on that judgment I take to be that where there are averments of acquiescence in operations inconsistent with the terms of the written contract they may be admitted to proof."

After that judgment, I think it would be a strong measure to say that anything short of acquiescence or consent to variations inconsistent with the terms of a written contract would be sufficient, under the principle of the judgment of the House of Lords, to justify a tenant in refusing to fulfil the stipulations of his written contract. The same view has been taken of that judgment of the House of Lords in some subsequent cases. The expressions of opinion have been mainly obiter dicta, but they are evidence, and very important evidence, of the construction which has been put upon the judgment of the House of Lords by different members of this Court. I think it is the only true construction, and I may say that I do not see any good reason for extending the meaning and effect of the judgment of the House of Lords, even if I thought it was at variance with the principles of this Court, which I do not. It appears to me that when you once lay down the general rule, stated most emphatically by Lord Chelmsford in that case, that a clause of a written contract cannot be varied or altered by words only, that that means that the clause of the written contract can be varied by acts acquiesced in by the landlord, and by nothing else. In the present case I apprehend we have nothing of that kind. We have simply an averment of acts arising out of this verbal agreement or arrangement, an averment that the tenants at once did something which they otherwise would not have done, something which, even if the landlord was aware of it, was not in the slightest degree inconsistent with the rent clause of the lease. But what is it that they do? They quarrel with their workmen, and the manner in which they deal with them forces them out on strike. But that has nothing to do with the rent clause of the lease, and is not in the slightest degree referable to the rent clause of the lease. There is no inconsistency between the two, and the one is not referable on the face of it to the other, and therefore there is not that acting inconsistently with the written stipulation that is indispensable, I think, to entitle a party to a proof in circumstances like the present.

I am therefore for recalling the interlocutor by which a proof was allowed before answer, for I think there is no case which can competently be admitted to probation, and of course we shall decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

LORD DEAR.—There are two ways in which I might express my opinion applicable to this case. The one would be by going over the averments in the present case and the observations which were made in the House of Lords in the Bargaddie case, as your Lordship has done, and the other would be simply to express my concurrence in the detailed observations which have been made by your Lordship both on the averments in the present case, and on the views said to have fallen from the House of Lords in the Bargaddie case. I think the clearest, as well as the shortest, way in which I can express myself is to say that I entirely concur in both branches of the opinion which has now been delivered by your Lordship. We considered these matters very fully and anxiously in consultation on the case we are now deciding, and having done so I then concurred entirely in the views expressed by your Lordship. I do so still. I presume that I am one of the Judges to whom your Lordship has referred, who, in cases subsequent to the Bargaddie case, have expressed opinions on the general and important question not absolutely necessary for the decision of the case then in hand. If Gowans' Trustees v. Carstairs, in January 1862, be one of those cases, I can only say that, whether that opinion be regarded as, to some extent, obiter or not, I am clearly of opinion that the law so laid down was sound. I do not think, any more than your Lordship, that anything more was intended to be decided, or was decided in the Bargaddie case in the House of Lords, than that if the thing permitted by the landlord to be done, in direct contradiction to the written lease, has been actually done, the terms of the agreement under which it was done may be relevantly inquired into. In point of fact there is no doubt that such was the nature of that case; and it is generally and rightly to be presumed that, when Judges are dealing with a particular case, their opinions are to be construed very much with reference to the facts of that particular case, and that they are not speculating on and deciding some other case. All that has followed in the case of Walker and other cases, as your Lordship has observed, goes to shew that the Judges of this Court so understood it. As regards the alleged agreement in the present case to reduce the fixed rent, what is averred is of the most vague and indefinite description possible. The lease is for a considerable term of years, but I cannot make out whether it is meant to be said that the alleged reduction was to be for one year or for how many years. Then, what may be called the facts and circumstances by which that agreement is proposed to be supported are all averments of the most vague description. We could not anticipate that anything could come out of allowing a proof of these averments except endless confusion and contradiction on mere matters of opinion. Instead, however, of entering into any further particulars, I confine myself to the adoption of all the observations of your Lordship as to this part of the case, as well as the general law on the subject as on the details set forth in the record.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion, and in coming to that conclusion I do so on very much the same grounds as those which have been explained by your Lordship in the chair. In dealing with the case it is necessary to look to the special terms of the lease, and to refer to one or two passages in it. There is a power which the tenant has of renouncing every three years during the lease, and there is then a clause by which, if in any one year the lordships, calculated at the rates fixed in the lease, shall be less than the amount of the fixed rent, power is given to the tenant to equalise the payments by retention of the excess of lordship over the fixed rent during the three immediately succeeding years; so that if there is a strike in the colliery, or if from that or any other cause the colliery is stopped, and there is no output for a considerable period, the loss so sustained by the tenant is to be made good to him out of the excess, if any, of the lordships over the fixed rent in the three next ensuing years. No. 65.

Such being the terms of the lease, the ground of defence to the present action for rent is that there was a verbal agreement come to between the defenders and the pursuer when they were discussing the subject of the strikes that were going on in other collieries, by which the pursuer verbally agreed to abate £1000 a-year of the fixed rent under the lease for the period of twenty-four years that were to run. The averment, therefore, is that there was a verbal agreement to alter the rent fixed by a written lease from £3000 to £2000 a-year. That is an allegation of a total departure by the pursuer from one of the most important clauses in the lease. Now, the only way in which a verbal agreement of that sort could be set up as against a written contract, in the view I take of the law, is by an averment and proof of actings, and acquiescence on the part of the landlord to abate £1000 a-year of the fixed rent. But there is here no such averment. On the contrary, it is stated that when the defenders offered to pay the reduced rent it was at once rejected by the pursuer. If there had been an acceptance of the reduced rent for a certain period on the footing of an agreement to that effect, the question would then have arisen whether in the circumstances that would amount to such acquiescence or homologation by the pursuer of a verbal agreement to reduce the rent, as would bind him for the rest of the lease. It did not require the case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company to settle that question. It was, I think, settled in the law of Scotland before that decision, that in such circumstances the landlord would be bound, as will be seen on referring to the case of Baillie v. Fraser, 15 D. 747. In that case there was a series of acts and transactions between the landlord and tenant in regard to the rent payable under a lease, for which receipts had been granted, and entries in conformity with these receipts had been made in the rental-books of payments of rent at a reduced rate, and in a manner different from that fixed by the lease, and it was held that these amounted to such rei interventus as imported an alteration of the written lease in that respect, and it was held that the written lease was altered. But we have nothing of that kind here. The only substantial averment I can find is that the defenders state that, in consequence of the alleged agreement, they allowed their men to go out on strike for about six weeks in the end of 1879 and beginning of 1880, and that the pursuer was in the knowledge of that proceeding upon their part. There is, however, no express provision as to strikes in the lease, or about preventing the men from going out on strike. But allowing that there was something done as to strikes that might be construed as being at variance with the lease, what does the defenders' averment come to? Simply to this, that they sustained a loss by the want of output from the pit during the strike, which is just one of the things which the equalising clause was intended and calculated to meet. There is not, therefore, in the defenders' allegations, so far as I can see, anything said to have been done by them, and tolerated by the pursuer, which was unequivocally inconsistent with the terms of the lease. Now, that, I apprehend, is necessary to make a relevant case, and to bring this case within the ruling of the Bargaddie case. In that case the Lord Chancellor said that a written contract could not be altered "by words only." To do this, acts inconsistent with the written contract must, as I apprehend, be averred as having been done by the one party and sanctioned by the other in virtue of the alleged verbal agreement. Now, the strike is the only act mentioned, and that, in the view I take of it, is not an act inconsistent with the terms of the lease in question.

Kirkpatrick v.

The passage in Lord Cowan's opinion in the case of Sutherland, which your Lordship has read, clearly points to this, that the acts alleged and founded on must be at variance with the written contract, and in that I concur. In the Bargaddie case the variation or alteration of the written contract was complete. The landlord authorised the tenant to do something that was a direct contravention of the written lease, and it was done. The company were prohibited from working within a certain number of yards of their march, but it was alleged that they had worked through this barrier, and that their whole working was carried on by means of this encroachment; it was also alleged that the landlord was quite aware of this, and had verbally authorised it. It was, in these circumstances, held that, as these operations constituted a complete contravention and alteration of the written lease, and as the landlord was said to have acquiesced, the averments were relevant. But there are no similar averments here, and I have, therefore, no difficulty in agreeing with your Lordships that a proof ought not to have been allowed. And I have had the less hesitation in coming to this conclusion, as it is clear, on the defenders' own statements, that from the first they felt this matter to be one of great importance to them, and that the agreement ought not to be allowed to stand on mere words, but that it ought to be reduced to writing; for, as we see from the statements, they twice applied to the pursuer to have that done, and on each occasion it was refused.

Upon these grounds, I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be recalled, and that decree should be given for the sum sued for.

LORD SHAND.—The Lord Ordinary, by the interlocutor brought under review, has, before answer, allowed the parties a proof of their respective averments, his Lordship being of opinion either that proof of the facts alleged is competent, or that it is undesirable in a case of this kind to determine ab ante the abstract question of competency of proof of all the matters alleged, and that in any view the Court would be in a better position for determining the whole questions involved, including the admissibility of parole evidence to the full effect contended for by the defenders, when they have the best means of knowing the truth on all the material facts. It appears to me, with all deference to your Lordships, that the Lord Ordinary was right, and that it would have been better to have reserved the decision of the whole case until the result of the proof was seen, the order for proof being in terms which shew expressly that all questions as to the competency of evidence on particular matters was left open for consideration and determination.

In the view which your Lordships have taken, however, it has become necessary to form an opinion now as to the legal right of the defenders to the inquiry they ask, and my opinion on that question differs from that entertained by your Lordships. The case is of importance to the parties, but its chief interest arises from the important consequences of the principle or rule on which the judgment proceeds, a rule which must apply to many future cases; and I confess I am apprehensive of these consequences. In the state of the law of evidence as now settled, by which, through the examination of the parties themselves, and all others connected with them, the means of getting at the truth in disputed questions of fact is now so ample, I regret any decision which appears rather to narrow than extend and relax existing rules, and apart from the merits of the dispute in this particular case, I fear the decision to be pronounced will seriously diminish the salutary effect of the principles announced by the House of Lords in the case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company in 1859, reversing the decision of this Court. No. 65.

It humbly appears to me that the law laid down in that case substantially comes to this, that although the terms or stipulations of a written agreement cannot be waived or varied by words only—that is, by proof of a verbal agreement to that effect not reduced to writing or proved by the writ of party—yet if the verbal agreement be followed by rei interventus, consisting of acts of sufficient importance in pursuance of the verbal agreement or in reliance on it, an alteration or waiver of the original agreement will be effectual, and the verbal agreement and rei interventus may be proved by parole.

The case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company was one in which it was alleged the landlord verbally consented to waive a stipulation that a barrier of fifteen feet should be left unwrought all round the boundaries of the mineral field, and that the barrier was thereafter at various points broken through with his knowledge and acquiescence. The agreement and the acts of the tenant following on it were alike inconsistent with the stipulation of the original lease. Your Lordships, as I understand, are of opinion that the rule or principle of the decision is to be applied only where substantially the particular state of the facts averred is the same, as occurred in that case,—that is, where not only the parole agreement is inconsistent with or opposed to some stipulation of the lease, but the acts following on it are obviously also of the same nature. It seems to me that this is too narrow a view of the principles or rules established by that case; that it is not warranted by the terms of the opinions of the noble and learned Lords who decided it; and that if given effect to the benefit of the decision in declaring and defining the law will in a great measure be lost or restricted.

It would not serve any good purpose to go over in detail the expressions used in the opinions of the Lord Chancellor (Lord Chelmsford) and Lord Cranworth in delivering their judgments. Conceding that the case was one of the nature I have mentioned, it nevertheless appears to me that the decision was fully explained to rest on general principles, not limited to the special circumstances then before the Court, but of application generally to the case of a waiver or variation of a written contract followed by acts of sufficient importance, consequent on the parole agreement, that is, in pursuance or part performance, or on the faith of it. The Lord Chancellor, after referring to the two leading passages from Bell's Principles (secs. 26 and 945-6), on the important effects of actings proceeding on the faith of a verbal agreement or consent, observed (3 Macq., p. 480):—"Now, as I understand this passage, the acquiescence which will support and give validity to a previous parole agreement is something less than the facts and circumstances which will be required to enable you to presume an agreement. It is clear that with regard to the facts and circumstances from which the agreement is to be presumed there must be great costs incurred by the operations, something allowed to be done which manifestly cannot be undone, and under these circumstances the law will presume an agreement or conventional permission."

There is no suggestion in this or any other part of his Lordship's opinion that I can discover in which the limited view of the decision maintained in the defenders' argument is either expressed or indicated. It is nowhere said that the acts following on the parole agreement must be of a nature inconsistent with the original contract, or that the cost incurred or the act done, which manifestly cannot be undone, all proceeding on the faith of the verbal agreement, must be of this character. The same observation seems to me to apply with force to the observations of Lord Cranworth. The general case with which his Lordship deals in the passage following that read by your Lordship is that of a consent or previous consent given, which his Lordship says "taken by itself is nothing," unless as ancillary to some acting "which is to follow that consent." This expression, "some acting which is to follow that consent," in terms covers actings by way of part performance of the parole agreement, or on the faith of it, and is not limited to actings in themselves contradictory of a term of the agreement. Indeed, his Lordship's reference to the practice of the Court of Chancery in directing an issue to be tried where the question was whether there had been verbal consent followed by part performance with the effect of setting up even a new and independent agreement, appears to me to exclude the limited view of the judgment contended for by the defender, and to shew that his Lordship was referring to the verbal waiver or alteration of some term in a written contract followed by acts of sufficient importance on the faith of it. His Lordship seems to have had in view such a case as that of Nunn v. Fabian, which he afterwards decided on appeal in the Court of Chancery (L. R., 1 Ch. Appa. p. 35).

In regard to the cases which have occurred in this Court since the case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company, it is sufficient to say that the question here raised has not been decided in any one of them. In two of the cases, viz., Gowans v. Carstairs and Walker v. Flint, the question was not one as to the waiver or alteration of an existing agreement. The point in dispute was entirely whether a new and independent agreement affecting heritage was well constituted or not, and I find that throughout the opinions in both these cases a distinction is expressly drawn between such a case and one like the present. The Judges are careful to say that a different principle applies in the case where the evidence offered is to be used to set up a new agreement from that which holds in the case of an alteration of an existing written agreement. The observations which fell from the Judges in these cases in regard to the case of Wark were clearly obiter. The case of Sutherland v. The Montrose Shipbuilding Company is one, no doubt, of a different character, but it appears to me that the true ground of judgment in that case was that the proof led on the issue that the agreement had been waived or altered had entirely failed, and that although there are observations by the Judges on the question whether proof was admissible in the case at all, these do not contain the grounds of judgment. I do not think that a reference to the various opinions which have been delivered in which the case of Wark has been referred to in this Court lead to the conclusion that the Judges have taken at all the same view of the judgment in that case. I may illustrate what I mean by referring to the opinion of Lord Curriehill in the case of Gowans v. Carstairs, in which his Lordship's view of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Company is thus expressed (24 D. 1387)—"The case of Bargaddie was referred to as an authority, but in reality it is none, because the ground of decision there was in effect that the piece of ground upon which the operations complained of took place was not included in the lease at all. I am aware that there were dicta of the noble and learned Lords who addressed the House in that case, which taken abstractly may appear to countenance the doctrine for which the case was cited to us, but when the nature of the case is fully attended to, it will be found that they have no bearing on the question before us." And in the same case my learned brother, Lord Deas, seems to attach considerable importance to the circumstance that the alternative of referring the question to the oath of the landlord was not suggested. His Lordship says (p. 1389),—"The House of Lords held that if the restriction against working through the barrier had been dispensed with by the landlord's consent, the landlord could not require the tenant to restore the barrier, and claim damages for what had been done, and that the mode of proof of the alleged consent was not limited to the landlord's writ. The alternative of the landlord's oath, so far as we can see from the reports, was not suggested by the parties either in this Court or in the House of Lords, probably because the landlord was not prepared to deny the fact upon oath, and stood only on the legal necessity of writ." And on a reference to the opinions in the case of Gowans, it will also be seen that there is a considerable difference in the views taken by the Judges.

Holding the view that I do of the principles settled by the case of Wark, the next question is, what are the averments in the present case? The pursuer and defenders were respectively landlord and tenants of a mineral property. It is obviously for the interest of both parties, in order to the advantageous and successful working of the field, and in order that as large an output as possible may be got from it, that the tenant should not be compelled, owing to the effect of any stipulation in their lease, to yield, it may be, to most unreasonable demands on the part of their workmen. A large fixed rent compels the tenant in a mineral lease to put out a large quantity of minerals upon the very barest profits, indeed it may be without profit, if he can cover working expenses, and pay the rent. But if the tenant is in a position to resist demands by his workmen when they become unreasonable, by stopping the work for a time, he may thus in the end benefit both the landlord and himself. Keeping that in view, and that the landlord has always this security that no mineral can be removed without payment of the stipulated royalties, it is not an improbable or unnatural arrangement that a fixed rent should be relaxed in the interest of both parties if it be found to further the tenant in his dealings with his workmen. It is notorious that throughout Scotland there were many cases in which, during recent struggles which ended in prolonged strikes, fixed rents were relaxed, I do not say for the whole period of the lease, but for such periods as to enable the tenants to offer resistance to the demands of their men, which, it was said, could not possibly be acceded to without great loss in carrying on the business of mining. The statement made in the present case is that from the position of the tenants they were unable to resist the demands of the men, and on that being represented to the landlord, he agreed, in order to enable the tenants to resist the demands made on them for increased wages, to restrict the rent from £3000 to £2000 during, as I understand, the whole term of the lease. Then it is stated that immediately upon that having been arranged,—it being agreed that the fixed rent should be reduced from £3000 to £2000, the landlord having of course his lordships if they exceeded the reduced rent,—the tenants, with his knowledge and assent, resisted the demands of their men, with this result, that the men were either locked out or refused to work during two of the most profitable months of the year, and the output and sales for that period were thus entirely lost. These are the facts stated. If the truth of the case be as alleged, if it be true that there was such an agreement as this, and that the tenants, in the landlord's knowledge, acted on the faith of it, in the very direction which the agreement pointed at, and in the way in which it was expected and intended they would do, with the result of disabling themselves from turning out so much coal as would enable them to pay their rent, justice would seem to require that they should be allowed a proof of their averments and obtain relief if the facts alleged be proved. It is said that even if the agreement was made and acted on, as alleged, the defenders cannot be allowed a proof or obtain any remedy. I confess I feel the force of what your Lordship in the chair has pointed out as to the special nature of the averments in the case. I see difficulties in the way of the tenants making out their case upon a proof. The cause assigned for so important a change as an alteration of the fixed rent throughout the whole period of the lease is, as your Lordship has said, apparently inadequate, although it might be otherwise with reference to the rent of a particular year, or of any year in which strikes might occur. And, again, the acts which followed are not on the mere statement of them to be traced to such an agreement, but might have resulted from other reasons altogether. These are very important difficulties in the defenders' way in this proof. It would require, in such circumstances, very clear evidence to affect and vary a written agreement. The prima facie improbabilities of the defenders' case make it one of great difficulty in the proof. But though it may be difficult, that is no good reason for not allowing a proof if a relevant case be averred; and upon the grounds I have stated it does appear to me that the case is relevant, and that the proof asked is competent.

Your Lordships are of opinion that if the agreement alleged is inconsistent with the provisions of the lease, and the actings on the agreement are also inconsistent with the lease, the proof ought to be allowed. The agreement here undoubtedly is inconsistent with the lease. The actings which are alleged to have followed are not so. But the agreement, according to the pursuer's statement, was followed by actings of the very kind which it was intended by both parties to lead to, and this to the serious prejudice of the defenders, who acted on the faith of it. That being so, I ask why should they not be allowed a proof. The reason of the rule to which effect was given in the case of Wark v. The Bargaddie Coal Co. I take to be this, that where a verbal agreement to waive or alter a term of a written contract has been followed by acts to which it has naturally given rise on the part of one of the parties, and these acts must be to his serious prejudice if the other party should be permitted to repudiate the agreement because it was not committed to writing, justice requires that parole evidence of the agreement and actings should be admitted. It is not because the acts are inconsistent with the lease that the proof is admitted, but because the acts are the direct consequence of the parole agreement, that is, because the alleged variation does not rest on words only, but on an agreement constituted by words and made binding by important acts which cannot be undone, and which took place on the faith of it. With reference to the passage in Bell's Principles, in which the doctrine of rei interventus is mentioned—I mean section 26, in which it is thus described,—“Rei interventus raises a personal exception It is inferred from any proceedings not unimportant on the part of the obligee, known to and permitted by the obligor to take place on the faith of the contract as if it were perfect, provided they are unequivocally referable to the agreement, and productive of an alteration of circumstances, loss or inconvenience, though not irretrievable,”—the pursuer maintained that the alleged actings are not unequivocally referable to the agreement. It appears to me that that is a matter not to be determined by shutting out proof which will shew whether they are unequivocally referable to that agreement or not, but by admitting the proof, which alone will throw light on that subject. I do not understand Professor Bell in this passage of his Principles to lay down this, that the actings must be of such a kind as, apart from any evidence, to be clearly and unequivocally referable to the parole agreement or parole variation of a written agreement. And accordingly it appears to me that a proof here should be allowed for the purpose of shewing whether these actings were or were not unequivocally referable to the agreement alleged.

Kirkpatrick v.
Allanshaw
Coal Co.

It was very fairly put by Mr Asher in the argument, that if it be supposed that this agreement, instead of standing upon entirely verbal communications, had for its basis an informal improbative writing which would have been of no effect, but would simply be a record of what took place, the acts alleged might surely have been proved to have taken place on the faith of it. If an improbative writing passing between the parties had contained a statement that both the landlord and tenant were satisfied that in order to enable the tenant to resist the unreasonable demand of the men it was proper to reduce the rent, and accordingly it had been agreed to do so, the writing would have been of no value unless acted on, and unless the acts founded on were distinctly referable to the parole agreement. But suppose the tenant to have proceeded to act in the very way in which it was contemplated he should do, by immediately afterwards refusing to accede to the demands of his men, shutting them out and shutting up his colliery for a few months, could it be said that that was not an acting referable to the agreement? It could not be shewn without evidence. The fact of his having shut out his men a week or two afterwards might have been caused by other reasons not connected with the agreement; on the other hand, evidence might shew that his actings had reference to and were a direct consequence of the agreement, so that the case would come under the rule of rei interventus. A proof alone could clear up this question of fact. I think that is substantially the state of matters in this case, although there is no writing to which you can refer. If the parole agreement is proved, then the action of the defender would be a proper subject for proof, for he undertakes to shew that he resisted the demands of his men and shut up his colliery on the faith of it. We have an illustration of the same class of questions in the ordinary case that occurs of advances made by bankers and others on improbative documents. A person undertakes, by a writing which is of no value, until it is acted upon in some way, because it is not tested or is wanting in some of the solemnities required by law, to repay any advances that may be made on the faith of his undertaking. The banker proceeds, weeks or months it may be afterwards, to advance the money. The banker then brings an action for repayment, and says, I advanced the money on the faith of that document. Would it be an answer to say that these advances were not unequivocally referable to the agreement, that they might have been made on the credit of some other guarantee, or without a guarantee at all, and therefore a proof should not be allowed to clear up the question of fact? The answer would be, I undertake to prove that my actings in making the advances had reference solely to the agreement or undertaking, and that answer is conclusive. Accordingly proof in this class of cases has been allowed frequently. A direct authority on that point is to be found in the case of Johnston v. Grant, 6 D. 875, in which I think the general principle is correctly laid down, that if a man by an improbative writing undertakes an obligation of guarantee, and actings of the kind which he contemplated follow upon it, then the actings will validate the obligation or agreement. The principle of that case applies to the present to this extent, that it is a question to be determined on evidence whether acts are or are not distinctly referable to a previous parole agreement.

This case is one in which the agreement suggested by the defenders wants the feature of probability in its favour. But the rule now announced will, it appears to me, apply to cases where this is not so, and may result in great hardship and injustice. I can very well suppose a case in which a landlord residing close to the mineral field worked by his tenant, observing and knowing that his tenant is working at a disadvantage in not being able to resist the demands of his men for higher wages because he has to get a large output from the field to enable him to meet his fixed rent, agrees with his tenant that he shall be placed in a position to resist the men's demands, and that a reduction shall be made from the fixed rent for the year, or for each year in which a strike occurs. This agreement is not reduced to writing, but the tenant thereupon proceeds on the first occasion of a demand for an increase of wages to resist it, and shuts up his works. Thereafter the landlord, ignoring his agreement and the acts following on it, demands his fixed rent, and is met with the answer, You varied the settled terms of the lease, and with your knowledge I acted on the faith of this. Is proof in such a case to be disallowed, and all remedy refused because the acts are not in contradiction of the lease? I apprehend not; and in one view even of this case it might turn out that an agreement to this limited effect was made and acted on. Again, suppose that a landlord agrees with his tenant that he will make a reduction from his rent under a lease of several years' duration, if the tenant will make a large outlay in the way of building, draining, planting, or other permanent improvement. The tenant goes on to make the expenditure. The acts are not inconsistent with the lease, though the agreement alters one of its terms. According to the present decision it seems to me the tenant would be at the mercy of his landlord. If the view I take of the case of Wark be sound, a proof would be competent, and justice would be done. Take, again, such a case as that of Sutherland. A person undertakes to perform a contract of furnishing machinery or other articles by a date fixed. While in course of carrying out the work the other contracting party finds he cannot take delivery, and requests that the work be delayed, and in consequence the contractor, with his knowledge, dismisses his workmen and delays the work. It seems to follow from the decision to be now given that the variation by parole, followed by acts, however important, cannot be proved, because they are not directly inconsistent with the contract. The result would be to deprive the Court of the power to do justice, by allowing proof in circumstances in which it appears to me that proof is admissible. These are illustrations of the results of the view which your Lordships take of this case, and I feel constrained, for the reasons I have given, to differ from a judgment which would lead to such results.

The only other observation I have to make has reference to a point referred to by two of your Lordships. In this particular case there is a power of renunciation or break at the end of every three years of the lease in the tenant's option, a clause which is generally spoken of in this way, that it is a right "to make up shorts," so that when the fixed rent in any year exceeds the lordships the tenant is entitled to make up the shortcoming in future years. I do not understand your Lordships' judgment to proceed on these clauses. For my own part I think they have little, if any, bearing on the case, and the judgment would obviously be the same if they were both wanting. Upon the whole, I think the case is one in which we should have inquiry by proof before proceeding to deal with the merits of the case, and that parole evidence of the facts alleged is competent. No. 65.

Poor—Residential Settlement—Sailor—Poor-Law Act, 1845, 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, sec. 76.—A sailor maintained his wife and family for six months in partly furnished lodgings, and thereafter for four and a half years in a house rented by him as tenant in the same parish. When at home between voyages he resided with his wife and family. Held that he had acquired a settlement by five years' residence.

ANDREW WALLACE, inspector of poor of Govan Combination, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire to recover advances for behoof of an insane pauper, David Ross, against Thomas Highet, inspector of the poor of the parish of Muirkirk, the pauper's birth parish, and against Peter Beattie, inspector of poor of the Barony Parish, Glasgow, where the pauper was said to have acquired a residential settlement. 1st Division.
Lanarkshire.
C.

In a proof led in the Sheriff Court the following facts were established:—The pauper was born in Muirkirk in 1838. His occupation was that of a fireman on board steamboats. In April 1872 he went with his wife and family to lodge in the house of Mrs Devine, in Barony Parish. Mrs Devine deposed:—"I think they came to me in April. They would be with me from April to June of the following year. It was David Ross who took the lodgings with me. I can't say whether he was often at home while they stayed with me, but she got his money all the time he was away. Her husband was at home sometimes. From my house they removed to Clyde Street. They had no furniture in my house except bedding." After this, on 6th June 1873, the pauper took an unfurnished house as tenant in Clyde Street, Barony, and his wife and family resided in it for 4½ years, and then left the parish. In order to complete a five years' residential settlement in the sense of the 76th section of the Poor-Law Act it was necessary to reckon the last six months of the residence at Mrs Devine's lodgings.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray) found, inter alia, "that at Mrs Devine's they were practically subtenants of a room, for which they themselves provided bedding," and that the pauper had acquired a residential settlement in the Barony Parish, which was not lost at the date of chargeability.*

* "NOTE.—The point whether a sailor can acquire a residential settlement by holding as tenant a house of his own, in which he is only personally present at intervals between his voyages, was finally settled in the affirmative by the whole Court, only two dissenting, in the case of Greig v. Miles and Simpson, July 19,

Wallace v.
Beattie and Highet.

The inspector of Barony Parish appealed, and argued ;—During the time the family were in lodgings at Mrs Devine's they were in a state of migration, and had no fixed home, and could not be acquiring a settlement.¹

LORD DEAS.—I do not think it is necessary to say anything in this case except that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is perfectly right, both on the facts and on the law. The case of Greig v. Miles has been followed by other cases decided on similar principles ; for instance, Moncrieff v. Ross, Jan. 5, 1869, 7 Macph. 331. Your Lordship in the chair at one time dissented in that class of cases, but latterly I understand it to have been conceded that the law must be regarded as now settled in accordance with them.

LORD MURE.—I think that the Sheriff-substitute has taken a correct view of the evidence in this case. There is no difficulty as to the four years and a-half when the parties lived in Clyde Street. But the important question is, whether during the half year which preceded their residence in Clyde Street there was such a residence at Mrs Devine's as can be computed in reckoning the five years continuous residence in the Barony Parish. Now, that depends mainly on the evidence given by Mrs Devine, and according to that evidence the pauper came with his wife and family, and took lodgings for them in her house in April 1872, before he went to sea. Her account is distinct to the effect that the lodgings were taken by the husband, that he came and stayed there with his family on several occasions when he was at home, and that his wife drew his money when he was away. In these circumstances, I think the Sheriff-substitute is right in holding that when the pauper so placed his wife and family in lodgings, and left them to reside there for about a year, he made these lodgings their home during the time he was absent, and that their residence may be counted as his residence in a question of settlement, according to the rules laid down in various decisions.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and I think the case a very clear one. There is no dispute about the residence for the last four and a-half years, but it was maintained that for six months previous the residence had not been established. I think it is proved that it was the husband who took the lodgings in Devine's house where he placed his wife and family. But I do not think that of consequence, because if the wife took the lodgings and the husband 1867, 5 Macph. 1132. But the present case offers certain differences from that of Greig, which fall to be considered.

"But a nicer question remains. If David Ross acquired a residence settlement in Barony it must be by counting, along with the above four and a-half years, part of the time that he and his family held lodgings at Mrs Devine's. Now, it has never yet apparently been held that a sailor can acquire a settlement by taking lodgings. That point has never arisen. In the only decided cases he was tenant of a house.

"But as regards Mrs Devine's, these lodgings were actually taken by David Ross for himself and his family. Farther, it was more than a case of mere lodgings, it was practically a sublet of a room, for which the Ross's themselves supplied bedding. Altogether the habitancy there had a more permanent character, and being initiated and maintained by David Ross himself, the Sheriff-substitute thinks that on the whole, though undoubtedly the question is a narrow one, it must be dealt with on the same footing as if David Ross had been a regular tenant there."

adopted her act the legal effect would be the same, and there can be no doubt that he did adopt her act. He placed his wife and family in the lodgings, he paid for their maintenance there, and he made it their home and his own on the occasions when he returned between April 1872 and June 1873. The real test in questions of this kind is, where is the person's home? I have no doubt that the pauper's home and that of his family was Mrs Devine's house, and that the family residence there must be taken into account in calculating the five years residence necessary for the acquisition of a settlement.

Landlord and Tenant—Bankruptcy—Claim for rent against sequestrated bankrupt.—When the tenant of an urban subject has been sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Act the landlord has a claim in the sequestration for the current year's rent, but no claim against the bankrupt, even although he may have been allowed to remain in possession from the date of sequestration to the end of the year.

THIS was an action by Duncan Fraser, Blantyre, with consent of John Watson of Earnock, against John Robertson, Hamilton, concluding for payment of £27, 13s. 4d.

1st DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "For several years the defender has been tenant of the dwelling-house in Clydesdale Street, Hamilton, presently occupied by him, and belonging to John Watson, Esq. of Earnock, at the yearly rent of £42 sterling. The estates of the defender were sequestrated on 21st October 1879, and since then he has occupied, and continues to occupy, the said dwelling-house, and the proportion of said yearly rent of £42 for the period from 21st October 1879 to 21st May 1880 amounts to £24, 10s. sterling." (Cond. 3) "The pursuer has paid to the landlord of the said dwelling-house the rent due to him by the defender for the same, and has acquired the landlord's whole right and interest in and to the said rent, and his claim against the defender for payment thereof. The pursuer has also been under the necessity of paying the taxes applicable to the said period, and payable by the defender, conform to account thereof herewith produced and held as repeated herein brevitatis causa, amounting to £3, 3s. 4d. The said sums of £24, 10s. and £3, 3s. 4d. amount together to the sum of £27, 13s. 4d. sterling, being the sum for which decree is craved in the petition."

The defender admitted the first article, and in answer to the second article stated:—"Denied, and explained that defender was allowed by his trustee to remain in the said house."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) No relevant defence having been stated, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved. (2) The defender being indebted in the rent condescended on, and the pursuer having paid the same; and acquired the landlord's whole rights thereto, the defender is bound to make payment thereof to the pursuer. (3) The pursuer having, on behalf of the defender, paid the taxes condescended on, he is entitled to repayment thereof from the defender.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The defender is not responsible to pursuer for the debt now sued for, it having been incurred by him prior to the date of his sequestration. (2) Any claim for rent should be directed against the trustee on defender's estate, in terms of the Bankruptcy Statutes, and the defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences as irrelevant, and, under reference to note, decerns as craved: Finds defender liable in expenses," &c.*

On appeal, the Sheriff (Clark) adhered.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The pursuer had not set out any title to the house, or shewn any right to demand payment of rent. Besides, the bankrupt could not be liable for payment of the rent, as that was an obligation undertaken before his sequestration on 21st October 1879, and the claim for payment of the whole year's rent lay against the trustee in bankruptcy.¹ There was no ground for the Sheriff's judgment, as all the material facts were denied by the defender, and had not been proved.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer, having paid the rent, was entitled to recover it, and he made his title to sue good, by having obtained the concurrence of the landlord. The bankrupt having occupied the house after sequestration was personally liable for the rent. The defender having admitted that he occupied the house there was no need for any proof. Bankruptcy did not put an end to a lease, but merely entitled the landlord to turn out the tenant, or, if he allowed him to remain, to come against him for the rent of the period subsequent to the sequestration. The tenant, having occupied the house after bankruptcy, was liable for the rent.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is almost an idle thing to talk of the facts in this case, for nothing has been proved, and scarcely anything is averred. If it were not an affair of about £27 I should be much inclined to order the record to be amended to enable us to know the facts to which we were asked to apply the law; but I am unwilling to occasion additional expense in so trifling a case, and we must therefore endeavour to extricate the matter as it stands.

There is no objection on record to the pursuer's title to sue. The action is brought by a Mr Fraser, with concurrence of the landlord of the house occupied by the defender; and he, bringing the landlord with him, avers that he has paid the rent for a certain portion of the year from Whitsunday 1879 to Whitsunday 1880, and has acquired all the landlord's rights in respect thereof. The part of the rent so paid is that applicable to the period from 21st October 1879

* "NOTE.—It is not disputed that the defender was sequestered in October 1879. The rent claimed is the rent of the house occupied by defender since that period. Defender's agent seems to imagine that the sequestration bars decree. I know of no authority for this contention. It seems to me that pursuer is entitled to decree against the defender, even although he is an undischarged bankrupt, for the rent applicable to the period of occupation subsequent to bankruptcy."

to 21st May 1880. That is not rent for a term, but for a fraction of a year, and the reason why the pursuer's claim is thus limited is that 21st October 1879 is the date of the defender's sequestration, and 21st May 1880 is the date when the defender gave up possession of the house. The Sheriff-substitute says the rent claimed is the rent of the house occupied by the defender since his sequestration; and he thinks the pursuer is entitled to decree, though the defender is an undischarged bankrupt, for the rent applicable to the period of occupation subsequent to the bankruptcy. Now, in the first place, this is a very curious obligation for a fractional part of the year's rent, which year's rent is payable at two half-yearly terms by equal portions, and I do not understand exactly the ground on which the Sheriff-substitute thinks the claim should be made good against the bankrupt, for the year's rent is payable in respect of his possession of the house from a period beginning prior to his bankruptcy, and it would not be a good claim unless it were for a debt contracted subsequent to that event. But there is no doubt that the debt was contracted prior to the sequestration. Whether the tenure was for a term of years or from year to year we are not told; that, like everything else in this case, is in a state of obscurity; but whether it was for the one or the other, the debt was contracted at the beginning of the year's occupancy, i.e., at Whitsunday 1879. That debt was payable half at the Martinmas following and half at the Whitsunday after that, but it was all contracted at Whitsunday 1879, and therefore this was a debt of the bankrupt contracted prior to his bankruptcy, and so his discharge will remove all liability in respect of that debt, by the creditor having got a composition in respect of it, or a dividend in the sequestration. How in the face of this the landlord can make him liable for a part of the time I fail to see. Mr Dickson ingeniously argued that although that may be the nature of the debt yet the occurrence of the bankruptcy introduced an element entitling the landlord to turn out the tenant or to come against him personally for the rent applicable to the period subsequent to sequestration, on the ground that the lease was practically ended and the bankrupt had come under a new arrangement in consequence of his bankruptcy. I do not see how this can be. Bankruptcy does not bring a lease to an end. If the tenant has an existing lease it belongs to his trustee, unless there is an express exclusion of assignees, legal and voluntary. This is the case of an ordinary urban subject, and whether the trustee here chose to take up the lease or not does not appear, but the bankrupt continued in possession of the house. Would he not be entitled under his lease, which began before bankruptcy, to continue in possession of it on condition of paying his rent and the other prestations exigible? I think he clearly would be, and the words of Professor Bell on this matter are well worth quoting. He says (1 Comm. 76, M'Laren's ed.)—"Bankruptcy does not of itself annul a lease. The tenant, though bankrupt, may still continue in the possession, provided he pay the rent regularly, and perform the other stipulations of the contract. All the landlord is entitled to do in case of his tenant's failure to pay the rent is to have recourse to the hypothec and the proceedings prescribed in the Act of Sederunt 1756." That is to say, the right to the lease, not being taken up by the trustee, remains in the bankrupt; he remains as tenant, and the landlord has the ordinary remedies at common law and under the Act of Sederunt. He may use his right of hypothec, or raise an action for his rent, or remove the tenant if he is in arrear with his rent, but nothing else. Now, what is the state of matters here? If the rent for the current year was a debt contracted before bankruptcy and sequestration, then it cannot be claimed against the bankrupt, but can only be made available by a claim in his sequestration. For future rents, of course, the bankrupt will be liable. But as regards every part of the rent for the period from Whitsunday 1879 to Whitsunday 1880 the landlord has no claim against the bankrupt tenant, for it was a debt contracted prior to his sequestration. On these grounds I am for sustaining this appeal, and dismissing the action.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. On this record I think it is clear that the judgments appealed against cannot stand. These judgments repel as irrelevant a defence which amounts simply to a denial that the debt is due. The few facts stated by the pursuer are denied. There has been no proof, and ex facie of the averments the claim ought to have been made against the trustee on the sequestrated estate, because the debt was contracted before the date of the sequestration. In these circumstances, and in the absence of any more special averment or explanation, I see no ground on which the pursuer can ask decree against the defender on this record.

If the amount sued for had been large I might have been disposed to allow the record to be opened up, in order to give the pursuer an opportunity of shewing that there are specialities in the case which are sufficient to give him a claim against the defender. But the amount involved is so small I do not think we should now be justified in allowing the pursuer to amend. The proper course is to dismiss the action.

LORD SHAND.—I agree in your Lordships' observations with regard to the record in this case. It is important to observe that the claim made is for the rent due for part of the year which was current when the sequestration occurred, for I think a different principle might and would have applied if the circumstances had been different, and the rent claimed had been for a period beginning subsequent to sequestration. In that case there might have been room for holding that the fact of the bankrupt remaining as tenant implied a personal contract for payment of the rent. Keeping this distinction in view, it is to be observed, in the first place, that it is admitted that what is here asked is not merely decree of constitution, and, in the second place, that there is no averment of any special agreement as to this period; it is not said that any new bargain was made between the parties under which this rent is now sued for. Now, I think in a case of this sort, when the subject is an ordinary urban one, when during the currency of the year's rent the tenant's bankruptcy occurs, and the trustee refuses to take up the lease, and the bankrupt stays on in the house, his obligation is for the year's rent, and that obligation was undertaken before the year began to run. There is no other contract in the matter. It was argued that the law will rear up the implied obligation, but I cannot think that is so. It is said the landlord might have brought an action of ejectment against the tenant. I doubt if such an action would have lain—I think it would not; at all events after the second half year had begun to run. The answer to it would have been—"I have got the occupancy of this house for a year under my obligation to pay the year's rent; that is a good obligation against my estate, and if my trustee does not take it up I shall continue to occupy as tenant." The case here is simply one where the bankrupt remains under an obligation for rent contracted before the year began, and I think his possession is to be attributed to that obligation which is good as against his estate, and not to any new or implied one.

In 1879 the Coltness Iron Co. appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session against a decision of the Property and Income-Tax Commissioners of Lanarkshire, disallowing a deduction from assessable income claimed by the company of the sum of £9027, being the cost incurred in sinking new pits. The Commissioners found that in computing the profits for assessment of income-tax the company, who were tenants of certain mineral fields, were not entitled to make deductions from their yearly profits of sums necessary to replace capital expended in sinking pits, either under the Income-Tax Act, 5 and 6 Vict. c. 35, sec. 100, rule 3, and sec. 159, or under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 41 Vict. c. 15, sec. 12. The facts on which the Commissioners proceeded are fully set forth in the report of the appeal to the Court of Session, ante, vol. vi., p. 617.

Exchequer Cause.
1ST DIVISION.
S.

On 6th February 1879 the Court of Session affirmed the determination of the Commissioners, and the Coltness Company then appealed to the House of Lords.

After hearing counsel for the parties their Lordships, on 1st August 1879, remitted the case to the Court of Session for amendment, on the ground that the statement of facts was insufficient.

On 10th March 1880 the appellants, in terms of this order, presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session praying the Court "to remit the case to the Commissioners, in order to the same being amended by adding thereto, in form of schedules or otherwise,—(1) statement of the amount expended by the company in sinking pits, and charged to capital account, from 30th June 1858 to 30th June 1878; (2) statement of pits exhausted from 30th June 1858 to 30th June 1878, shewing the total cost in sinking the pits, the depth of them, and the length of time they were in operation; (3) statement of the amount expended on pit-sinking, and charged to capital account, from January 1872 till 30th June 1878, giving the depth of each pit; (4) list of pits exhausted from January 1872 to 30th January 1878, giving the depth of each pit, when the sinking of the pit commenced, when each pit was exhausted, and the cost of sinking each pit; (5) list of pits at present working, giving the depth of each pit, when the sinking of each pit commenced, and when the output commenced, and the expense of sinking each pit; also by adding a statement as to the schedules and rules of the schedules of the Income-Tax Acts on which the assessment of the duty was made on the appellants; also by adding a statement explaining how the sum of £9027, claimed as a deduction from the assessment by the appellants is arrived at."

The Court remitted to the Commissioners "with instructions to them to amend the case in terms of the prayer of the petition."

The amended case set forth, inter alia,—"The sum of £9027 claimed as a deduction from the assessment by the appellants does not represent the cost of pit-sinking during the year, but is a sum arrived at by calculating two shillings a-ton on iron made, and a penny halfpenny a-ton on coal sold during the year, it being estimated that this will properly represent the amount of capital expended on making bores and sinking pits which has been exhausted by the year's working. The cost of making bores and sinking pits is charged in the books of the company to an account called 'Sunk Capital Account,' and is written off annually by a sum computed at the respective rates above specified, on the quantities of iron made and coal sold in the year, as representing the capital expended on pit-sinking exhausted by the year's working. The working charges deducted and allowed in ascertaining the profits for assessment include the whole cost of getting and raising the minerals after the pits are sunk, and of manufacturing the metal and selling the iron and coal, and the general expenses of the concern."

The statement of additional facts may be summarised as follows:—(1) Sums annually expended by the company in sinking pits, and charged to capital account, from 30th June 1858 to 30th June 1878, varying from £2000 to £22,000, amounting together to £165,825, 3s. 6d. This included ventilation-pits and pits for pumping water, as well as the expense of boring for mineral. There was thus an average annual expenditure of about £8500. (2) The cost of sinking pits which had become exhausted during the same period was £102,678, 6s. 10d., being an annual average of about £5000, varying from £639, 4s. 4d., being the lowest, to £11,234, 15s. 1d., being the highest expenditure in any one year. The depth of these pits varied from about 9 fathoms to 114 fathoms, and their endurance in operation varied from one year to twenty-one. (3) Taking a shorter period of time, from January 1872 to June 1878 the total cost of sinking pits was £71,964, 10s. 2d., or an average annual expenditure of about £11,000. This included air-pits and boring. (4) During the same period nineteen pits became exhausted. These pits had cost on an average £2300 each, in all £44,013, 13s. 1d. These pits lasted on an average nine and a half years each. (5) The pits at present working (June 1878) were forty-three in number, and cost in all £97,537, 7s. 1d., or an average of about £2250 each pit. The earliest was sunk in 1849, the latest in 1876.

The company in the original case had contended that "the sinking of the pits was expenditure in winning the minerals, and not, as the surveyor stated, an investment of capital." This contention they now abandoned, and admitted that the sum claimed as a proper deduction to be made from profits "represents the amount of capital expended on pits and exhausted by the year's working."

At advising the judgment of the Court was given by the LORD PRESIDENT.—In the case originally presented to the Court on the 28th of January 1879 by the Coltress Iron Company against the determination of the Commissioners of Income-Tax for the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, they maintained that, from the amount of the profits of their business for the year ending 5th April 1878, as assessed to the income-tax, there ought to have been deducted a sum of £9027, being the cost incurred by them in sinking new pits. No. 68.

The case stated, as matter of fact, that for a number of years the appellants have "carried on business as coal and iron-masters, and have opened up several mineral fields, sinking new pits, at their own expense, from time to time as the old ones have become exhausted; . . . that when a mineral field is wrought out the pits on it become useless to them, and they receive no compensation from the landlord or any one else in respect of them; and that they have no means of compensating themselves for the loss of those pits, other than out of the gross annual returns derived from the minerals worked from them."

Jan. 7, 1881.
Coltneess Iron
Co. v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

Upon these facts, "the appellants maintained that there could be no profits till the expenditure of sinking was repaid, any more than there could be profits before the wages of the miners in working the minerals were repaid; that, in fact, the sinking of the pits was expenditure in winning the minerals, and not an investment of capital; that in the case of wages expended in sinking there is nothing to represent capital, and the money so expended cannot be an investment, because it can never be recovered."

On these statements and this contention the Court gave judgment on the 6th of February 1879, holding that the case thus presented to them did not in principle differ from the case of the tenant of a mineral field sinking one pit, and one only, and proceeding by means of that pit to work out the whole minerals let to him. They therefore affirmed the determination of the Commissioners, and refused the proposed reduction, on the grounds stated in the judgment and on the authority of the earlier case of Addie v. The Solicitor of Inland Revenue (Feb. 16, 1875, ante, vol. ii., p. 431), in which it was expressly decided that the cost of sinking a pit and carrying on the business of mining is an expenditure of capital, and cannot be taken into account in assessing the profits of the business to income-tax.

The Coltneess Company appealed to the House of Lords, and it appears that in the course of the appellants' argument at the bar facts and considerations were advanced and urged, which were not stated or suggested in the case on which the Court gave judgment. On the conclusion of the argument, the House of Lords "being of opinion that the statement of facts contained in the case submitted to the Court of Session on this matter is not sufficiently full to enable this House finally to dispose of the points of law on which its decision is asked," was pleased to remit the case to this Court in order that it might be amended, "pursuant to the power conferred for that purpose by the Act of Parliament of the 37th and 38th years of Her present Majesty, chap. 16, and that an adjudication be had on such amended case, and reported to this House."

The case has been amended accordingly, and the Court having heard a full argument from counsel now proceed to give their judgment, in compliance with the order of the House.

The amended case contains the following new and important statements in addition to certain details as to pit-sinking, which will be immediately noticed:—"First, The working charges deducted and allowed in ascertaining the profits for assessment include the whole cost of getting and raising the minerals, after the pits are sunk, and of manufacturing the metal and selling the iron and coal, and the general expenses of the concern. Secondly, The sum of £9027, claimed as a deduction from the assessment, does not represent the cost of pit-sinking during the year, but is a sum arrived at by calculating 2s. per ton on iron made, and 1½d. per ton on coal sold during the year, it being estimated that this will properly represent the amount of capital expended in making bores and sinking pits which have been exhausted by the year's working."

It will be observed that while in the original case the deduction asked by the appellants was in respect of "the cost incurred by them in sinking new pits," and it was contended "that in fact the sinking of the pits was expenditure in winning the minerals, and not, as the surveyor stated, an investment of capital," the appellants no longer maintain that the deduction claimed does not represent capital invested or expended in carrying on the business of the company. On the contrary, it is now distinctly stated that the sum proposed to be deducted from the profits "represents the amount of capital expended on pits and exhausted by the year's working."

The facts regarding pit-sinking in the appellants' mineral field, as now amplified and explained, may be summarized as follows:—First, During twenty years, from 30th June 1858 to 30th June 1878, the appellants expended in sinking pits £165,825, 3s. 6d., or on an average annually about £8500. This includes the costs of many pits used only as air-pits, and pits for pumping water, as well as the expense of bores made in searching for minerals. Secondly, During the same period many pits have become exhausted. The total cost of sinking these pits, including air-pits, pumping-pits, and bores, as above, was £102,678, 6s. 10d., being about an annual average of £5000, varying from £639, 4s. 4d. in one year, being the lowest, to £11,234, 15s. 1d. in another, being the highest. The depth of these pits varies from 9 fathoms to 114 fathoms. Their endurance in a state of usefulness varies from about one year to twenty-three years. Thirdly, Taking a shorter period of about six and a half years, from January 1872 to June 1878, the total cost of pit-sinking is £71,964, 10s. 2d., including £10,337, 10s. 9d. for air-pits and boring, or an average annual expenditure of about £11,000. These pits vary from 4 to 134 fathoms in depth. Fourth, During the period of six years from January 1872 to January 1878 the nineteen pits which became exhausted had cost £44,013, 13s. 1d., or about £2300 each pit on an average. They vary from 13 to 100 fathoms in depth, and lasted on an average about nine and a half years each. Fifth, The pits at present working—that is, in June 1878—are forty-three in number, and cost £97,537, 7s. 1d., or an average of about £2250 for each pit. They vary in depth from 14 to 134 fathoms, and were sunk, the earliest of them, in 1849, and the latest in 1876.

The question thus comes to be, whether the statutes authorise any deduction to be made from profits on account of capital expended and exhausted in the conduct of the company's business. The general principle of the property and income-tax, to which effect is given by the statutes, is that everything of the nature of income shall be assessed, from what source soever it may be derived, whether from invested capital, or from skill and labour, or from a combination of both, and whether temporary or permanent, steady or fluctuating, precarious or secured. Nor does it make any difference on the incidence of the tax that the income has been created by the sinking of capital, as in the case of purchased annuities, instead of being merely the natural annual product of an invested sum, which remains unconsumed, and undiminished by the consumption of the income which it yields.

In applying this general principle to an assessment on profits of trade, the Act 5 and 6 of Her present Majesty, chapter 35, speaks in very clear language

The first rule, sec. 100, schedule D, provides that "the duty to be charged in respect thereof shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, &c., upon a fair and just average of three years, and shall be assessed, charged, and paid without other deduction than is hereinafter allowed." The third rule provides, that in estimating the balance of profits and gains no deduction shall be allowed "for any sum employed, or intended to be employed, as capital in such trade, &c., nor for any capital employed in improvement of premises occupied for the purposes of such trade, nor on account of or under pretence of any interest which might have been paid on such sums if laid out at interest." And the fourth rule provides that "no deduction shall be made on account of any annual interest on any annuity or any annual payment payable out of such profits or gains."

Coltness Iron
Co. v. Solicitor
venue.

The term, "full amount of the balance of profits" in the first of these rules is something very different from the amount of the nett profits of the year which would appear in the ordinary annual balance-sheet of a trading company; for in ascertaining nett profits there falls to be deducted, not only annual working expenses, but interest on capital employed in the business, and every kind of annual payment which, either by the original constitution of the company or by its subsequent obligations, falls to be paid out of the profits.

So, also, in ascertaining the amount of nett profits for the purpose of division, the state of the capital account necessarily affects the balance-sheet. If any part of the capital is lost, or if, from the nature of the business, the capital employed can never be recovered or restored, that is an element of primary importance in fixing the financial condition of the company, and the true amount of its nett earnings.

But the statute refuses to take an ordinary balance-sheet, or the nett profits thereby ascertained, as the measure of the assessment, and requires the full balance of profits, without allowing any deduction except for working expenses, and without regard to the state of the capital account, or to the amount of capital employed in the concern, or sunk and exhausted, or withdrawn.

Any other construction of the statute would not only be inconsistent with the leading principle on which it is based, and with its express words, but would lead to very embarrassing consequences.

A man who employs his whole capital in the purchase of terminable annuities increases his income and is assessed to the income-tax for the full amount of the annuities; but after the step has been taken he is in practical effect living on his capital, and when the annuities terminate it will be all gone. He might have left his money on an ordinary investment, and have consumed every year a portion of the capital in addition to the interest. Nay, he might calculate the matter so nicely, that the whole capital would be gone just at the same time that the annuities would terminate. In this case his assessable income would be only the interest accruing annually on the principal sum, gradually diminishing year by year, and would not include the portion of the capital which he chose to expend year by year. But when he purchases an annuity he converts his whole estate into an income which represents no capital, but that which he has paid away and exhausted to procure the income. But the statute takes no heed of his exhausted capital, and makes no deduction from the actual amount of his income on that account.

In like manner, one may buy a business which is necessarily of a temporary character, but the endurance of which may extend over a series of years. He realises a large income from the business, and in the end he may find that the profits derived from the business while it lasted have repaid him the full amount he paid for it, with interest, and left an ample margin of gain beyond. On the other hand, he may find that though he drew considerable profits from the business annually during its continuance, the balance is the wrong way in the end, and he has lost a great part of the money he paid for it. But the statute is not concerned with the failure or success of his speculation, and looks only to what is the income derived from the business year by year.

To come nearer to the case before us, one man takes a lease of the minerals under the ground of a certain estate, which have never been wrought, and to which there is as yet no access by pit or otherwise. Another buys from a former tenant the unexpired term of a lease of minerals, which are in the course of being wrought by means of numerous and well-constructed shafts. Are these two men to be assessed to the income-tax on different rules? Is the former to have such an allowance or deduction as is claimed in the present case, on account of capital expended and exhausted in the sinking of pits, and is the other to have no such allowance, when the pits sunk by his predecessor in the mine become exhausted and useless? Such a result would seem very unjust to the latter, for his pits have possibly cost him quite as much, in the shape of purchase-money of the lease, as the former has expended in actually sinking his. And yet to give the latter the same kind of allowance as is now claimed for the former would involve such an inquiry as the Legislature could never have contemplated, and as seems almost inextricable,—an inquiry into the manner in which the purchase-money of the lease ought to be apportioned between the minerals themselves and the pits, and the other advantages and conveniences of the going mine at the date of the purchase, including an estimate of the worth of each pit at that date, its probable continuance as a useful pit, and the expense of maintaining it. But, besides all this, the supposed claim of the purchaser of the lease would be nothing less than a proposal to deduct from the income arising from the subject purchased a proportion year by year of the purchase-money. This would be to establish a distinction between temporary and permanent income, in the mode of imposing the assessment, to which the statute gives no countenance.

As already noticed, the contention of the appellants in the original case was that the expenditure in respect of pit-sinking was not outlay of capital at all, but the ordinary working expenses of the mine. For the reasons given in our former judgment, we thought that former argument unsound, and in the amended case it is abandoned, and the expense of pit-sinking is admitted to be outlay, or investment of capital. But the claim of the appellants, as made in the amended case, though thus differing in form, does not differ in any material respect from the claim made in the original case. Capital expended in the sinking of pits must necessarily become exhausted and lost sooner or later, and that is foreseen when the expenditure is made. The only distinction between the two claims is that, in the original case, the deduction was asked of expenditure actually made in the year of assessment; while in the amended case the deduction is asked to be made in the year of assessment in which the pits created by the expenditure ceased to be useful. But it is not the less in the one case than in the other a deduction from annual profits of capital employed in the business of the appellants' company, which the statute expressly prohibits.

A certain appearance of plausibility is given to the appellants' argument by the great number and variety of pits sunk and worked by them. The constant employment of capital year by year in such sinking, by reason of the great extent of their business, gives to this expenditure a certain similarity to ordinary working expenses. But the likeness is merely on the surface. If a man buys an unwrought mineral field, and sinks one pit, by means of which he works out all the minerals, he has converted the dormant, inaccessible, and unproductive subject into a going mine. He has made a new subject, which differs from the unwrought mineral field, just as a railway or canal is a different subject altogether from what the ground on which it is constructed originally was. The miner has invested his capital in creating the subject, which consists partly of the minerals and partly of the access by which the minerals are approached and worked; but the cost of the one, equally with the cost of the other, is an employment of capital, and it would be quite as reasonable to ask for an allowance for the general exhaustion and loss of capital embarked in paying the price of the mineral, as of that employed in sinking the pit.

The Court had occasion, in the case of Miller v. Farie, Nov. 29, 1878, ante, vol. vi., p. 270, to decide that no allowance could be made for depreciation of the subject or the gradual extinction of the capital employed, by the constant diminution of the quantity of minerals remaining to be won, and we have seen no reason to doubt the soundness of that judgment. But if these considerations are conclusive in the case of a small mine, with a single pit, it seems impossible to dispute their equal applicability to a large subject of the same kind. Instead of 50 acres in the case supposed, the mineral field may extend to 1000 acres; but the extension of the area, the multiplication of the strata worked, and of the pits sunk to reach them, do not alter the character of the subject, or the nature of the trade, and cannot make that in the latter case working expenses which in the former is employment of capital.

Having regard to the express words of the statute, and the principle of assessment which runs through all its provisions, the Court are of opinion that the claim of the appellants ought to be rejected, and the determination of the Commissioners ought to be affirmed.

As to the matter of expenses, we apprehend that we have no power to dispose of that question, at least at present.

Lord Deas entirely concurs in the judgment of the Court, although he is not able to be in Court to-day.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Of new affirm the determination of the Commissioners of the Middle Ward of Lanarkshire, dated November 7, 1878, and decern; and appoint the clerk to report this judgment to the House of Lords, in terms of the order to that effect, of date August 1, 1879."

entail, with the view of ascertaining the value of the expectancy of the second and third heirs prior to the disentail of the estate, diligence granted (by Lord Fraser (Ordinary) and acquiesced in) for the recovery of certain medical reports in the hands of insurance companies with whom the life of the heir in question was insured, and plea of confidentiality stated by the haver repelled.

OUTER HOUSE.
Lord Fraser.

This was a petition for disentail of certain estates in Perthshire, in which the House of Lords had found that, in order to the ascertainment of the value of the expectancy or interest of the second and third substitute heirs of entail, the respondents, under sec. 5 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1875, these parties were entitled to bring before the Court any facts bearing upon the probable duration of life of Captain M'Donald, who was the first substitute heir.

The cause was remitted to the Court of Session for that purpose, and a proof was thereafter fixed to take place before the Junior Lord Ordinary. There were averments that the heir in question had suffered from ailments which reduced his life below the average, and, preliminary to the proof, a diligence was granted to the respondents for recovery of certain medical reports made to insurance companies on Captain M'Donald on the occasion of applications for insurance on his life.

One of the havers, the manager of the Scottish Equitable Insurance Company, declined to produce such documents, on the ground of confidentiality and privilege. His declinature was reported by the commissioner to the Lord Ordinary (Fraser), who, after hearing parties, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the interim report of the commissioner appointed to execute the commission and diligence for the recovery of documents mentioned in the specification, No. 103 of process, repels the plea of confidentiality stated by the haver, William Finlay, secretary to the Scottish Equitable Life Assurance Society, and ordains him to make a further search for the documents called for, and, if found, to produce the same to the commissioner: Of new, remits to Mr John Burnet to execute and carry out the commission and diligence, and to report the same quam primum: Finds the haver, William Finlay, liable in expenses of the discussion on the interim report to the respondents, Misses Elizabeth M. M. M'Donald and Adriana M'Donald; modifies the same to £5, 5s., and decerns: Grants leave to reclaim against this interlocutor."*

* "NOTE.—The proof in this case has been fixed for the 10th of March, but, preliminary thereto, a diligence was granted for the recovery of certain medical reports upon Captain M'Donald's health made to insurance companies on the occasion of his applications for insurance on his life. One haver declines to produce these documents on the ground that they are confidential, and come within the class of privileged communications. This objection the haver is entitled to state, although diligence has been granted for their recovery—(See M'Donald v. M'Donald, March 6, 1844, 6 D. 954).

"The tendency of modern decisions is to increase the class of cases coming under the category of privileged communications. Hitherto the protection has been given to the limited class of communications between a husband and his wife, of the client and his legal adviser, of reports by public officers upon matters of state to their superiors. It has also been extended to communications passing between two defenders to a suit—(Rose v. Medical Invalid Insurance Society, Nov. 27, 1847, 10 D. 156)—and, although it has been decided by the English Courts that a medical man who acquires information from his patient, or a Roman Catholic priest who hears the confession of one of his flock, cannot refuse in a Court of justice to disclose the information they possess, yet these decisions have been regretted by later English Judges, and none such have been pronounced hitherto by the Scottish Courts. The case of the Roman Catholic priest was discussed and considered in M'Laughlin v. Douglas and Kidston, Jan. 17, 1863, 4 Irvine, 273, but no decision was given upon the general point; and, as regards the physician, Mr Greenleaf mentions that a number of the States in America, in the new codes passed by them, have enacted (as in the revised statutes of New York) that 'no person duly authorised to practise physic or surgery shall be allowed to disclose any information which he may have acquired in attending any patient in a professional character, and which information was necessary to enable him to prescribe for such patient as a physician, or to do any act for him as a surgeon'—(Greenleaf on the Law of Evidence, 13th edn., i. 290, note).

M'Donald v.

M'Donalds.

"If the present was a case where a communication made to a physician by his patient was sought to be recovered for a purpose antagonistic to the patient, the Court would have to consider whether the English rule denying the protection should be followed, or whether the Scotch Courts, not being controlled by precedents, would create one the other way by ranking this within the class of privileged communications. But the case is not so. An insurance company in the course of its business requires to obtain information as to the health of the person wishing to deal with it, promising, at the same time, to the doctor who gives the report, that it will be treated as a confidential communication. This does not possess any of those elements which lie at the root of the protection given to the classes above referred to. It may, no doubt, be inconvenient for the insurance company to be compelled to produce the reports of their medical adviser, and it may hamper the medical adviser in the expression of his opinion if it were known that on the occasion of a dispute the production of these reports in a Court of justice could be enforced. But, notwithstanding this, the mischief would be greater if such important evidence were withheld. A decision of the Common Pleas in 1871 is very much in point upon this subject (Mahoney and Another v. The National Widows' Life Assurance Fund, 5th May 1871, L. R. 6, 252). The action there was directed against the assurance company, to recover the sum insured upon a life. The company pleaded that the policy had been obtained by fraudulent concealment and misrepresentation of material facts. The plaintiffs applied for inspection of (1) two reports made to the company by private friends of the assured, to whom the company were referred, with relation to the assured's health and habits, and (2) a report made by a medical man to whom the assured was referred for examination on behalf of the company. At the head of the printed forms of questions, upon which these reports were made, were statements that the company would regard the answers given as strictly private and confidential. The Court allowed inspection of the documents, on the ground that they were not privileged from inspection, and regarded the statement that the report would be considered strictly private to mean no more than this, that the company would not needlessly disclose it. It is right, however, to notice, that the Judges in that case did indicate that there might be circumstances that might warrant the extension of the rule as to privileged communications to such reports. Thus Bovill, C. J., said—'I do not say that in every case the Court would order such documents as these to be produced. The Court has a discretion, and is bound to exercise it according to the circumstances of the particular case. It is easy to see that in some cases these documents may be of importance, and in others not. Here, there are no grounds shewn by the affidavits why they should not be produced, except the mere fact that they are stated to be confidential as between the insurance office and the parties who wrote them. This is not any legal ground of privilege.' This remark had reference to what seems to be more confidential than the medical report, viz., the report of private friends as to the state of health of the insured. If the Court does possess such a discretion as is thus claimed, it can only be exercised upon very special grounds indeed. If it were made clear that the document when produced would not be competent evidence at the trial, that might be a ground for refusing an order to produce it. But such an objection to the production, though it may be suggested by a haver for the consideration of the Court, is one that can only be competently taken by a party to the suit. The medical reports here sought to be recovered have been given (as was stated to the Lord Ordinary) by living men, whose evidence may be obtained at the trial, and therefore it may be said that there is no necessity for admitting the reports which they made years ago; and consequently, it is argued, if any judicial discretion is to be exercised in the matter it should be in favour of the objection to production. Whether the evidence be competent or not is a question that must be argued by the parties to the cause when the reports are tendered in evidence at the trial, and cannot be determined now, and therefore there is no speciality in the present case that would induce the exercise of any discretion against the non-production."

No. 69.

M'Donald v.
M'Donalds.

THE interlocutor was acquiesced in, and the cause was thereafter settled and taken out of Court without further procedure.

JAMES M. M'BAIN (Roney's Trustee), Complainer.—D.-F. Fraser—Rhind.
JOHN WALLACE & CO. AND OTHERS, Respondents.—Guthrie Smith—Vary Campbell.

Ship—Sale—Delivery.—Held that when a ship in the course of building is sold for a price payable by instalments, during its completion, the property in the ship passes to the purchaser as the instalments of the price are paid, without delivery of the subject.

Right in Security—Ship—Sale—Bankrupt.—A person agreed verbally to make advances to a shipbuilder on the security of a ship he was in the course of building, on condition that the ship should be sold to him for a certain sum to be advanced, the contract of sale not to be qualified by any back-letter or other legal obligation. A formal and unqualified contract of sale was thereafter completed, the price to be payable in two instalments. The price was paid before the vessel was completed, and before delivery had been made the shipbuilder was sequestrated. In a question between his trustee and the purchaser, held (rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) that the latter was entitled to delivery of the vessel, although only to the effect of securing repayment of his advances, with interest.

M.

JAMES RONEY, shipbuilder in Arbroath, towards the end of the year 1875 commenced to build at his yard a barquentine or three-masted schooner of the burden of 297 tons. This vessel he entered in his books as No. 2, and for the purposes of survey he entered her at Lloyds. Towards the end of December 1877 her hull, with all her internal fittings, was nearly completed and ready for launching. During these years he was also engaged in building various other vessels, and in doing so he had incurred various liabilities. In particular, he had obtained and discounted an accommodation-bill for £500 from Messrs John Wallace & Co., iron-merchants, Dundee, from whom he was in the habit of getting iron and other goods. He had also incurred with the same firm an open account for goods supplied to the extent of £300, making his total liability to them as at January 1878, £800.

Following on verbal communings between the parties, Roney entered into a contract with Messrs Wallace & Co., of date 17th and 25th January 1878, for the completion and purchase of the schooner No. 2, at the price of £2500. *

* The more important clauses of this contract were as follows:—Clause 3.—"It is hereby agreed and declared that when any sum shall be paid or appropriated by the second parties towards payment of the said price, the said vessel in her present unfinished state, and at the stage of her build at which she has reached,

The effects of James Roney were sequestrated on April 24, 1880, and No. 70.
on 4th May Mr James M'Bain was elected trustee thereon, and an act and warrant of confirmation in his favour was issued on 7th May.

as shown by the said specification, and all materials and articles of wood or iron or other metals of every description, furnished and unfurnished, and whether made up or not, but intended or destined to be used in the construction, fitting up, and completion of the said vessel, and her appurtenances, which shall be lying or situated in or about the vessel, where she is building, or elsewhere in or near the shipbuilding yard or other premises occupied by the first party at Arbroath, shall thereupon ipso facto, to all intents and purposes, become and remain the property of the second parties, although they may be used by the first party as materials for the completion of the vessel, or of her appurtenances; and it is further and in like manner agreed, that all subsequent additions made to the vessel and her appurtenances as the work proceeds, and all additional materials and articles of any description that shall be brought to or belong, or be situated as aforesaid, intended or destined to be used in the construction, fitting up, and completion of the vessel or her appurtenances, shall ipso facto of such intensioned destination or situation, become and remain the property of the second parties, although, without prejudice to such right of property, they may be used by the first party as materials for completion of the vessel or her appurtenances as before mentioned; and generally, it is hereby agreed that the said vessel and her appurtenances, or any part thereof, or materials or articles intended or destined for the completion of the same as aforesaid, shall not be or become liable to any debts, contracts, or engagements of the first party, or be otherwise affected by or attachable for his acts or deeds, or be at his order and disposition, but shall, subject to the uses foresaid, be and remain the absolute property of the second parties: Declaring that the instalment of price applicable to the present stage of the vessel's build is agreed to be £2000 sterling, and that the final instalment of price payable for the vessel and her appurtenances on complete fulfilment of this contract and said specification, is £500 sterling, making together the foresaid price of £2500 sterling, which respective instalments shall be payable on the completion of the said vessel and its appurtenances, to the second parties' satisfaction, and after the vessel has been launched by the first party, and full legal possession thereof received by the second parties, and also after delivery by the first party to the second parties in proper order of the certificates of the builder of the Board of Trade, and of Lloyds' surveyor, and any other documents requisite to instruct that the vessel has been completed in terms of said specification and this contract, and according to the requirements of the Board of Trade and Lloyds' registry. But it is hereby agreed that if the second parties shall elect to pay, or appropriate any sum or sums for settlement of any part of the foresaid instalments sooner than the date fixed for payment thereof, then and in that event the sum or sums that may be so paid or appropriated shall bear interest from the date of advance or settlement at the rate of five pounds per centum, and the advance or advances and interest thereon shall be deducted from the foresaid price at final settlement."

Clause 6.—"In case the first party shall suspend the work on the vessel or her appurtenances, unless compelled to do so from the effects of fire or bad weather, or strike of workmen, to such an extent as to cause a suspension of work, or if he shall refuse or fail to carry out and complete this contract, and said relative specification as hereinbefore agreed to, then, and in any such case, it shall be lawful for the second parties, by themselves or others employed by them, and without any judicial warrant, unless they may consider such expedient, but only after a previous notice to the first party of fourteen days by letter, put prepaid into the post-office at Dundee, to enter into and upon the first party's shipbuilding yard and premises at Arbroath, and take and retain possession thereof, and of the whole materials and articles intended and destined to be used for the purposes of this contract and said specification, and thereafter to sell the said vessel and her appurtenances, and the materials and articles before referred to, or any part thereof, in the condition in which they may then be, at

On 29th and 30th April 1880, Messrs Wallace & Co., founding on the 6th clause of the contract, gave notice to Roney that they intended, in consequence of his having suspended the work on the vessel and her appurtenances, and so failed to execute his part of the contract, to enter upon his shipbuilding yard, "and take and retain possession thereof, and of the whole materials and articles intended and destined to be used for the purposes of the said contract and specification," and thereafter to sell the said vessel and her appurtenances, and the said materials, either at valuation or by public sale, and to do anything further that might be necessary, and which they were authorised to do by the terms of the contract.

On receipt of this letter, Mr M'Bain, the trustee on the sequestration, raised the present action of suspension and interdict of the said proceedings against Messrs Wallace & Co.

valuations to be put thereon by the arbiter aftermentioned; and failing such valuation, then by public sale, on such terms as the second parties may think proper, and to receive and discharge the prices thereof, and apply the free proceeds, after deduction of all costs and charges, towards repayment of any instalment or portion of any instalment of the price that may have been advanced or appropriated by the second parties as before mentioned, and any other payments or outlays that they may have made or incurred in the premises, with interest thereon from the date of advance, at the rate foresaid. And after full payment and satisfaction to the second parties in the premises, and relief and reimbursement to them of all obligations, payments, and charges of every kind, which they may have contracted or incurred in relation to this contract and the consequents thereof, and any other debts or obligations due and owing by the first party to the second parties, on any other ground whatever, relating thereto or not, any free balance shall be paid to the first party, or the second parties may, if they see fit, instead of selling the vessel and her appurtenances, and the said materials and articles, or any part thereof as above mentioned, complete the vessel and her appurtenances, in terms of the present contract and said relative specification, and for these purposes employ all necessary workmen, and use all the machinery, working tools, implements, stock, and material of every kind necessary for such purposes, in and about or near the said premises of the first party, situated at Arbroath; and in case the second parties shall expend any sums in so completing the vessel and her appurtenances over and above the said contract price, the same, with all costs and outlays incurred by them, shall be recoverable by them from said first party."

Clause 7.—"In the event of the vessel and her appurtenances, when delivery thereof is tendered by the first party to the second parties, being disconform to the stipulations in this contract and in the said specification, the second parties shall be entitled, notwithstanding anything to the contrary herein contained, to refuse to take delivery thereof, and to demand and recover from the first party repayment of any sum or sums that they may have paid or appropriated towards payment in whole or in part of any instalment of the said price, and the other outlays, charges, and expenses that they shall have paid and incurred, and obligations that may have been undertaken by them in relation to the present contract and subject-matters thereof, with interest thereon at the rate foresaid from the date of advance till repaid; and in the event foresaid it is further expressly agreed that the second parties shall have a real specific and preferable right of lien, retention, and possession of, in, and over the said vessel and her appurtenances aforesaid, until full payment be made to them as above provided, and be entitled to claim and hold possession under such right of lien and retention, and to realise payment of the sum or sums that may be so due to them by a sale of the said vessel, and charge the first party with the expense of so doing, and with any deficiency that may remain for payment to the second parties as aforesaid, but in that event the second parties shall have no further claim for loss or damage against the first party."

 M'Bain v.
 Wallace & Co.

He averred that (Stat. 6) "the price of the vessel was under the contract stipulated to be paid on the completion of the ship, which by article fifth of the contract was to be within three months from the last date thereof. The vessel, however, was not finished within the three months, and is not even now completed, she being still on the stocks. No part of the pretended price of the said vessel has been paid, but the respondents, who had already made advances to Roney of £800, continued from time to time to make advances to him, for which they afterwards drew on him, and discounted at the Royal Bank in Dundee his acceptances. The respondents charged interest and commission on the same, the reality of the matter thus being simply that, in respect of certain sums of commission, the respondents lent their names to Roney, who obtained the proceeds arising from the discounting of his own acceptances." (Stat. 12) "The intention of the parties in entering into the foresaid contract was, that it should be simply as a security for the debt already due by Mr Roney to the respondents, and for the accommodation-bills to which they were to become parties for his behoof. And accordingly after the contract was entered into, Mr Roney was left by the respondents in the uncontrolled possession, management, and ownership of the schooner. They got and took no possession, symbolical or otherwise, and in no shape interfered with Mr Roney with reference to the ship. The contract has all along been kept latent, and has not been published or made known to any one. From time to time Mr Roney corresponded with various parties with a view to a sale of the vessel. He advertised her in his own name, and at his own expense, to be disposed of. He was under no restraint, verbal or otherwise, from selling the ship, so far as the respondents were concerned. He met them very frequently when in Dundee, and communicated to them his prospects of selling the vessel, and they never sought to control him as to the amount of the price he asked for the ship, nor even indicated that they had any right or interest in her, other than a right in security for the accommodation transactions above mentioned. On the contrary, they corresponded with him on the footing that the vessel was his vessel, and in their correspondence they asked him the lowest price at which he would sell her."

He pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The vessel and others not having been sold to the respondents, and no price having been paid for the same, the respondents are not entitled to take possession of them. (2) There having been no delivery to the respondents of the vessel and others in question, interdict should be granted as prayed for. (3) The transaction between the respondents and the bankrupt being one by way of security only, and this fact being instructed in gremio of the contract, the respondents are not entitled, as in a question with the trustee on the bankrupt's sequestrated estate, to insist on delivery of the vessel and others, and for that purpose to take at their own hand possession of the bankrupt's shipbuilding yard, stock, and plant, as intimated by them.

The respondents, in their answers, denied that no price had been paid, and averred that sums to the extent of £2550 had been paid to Roney to account on the price of the ship, and that he had granted receipts therefore, the said receipts bearing to be for part of the contract price. They denied that the contract was intended to be only in security, and that there were any accommodation-bills for Roney's behoof. Further, they denied that the contract was kept latent, and that possession was not taken by them. It was well known both in Dundee and Arbroath that they had bought the ship, and that when Roney endeavoured to find a purchaser it was at their request, and in doing so he was acting solely for their behoof, and not for his own interest.

Wallace & Co.

They pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The contract being a contract of sale, and reduced to writing, the allegation that it was truly a security cannot be proved otherwise than by writing. (3) When a ship is purchased on the stocks on the terms that it shall be finished and launched by the builder, and paid for by instalments, the property of the materials as they are put together, at all events after payment of the first instalment, belongs to the purchaser, and not to the trustee in the builder's bankruptcy. (4) The right of a trustee in a sequestration being tantum et tale as it stood in the person of the bankrupt, and the respondents having bought the vessel and paid the stipulated price, they are entitled to delivery and possession in terms of the contract. (5) Assuming that the transaction amounted to a security only, the transfer being ex facie absolute, the complainer is not entitled to possession, except on payment of the sums received and due by the bankrupt to the respondents.

A proof was led,* and on 23d November 1880 the Lord Ordinary (Lord

* James Roney, inter alia, deposed,—“About the end of the year 1877 I met Mr Wallace and Mr Stewart in their office in Dundee, with the view of getting the bills renewed. They demurred to renewing the bills unless I could give them some security. They asked how I stood about my affairs. I explained how I was hampered with this vessel on the stocks,—that I could not get her sold, that I could not get any money on her, and that if I had her sold I would be able to meet the bills. After some talk I offered to give them the vessel if they could raise any money on her in security for the bills,—to allow them to lie over till I got the vessel sold. Mr Wallace, I think, suggested they should consult Mr Thomson (a law-agent) about it. I came back next day, or the day after, and Mr Stewart and I called upon Mr Thomson, solicitor, Dundee. It appeared that Mr Wallace had been there before us, because Mr Thomson knew what we had called for. He explained that the respondents could not take a mortgage on the vessel unless she was launched and registered, and that the only way would be a sale. I understood that this was the only way in which they could take the vessel as security. It was then arranged that the bill of sale, or whatever it is, should be made out in that way, and that they should advance the money as I required it in the future on the vessel. There was no price agreed on. The reason why £2500 was put in was that Mr Stewart asked me in the office if £2500 would put me over my difficulties till I got the vessel sold, and I said, ‘Plenty; perhaps I would not require it all if I got her sold soon.’ I agreed to grant the security in the form of an absolute conveyance. In the first arrangement the £2500 was put in for the vessel without an outfit—that is, just the hull and spars—but when the contract was made out it embraced the whole outfit, to make the vessel ready for sea. I was never even consulted about that; Mr Thomson prepared the conveyance, and Mr Stewart and I signed it in Mr Thomson's office on 17th January 1878. . . . (A.) £2500 was mentioned for the vessel finished. She would be worth close upon £4000 at that time. I would not have sold her for anything like £2500 then. I got £2950 for her subsequently, and vessels had very much depreciated in value during the interval. . . . I got various advances from the respondents during the years 1877-78, for which I granted receipts. The mode in which these advances were made was by bill drawn by the respondents, accepted by me, and discounted by them. I generally got a cheque from them, but not always, for the full amount of the bill drawn. When I got those cheques I granted receipts in the terms of No. 74. On one occasion they got a receipt for £120, when no money passed at all. It was the balance of a bill for £300. They asked for a receipt for that sum as if they had paid it to me, which they had not done. The form of receipt was written out by Mr Thomson on the day the contract was signed, and it was adhered to right through. I agreed to grant receipts in those terms without any remonstrance. I asked a back-letter from Mr Stewart a week or two afterwards. I demurred to granting receipts and accepting bills at the same time. I thought they were having too much security over the vessel. I said to Mr Stewart it was all well enough as between him and me, but something might happen to either of us, and then they could claim the vessel. 'Oh,' he said, 'never mind that; the heavens might fall,' and he did not give me the back-letter. . . . Nothing took place in Mr Thomson's presence to shew that the transaction was to be a security, and not an out-and-out sale."

David Stewart, a partner of Wallace & Co., deponed,—“Roney came back to me early in January 1878, and asked me whether we could not buy the ship ourselves. I said we had quite enough of shipping, unless we could get a bargain of it. I said I would consult my partner, Mr Wallace, who lives in London. Roney on this occasion suggested a price, £2500. I understood that was to include the completion of the vessel, and to make her ready for sea. Mr Wallace came down to Dundee and saw Roney. At the meeting which took place Mr Wallace spoke about buying the vessel at the price named by Roney, but said he would go to Mr Thomson, and see if he could prepare a proper buying contract that would keep us secure for what we were to pay for the vessel until she was launched. The reason why he desired to see Mr Thomson was that the vessel was then on the stocks unfinished. . . . On 18th January, Roney and I called at Mr Thomson's office. The contract was read over by Mr Thomson's clerk, and Roney heard it read. 'We there and then signed it, and it was sent to London for Mr Wallace's signature. On our return to my office that day, Mr Roney said, 'Now suppose you were to sell this ship for more than £2500, what is my position to be?' I said, 'You have signed a contract of sale.' 'But,' said he, 'suppose you were to make a big profit,' and he wanted a back-letter. I said, 'There will be no back-letter. There is no understanding or misunderstanding upon the subject with me, and neither let there be with you. It is an out-and-out contract of sale, and any agreement, verbal, implied, or written, may vitiate the contract.' I throughout held this contract to be an out-and-out absolute sale. . . . When Roney asked for the back-letter he seemed to have a floating idea in his mind that the ship had been parted with as security. I suspect I must have known what he meant when he asked for the back-letter. He seemed to think that the transaction, though in shape a transaction of sale, was in reality a security. I at once refused to give a back-letter, assigning as a reason that it might vitiate the contract. (Q.) Why were you afraid of the contract being vitiated? (A.) Because we wanted to be absolutely safe, and have the contract to express actually what it was. (Q.) Were you afraid that if you granted the back-letter it might be found out that the contract was one of security only? (A.) A back-letter might have indicated that. (Q.) And you were afraid of that? (A.) Well, I was just wanting to go upon the contract, and there was no occasion for him asking a back-letter. My explanation of the words I used is this, that if we had parted with the money without a proper buying contract we might have been held as taking security, and there was no occasion for a back-letter, seeing a proper buying contract had been signed by both parties. Had this vessel been sold for more than what paid our debt, I would have considered myself morally but not legally bound to account to Roney for the excess, because he had been in business for a while and lost a lot of money, and we did not want to make a profit of his necessities. I was willing to give him a share of the profit. I don't know whether he understood that too; but this is what I would have done, though only from moral obligation. (Q.) Was that not what you understood at the time was to be done? (A.) It was never so expressed. (Question repeated.) There was no understanding. (Q.) Was it not really in your mind at the time that that was to be the result of the transaction? (A.) I suppose may be it was; at the same time we must keep ourselves legally right whatever our moral obligation may be."

spondents, in terms of the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict, and decerns: Finds the complainer entitled to expenses: Appoints an account," &c.*

The respondents reclaimed, and argued;—The contract was one of sale, and not merely of security. By the construction of the ship under the contract it became the property of the reclaimers specificatione. As the building progressed such an appropriation to him took place as prevented the creditors of the builder from attaching it without refunding the sums advanced by the reclaimers. The rule of the case of Duncanson was not confined to the case of an actual sale, and delivery following thereon, but included such delivery as there was here.¹ The builder was under an absolute obligation to build, just as the claimer was under an absolute Wallace & Co. to James Roney, 6th September 1879.—"Dear Sir,—Enclosed is letter from Beardwood, Jones, & Co.

"We have written them that they should get their clients to run north and see the ship, as we know she is not dear, and they will be satisfied of that when they see her.

"Meantime, is £3600 the very lowest at which you would be disposed to sell? Please say for our guidance, and we will use the information judiciously in writing to B., J., & Co."

Wallace & Co. to Beardwood, Jones, & Co., 11th September 1879.—"We are favoured with yours of yesterday re Roney's ship. We know you will do your best in this matter. We have a personal interest in it, as we are under considerable advances to Mr Roney against this vessel, and we want to realise, and he wants to retire from shipbuilding; so if your correspondents are bona fide enquirers, kindly do what you can to hurry them on judiciously."

* "OPINION.—The complainer's case is that the ship was his. The answer to this is twofold—that the ship was sold, and the property transferred, or at least that they have a security which they are entitled to enforce. There is no doubt that the contract which is founded on is one of sale. I do not doubt that Mr Thomson believed there was no other contract but this one, and I am disposed to assume that was also the idea of Mr Wallace. He seems not to have paid so much attention to the matter as Stewart, between whom and the bankrupt the chief communications were. But though the contract does express a contract of sale, that may not be an expression of the true contract which the parties made with one another, although they may have concealed from the law-agent what was the true contract. But does this writing express the true contract? I do not think it does; and I think I can rely more on the evidence of Roney than on Stewart's, because Roney's is consistent with all that passed subsequently, and Stewart's not at all, while Stewart on pressure told the real truth. The contract is for immediate execution. The ship remains in the hands of the bankrupt. Payments are made, and receipts given, but Roney gives his name to furnish accommodation. The correspondence is, to my mind, in favour of my view. Mr Stewart's evidence also tended to shew he did not believe he had bought the vessel, because he said he had a moral obligation to return excess of the price obtained, and he said he would not give Roney a back-letter, because he thought it would vitiate the contract. As to the security, I think the constitution of that security must be ascertained. It is hardly contended that any possession was changed, and therefore the security is unavailing by reason of want of possession."

obligation to pay for work done. Such an arrangement was equivalent to a sale, and the complainer, after the contract was once entered into, simply acted as the servant of the reclaimers. If the transaction was of the nature of a security it was of the nature of an ex facie absolute disposition, under which a title could be completed and delivery enforced just as under a sale.¹

Argued for the respondent ;—There had here been no delivery, without which the sale could not be held to have been completed. A ship required delivery just as much as any other moveable. The authority of Duncanson's case was very doubtful,² and had not been followed in subsequent cases.³ If this was held to be a sale it would give the reclaimers an unfair advantage over the other creditors in the competition.⁴ The facts proved that the arrangement was simply one of security.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has been elaborately argued, and embraces some questions of considerable general importance, especially that part of it which relates to the principle on which the case of Duncanson was decided. I differ from the Lord Ordinary in holding that the instrument in this case only conferred a right in security ; but I agree with him as regards the claim of Messrs Wallace for the surplus of the price over the amount of the sums advanced.

I cannot hold that this written instrument was only a security. It is drawn up in a most formal manner, and it professes, at least, to describe the Messrs Wallace & Co. as the purchasers, and Roney as the seller, of the vessel in question, then lying uncompleted, on the stocks. That is what the written instrument purports, and its terms are quite unambiguous. If we are to read it according to its plain meaning, its phraseology is quite distinct. It was argued that the sixth clause in this agreement gives a different effect to the whole instrument. But I think this view proceeds on an erroneous construction of its terms. It relates to a different matter. It runs as follows :—(Reads). The effect of this clause was to provide for the protection of the shipbuilder, in the event of the owner entering into possession before the vessel was finished, in which case the balance remaining over, after a sale of the vessel, and the liquidation of all expenses, was to be made over to the builder. This was a reasonable provision, and was entirely confined to the case contemplated, of the vessel not being finished.

I am of opinion, therefore, that this contract discloses only a transaction of purchase and sale, and, indeed, ultimately, this was not disputed on the part of Roney's trustee.

It was, however, contended, that, granting that the contract was one of purchase and sale, it was not completed, because the vessel never was delivered, and by our law the sale of a moveable article is only completed by delivery ; and we have had an able commentary on the case of Duncanson on this head.

M'Bain v.
Wallace & Co.

I have always considered this leading case as establishing the doctrine that if the price of a vessel in the building-yard be payable by instalments, as the vessel proceeds, payment of the first instalment will suffice to transfer the property without farther delivery, on the principle of specification, the shipbuilder holding thereafter for the true owner. In Abbott on Shipping, Lord Tenterden refers to that judgment as having settled the law on that subject, in conformity with the prevalent opinion among English jurists. It is true that since the case of Duncanson there has been no direct decision on this matter; but I believe the practice in the shipbuilding trade has been entirely consistent with that judgment ever since it was pronounced; and I am of opinion that if the price of the vessel in this case had in point of fact been paid, the property of it had duly passed to Wallace & Co.

It has been argued that at least the price here had not been paid by instalments. But payment of the whole price was, of course, payment of the different parts of it; and all the money which was paid by Wallace & Co. was in fact paid before the bankruptcy of Roney.

That the price was paid I cannot doubt. The price was advanced by cheques, and against these cheques corresponding bills were negotiated, drawn by Wallace & Co., and accepted by Roney. It is not denied that the amount thus received by Roney was more than sufficient to extinguish the whole price; and if Roney had remained solvent he was fully paid. But it is maintained that there is no evidence that the sums so received were applied to the finishing of the ship. But this is surely immaterial. The money was received from time to time during the period occupied in the construction of the vessel, and it is of little moment to inquire what Roney did with the money when the cheques were paid, if, in point of fact, the money came into his hands.

It is, however, said farther, and this is the only point of difficulty in the case, that although, on the face of it, this may be and is a contract of sale, yet the right was qualified by an agreement, separately concluded, which restricted it entirely to a security. I was under the impression from the first, and that impression strengthened in the course of the discussion, that the evidence of a separate contract was of the scantiest. There is no back-letter, nor any stipulation for one. I think, however, that there is sufficient evidence in the correspondence that Wallace & Co. would not have felt justified in retaining from the proceeds of the ship more than their advances, and that it was understood between the parties that they would not do so. But, assuming this to be so, that would in no degree prevent their title under the contract from remaining that of purchasers. The parties meant nothing but a sale, but it was quite within the power of the purchasers to undertake to hold the property only until they were paid their advances. Such a stipulation would not derogate in any way from their absolute title, until that title had operated full repayment. Until then, and to that effect, it must remain what it plainly is on the face of the contract.

The nature of such a right—an absolute title qualified by a personal undertaking—is very familiar, and the rules of law applicable to it are well settled. If one man stipulate with his debtor that he shall be put in the place and have all the rights of a proprietor against him, and obtain an absolute conveyance of his property, he may, if he pleases, stipulate that in certain contingencies he will restrict the operation of his absolute title. That would be matter of contract, and, to the extent of his undertaking, he will be liable to fulfil it. But even in the fulfilment of his personal stipulation the rights and powers of his absolute title shall be effectual, and aid the subordinate or qualified operation of his absolute conveyance. Such a personal agreement does not derogate from the absolute title, but only restricts, in certain events, the operation of it. Such is the tenor of all the opinions in the case of Leckie v. Leckie, 17 D. 77, and especially of that of Lord Colonsay, which is of the greatest weight.

M'Bain v.
Wallace & Co.

I think, therefore, that this is nothing but an absolute sale, qualified, it may be, by collateral and subordinate stipulations, which do not affect the right of the purchaser to plead his absolute title effectually, until his advances are repaid. The conditional agreement could only come into force when the sums advanced are repaid, and I think that until that event occurs the collateral agreement gives no right to the shipbuilder's trustee. It would be an unjust, and, as I think, an untenable result, that the persons who made these advances for behoof of the builder should be compelled to abandon the property on the faith of which alone the funds by which it was created were furnished.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered to the effect of finding that Wallace & Co. have a preferable right under the contract of sale over the vessel in question to the extent of £2500.

LORD YOUNG.—The primary question regards the validity and effect of the contract of 17th and 25th January 1878, assuming that the rights of the parties under it are not affected by extrinsic evidence. Whether or not they are so affected is a subsequent question.

The contract is for the purchase and sale of a ship on the stocks in a building-yard, and still unfinished. The seller (the builder) undertook to finish and deliver the ship to the buyer, who, on his part, undertook to pay the price (£2500) by instalments, or on the completion and delivery of the ship. There can be no doubt that this was, ex facie, a good contract of sale, enforceable by either party against the other, and that, as between them, it was immaterial to its validity and enforceability whether the price had been paid in whole or in part. Nor, so far as I can see, would the subsequent bankruptcy of either party have affected the validity of the contract, although in that case the solvent party must have been content with such remedy as he might have under the bankrupt laws against the estate of the other.

Between the date of the contract and the seller's sequestration the respondents (the buyers according to the contract) made thirteen payments to the seller, to the total amount of £2550, on receipts bearing that the payments were made and received to account of the contract price of the ship. The contract price being thus fully paid up (at least ostensibly) the seller became bankrupt on 24th April 1880, and the question now raised is whether the respondents are entitled to the property and possession of the ship, which is still on the stocks.

Now, on the assumption which I am making, viz., that the contract was in truth what it bears to be, and that the price has been paid, I do not think this question doubtful. For I hold it to be law that the property of a ship on the stocks in the course of building passes by a contract of sale, accompanied with payment of the price, either in full or by instalments corresponding to the progress of the building. This is no doubt an exception to the general rule that the property of goods sold passes only by tradition, but since the case of Duncan v. M. 14,204, it has been a recognised, and, I had thought, familiar, exception, and the expediency or utility of it is obvious, for, otherwise, a ship on the stocks and in course of building being incapable of delivery could not be purchased and paid for as it advanced with any safety to the buyer.

Wallace & Co.

But it is said that there is here extrinsic evidence which shews that the respondents were not in truth buyers, but money-lenders, and that the contract of sale was only a device to procure a security on the ship for money lent. And, assuming the fact to be so, it is contended that the respondents can take nothing under the contract as a contract of sale, while it is ineffectual to give them a security as by pledge.

I think it is probably true that the respondents did not desire to purchase the ship either for use or as a speculation, and that they were only willing to accommodate the shipbuilder with advances of money on what was thought to be good security for repayment, viz., a contract which should make them the owners of the ship as by purchase, and whereby their advances should be accounted payments to account of the price. Assuming this to have been the intention of the parties, there was nothing fraudulent or reprehensible in it that I can see, and I am ignorant of any rule of law which hinders its accomplishment. It is only reasonable to hold, and, indeed, is according to the assumption of the suspender's argument, that the contract, together with the receipts granted for the payments subsequently made, put the respondents exactly in the position which they contracted for, and in reliance on which they paid their money. Why shall they not occupy it? There was no fraud, and no contravention of the bankruptcy law, and no undue advantage is sought to be taken of the title bargained for and given. It is according to the general rules of law, and quite familiar in practice, that an ex facie absolute title of property, whether to land or goods, as upon sale, may be given by a borrower to a lender of money. It is true that the Court will get behind the appearance or form of the transaction, and proceed on the reality, in order to do justice, as, for example, to restrain the holder of the title from using it beyond what is necessary to recover his debt and interest, but beyond this any interference with what has been lawfully covenanted and done, although between borrower and lender, would be unjust. It is quite lawful, as I have said, for a lender to bargain for a property title which shall give him all the rights of a proprietor, subject only to this, that he may be equitably restrained from taking more by it than payment of his debt, and a contract of sale, with delivery or its equivalent, is a very common form of such title. In the case of a ship on the stocks in course of building I have already stated my opinion to the effect that delivery (which, indeed, is impossible) is not needed to pass the property or give a jus in re, and that a contract of sale, together with payment of the price according to the contract, will have this effect. Whether the contract is with a real buyer, or with a money-lender who honestly bargained for it as the condition of his loan, is plainly immaterial to the shipbuilder's creditors. It is not to be assumed, and probably nobody dealing with a shipbuilder ever assumed, that the ships building in a yard are the builder's property, unaffected by contracts with others.

It is here admitted that the respondents are creditors of the bankrupt for money advanced and paid to the bankrupt to the amount of £2500 in reliance on the contract in question. The respondents distinctly undertake that their title by the contract shall be used by them only to the effect of recovering this debt, and interest. The equitable intervention of the Court to prevent any excess of use is therefore not invoked. The ship is said by the complainers to be worth much more than the debt, and the import of our decision thus amounts only to this, that the respondents are entitled to payment of their debt preferably and in full, their title of property in the ship being available to them to this extent, and no further. We might have allowed the ship to pass to the trustees in bankruptcy, and tried the question on his deliverance on the respondents' claim, but the question as to their preference being before us now, and having been fully argued, it is convenient for all parties that we should decide it, and we shall do so, to the effect I have stated, by refusing this suspension.

Ralston v. Ralston and Lord Advocate.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Condonation.—The wife of a sailor confessed to her husband that she had committed an act of adultery. After she made that statement the parties never lived together as man and wife, but the husband soon after went to sea, and during his absence wrote affectionate letters to his wife expressing his forgiveness of what had happened, signing himself "your loving husband." On his return home he discovered that his wife had committed adultery previous to the act which she had confessed. In an action of divorce raised by the husband, held that the letters, even if they amounted to condonation of the act of adultery which the wife had confessed, could not be pleaded in condonation of the previous act, of which the husband was ignorant when he wrote them.

Condonation by letters.—Question, whether letters of forgiveness from a husband to a wife, without any subsequent cohabitation, will support a plea of condonation.

Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict.), cap. 86, sec. 8—Appearance for Lord Advocate—Condonation.—Question, whether in an action of divorce it was competent for the Lord Advocate to insist in a plea of condonation which had been stated and subsequently withdrawn by the defender.

On 29th June 1880 William Ralston junior, captain of the ship ^{2D DIVISION.} "Selene," raised an action against his wife, Catherine Smith or Ralston, Lord Adam. concluding for divorce on the ground of adultery with David Langwell, M. formerly mate of the ship "Lochlong," of Glasgow, "and with a person or persons whose names or designations are to the pursuer unknown."

The defender stated defences to the action, pleading, inter alia;—(2) The pursuer's statements as to the defender's adultery, except in so far as the said adultery has been known to and condoned by him, being unfounded in fact, the defender ought to be assoilzied.

This plea proceeded on averments that letters had been received by the defender from the pursuer expressing his forgiveness after the adultery with Langwell had become known to him, and on an averment that the

No. 71. pursuer had, on his return home from the voyage on which these letters were written, resumed cohabitation with the defender.

Ralston v. Ralston and Lord Advocate.

A day for proof in the action was fixed, but before it arrived the defender abandoned her defence.

On 25th November 1880 the Lord Ordinary (Lord Adam) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary appoints this case to be laid before the Lord Advocate, in terms of the 8th section of the 'Conjugal Rights Amendment Act, 1861,' in order that he may determine whether he should enter appearance therein."*

The Lord Advocate entered appearance, and was represented by counsel at the diet of proof.

From the evidence, the following facts were proved to the satisfaction of the Court:—

In the beginning of August 1877 the pursuer left Glasgow, where he and his wife were staying, to join the ship "Oimara," and was out of this country for twenty months. He never afterwards lived with her as his wife. On his return on 22d April 1879 he telegraphed to her to meet him at Newport, Monmouth. When she arrived there she informed the pursuer that she was with child to a person she named, but whose name the pursuer did not remember; it was not Langwell. The pursuer and his wife lived in the same house at Newport for eight days. The child was born on the 29th. The pursuer then left the country in the ship "Selene," and during his absence wrote the letters quoted below.† About twelve

* The Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Act (24 and 25 Vict.) c. 86, sec. 8, enacts,—
"It shall be competent to the Lord Advocate to enter appearance as a party in any action of declarator of nullity of marriage or of divorce; and it shall be competent to him to lead such proof and maintain such pleas as he may consider warranted by the circumstances of the case; and the Court shall, whenever they consider it necessary for the proper disposal of any action of declarator of nullity of marriage or of divorce, direct that it be laid before the Lord Advocate in order that he may determine whether he should enter appearance therein."

† The first of these letters was in the following terms:—"Ship 'Selene,' Zanzibar, August 22d.—My dear Wife,—I write you a few lines to let you know that I am well, and hoping these few lines will find you all enjoying the same blessing. I received your two kind letters of the 16th and 24th July, and, dear Kate, you remember that I told you that I told Captain Clink that £5 would do; and I hope, dear Kate, you will try and make that do until we meet, if it is God's will, for I am wearying very much for to see you once more; and, dear Kate, as for any of them watching you, never distress yourself about it. I want nothing to do with any of them, and so keep up your heart—it is you and me for it, and never you mind what they say or think; as long as you do right for the future towards me you need care for no one. Dear Kate, I am all discharged, and will sail in two or three days more, and this is a very bad time of the year in the Bay of Bengal, and if anything should happen to me, you will know that you have my full forgiveness for what has happened; and I hope you will sometimes think of me, for I often think of you; but, dear Kate, with God's help all will go well, and we will meet and be happy yet, I hope. As I told you, I answered my father's letter, but gave them no news, only that I was well; and, dear Kate, don't let that distress you.—I remain your affectionate husband, WM. RALSTON, Master, Ship 'Selene.'" On two subsequent occasions on the same voyage the pursuer wrote affectionate letters to his wife, commencing "my dear wife," and ending "your loving husband," and lastly a letter, also on the same voyage, in the following terms:—" . . . hoping to have a happier meeting next time, the best we ever had. Dear Kate, as I have plenty of time, and I expect to get your other letters before the mail sails for home, so this letter will be an answer to all that I have received from you—that is, if the mail months after he left Newport the pursuer was at Bremerhaven, where his wife went to see him, uninvited. He did not, however, live with her, and sent her home three days after she arrived. No. 71.

In cross-examination the pursuer stated that at the time he wrote the letters he intended to raise an action of divorce against his wife, and only intended her to believe that she had his forgiveness that she might take charge of their only child, and not sell the furniture he had left in their house. Jan. 13, 1881.
Ralston v. Ralston and Lord Advocate.

It was further proved that the defender had committed adultery with David Langwell in October 1877, shortly after the pursuer left the country in the "Oimara."

On 20th December 1880 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds it proved that the defender, Catherine Smith or Ralston, committed adultery with David Langwell, mentioned on record, and was delivered of an illegitimate child on or about the 29th April 1879: Finds it not proved that the defender committed adultery with any other person: Finds that the pursuer, in the knowledge that the defender had committed adultery, condoned the same: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action," &c.*

It will be observed that his Lordship's finding implies that the adultery with Langwell was committed in October 1878, which would have accome up to time. Dear Kate, you may be sure that I will be as quick as ever I can, as I am wearying to see you; and as long as a mast stands above the 'Selene's' deck, she will catch it. I will astonish some of them that thinks Bill Ralston a fool; but never mind, dear Kate, it is you and I for it, and let all others climb a tree as they like, I care for none of them. . . . I am trying to get away next week. You will get a letter ten days after this, so you will be all right. No more at present.—From your loveing husband, Wm. RALSTON, Master, Ship 'Selene.'"

* "NOTE.—The pursuer met the defender in Newport at the end of April 1879. He had been at sea continuously for about twenty months before this time. The defender was then pregnant of a child, which was born a few days after their meeting. The pursuer could not possibly be the father of this child, and knew, beyond doubt, that his wife had committed adultery in his absence.

"After remaining about eight days with his wife at Newport, the pursuer again went to sea. The letters to his wife founded on in record were written during this voyage.

"Although the evidence is meagre, the Lord Ordinary thinks it sufficiently proved that the defender committed adultery with David Langwell in the previous October, which would account for the birth of the child.

"It is also attempted to prove that she committed adultery in October or November 1876 with a person of the name of Newlands, but the Lord Ordinary does not think this is sufficiently proved.

"In these circumstances the question arises, whether the pursuer condoned the defender's adultery? The Lord Ordinary thinks that no one can read the pursuer's letters to his wife without being satisfied that he had fully forgiven the act or acts of adultery which led to the birth of the child. The pursuer avers that he never forgave his wife, but that the letters were written for the purpose of deceiving her into the belief that he had, in case that she should, in his absence, sell their furniture, and go away with their child. The Lord Ordinary does not believe a word of this. For reasons which do not appear, the pursuer seems to have changed his mind since his return from his last voyage. But that cannot take off the effect of his previous forgiveness of his wife's offence.

"Had the Lord Ordinary thought that the alleged adultery with Newlands had been proved, a question would have arisen how far the condonation would have applied to that act; but, in the view the Lord Ordinary takes of the case, it is not necessary to consider it."

No. 71. counted for the birth of the child in April 1879, but the proof of adultery with Langwell applied to October 1877.

Jan. 13, 1881.
Ralston v. Ralston and Lord
Advocate.

The pursuer reclaimed.

Argued for the pursuer;—Although by the Conjugal Rights Act, sec. 8, it was competent for the Lord Advocate to enter appearance in any action of declarator of nullity of marriage or of divorce, this was to prevent collusion. It never was intended that he should insist in a plea of condonation which had been abandoned. That was a plea entirely personal to the defender, in which the public had no interest. The defence of condonation was untenable, because (1) the pursuer did not resume cohabitation with the defender after he knew of her adultery; mere verbal forgiveness would not sustain the plea.¹ (2) The plea of condonation could only be stated as against the adultery known to the condoner.² Now, the only adultery which he knew, when he used the words "I forgive you," was that which produced the child in April 1879. He did not know of the other and prior adultery with Langwell, which took place in 1877 (not in 1878 as the Lord Ordinary had erroneously held).

Argued for the Lord Advocate;—(1) The right of the Lord Advocate to appear as a defender in suits of declarator of nullity of marriage and divorce was given by the Conjugal Rights Act in the most ample and explicit terms. It was given to him in the public interest, on the ground that the public had an interest in the status of each member of it, so that bona gratia divorces should not be allowed to be carried through under the forms of law. The right thus given to the Lord Advocate to intervene in such cases was only a continuation of a long pre-existing practice, under which the procurator-fiscal of the Consistorial Courts aided the Court in such cases.³ The matter was left entirely to his discretion; and it was just as allowable to him to plead that divorce was barred by condonation as that it was barred by collusion. (2) In regard to what constituted condonation the consistorial law of Scotland was different from that stated in the case of Keats in the English Courts. The canon law, which was adopted in the Scottish Consistorial Courts, held that condonation could be pleaded when there was express forgiveness by word of mouth or by letter, without any subsequent conjugal cohabitation; and the institutional writers and the decisions of the Commissary Court adopted and enforced that law.⁴

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The main question which is raised in this case (on which I do not propose to give any express opinion) is one of considerable importance and novelty, whether, where a plea of condonation is withdrawn, it is competent or right for the Lord Advocate to take up the plea and maintain it. The words of the statute that authorise the Lord Advocate's intervention now are as broad as they can possibly be, and it is a matter entirely in the discretion of the Lord Advocate under what circumstances he will or will not appear; and I have not the least desire to say a word to limit that discretion. It is vested in perfectly good hands; but when the question does come up I wish to reserve my opinion entirely as to whether a plea of condonation, which implies that the wife has been unfaithful, but that the husband has entered into a contract with her to overlook her fault, is a kind of plea which the public prosecutor, the public authority, ought to take up if the wife declines to pursue it. I do not think that tying the matrimonial knot anew under such circumstances is a matter which is of benefit to the public, nor do I see any real interest which the Lord Advocate could have to insist upon it. That is all I have to say about that matter.

No. 71.

Ralston v. Ralston and Lord
Advocate.

In the second place, on the question whether, condonation being pleaded, it is a good plea, I must own that I do not think it is, under the circumstances, well-founded upon the letters in question. This unfortunate sailor comes home and finds his wife very near her confinement of a child which is certainly not his. Well, he lives for eight days in the same house, the wife, of course, being unable to be removed, and he, very probably, having no other place to which he can conveniently go. He then sails upon another voyage, becomes apparently soft-hearted to his wife when he is away, and writes those letters, but writes them under the belief that the only act of misconduct was that which led to the birth of the child which he found she was going to be delivered of. He comes home. I suppose he hears of other things, for he does not go near her, and he never cohabits with her again, and has had no conjugal intercourse with her. And the question is, whether these letters will amount to such condonation as will prevent him from having his remedy for his wife's misconduct.

Now, my Lords, without going into the question whether cohabitation is essential,—on which there seems to be some difference of opinion in our law,—there is none in the law of England,—but whether cohabitation be essential or not the absence of cohabitation and the refusal to cohabit on the very first opportunity is a very material circumstance in shewing how far there was any concluded intention of overlooking this offence. But the conclusive matter here—and it admits, in my opinion, of no doubt whatever—is that when these letters were written he did not know his wife's conduct or the measure of it. He knew the case, but he did not know about the adultery with Langwell in 1877; and whether the proof of that would have been sufficient for a divorce or not it is quite plain that if he had known of that circumstance he never would have written the letters at all.

On the whole, I should have thought it a very feeble case of condonation, even if the adultery with Langwell had not taken place the year before. The Lord Ordinary has fallen into the mistake of supposing that Langwell was the father of the child, and that the pursuer did know everything before he came home. But that is not so, and on that ground I come to the opinion that as these letters were written in ignorance, the husband cannot be bound by them now that he has discovered the full measure of his wife's misconduct.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be altered, and decree of divorce should be given.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I think the evidence does not shew any condonation, anything to bar the pursuer from having the remedy which he seeks by this action. It is clear upon the evidence that at the time these letters were written the pursuer knew nothing of the adultery which the Lord Ordinary here finds proved; for the particular adultery which he finds

No. 71.

 Ralston v. Ralston and Lord

proved by his interlocutor is adultery with Langwell, which the Lord Ordinary by mistake puts in the month of October prior to the birth of the child. But the proof shews it really took place in the October of the year 1877, and so the child's birth did not result from that intercourse, though I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the adultery is very well proved; and, according to all the evidence which we have, the pursuer was ignorant of that adultery, so found to be proved, when he wrote these letters. Now, while he meant, so far as a man might by writing letters to his wife, to forgive the adultery which resulted in the birth of the child (which was not the adultery libelled), I am not of opinion that letters of that kind, without any cohabitation at all, will bar an action for divorce such as we have here; and even if they would have barred it, had the only adultery established been that which led to the birth of the child, I should be of opinion that the evidence of the adultery, of which the pursuer was ignorant, would entitle the writer of the letters to be free from any restraint which otherwise they would have put upon him. That he did not, when he wrote those letters, know or suspect his wife's conduct with Langwell in October 1877 is, I think, quite sufficient to entitle him to be free.

But I have the greatest possible doubt—though I agree with your Lordship that it is not necessary to decide it in this case—whether letters, especially letters written by a seaman who is abroad with his ship, expressing his feelings affectionately to his wife at home, will establish a condonation which will bar an action of divorce. There is no authority to that effect in Scotland up to this moment, and I am the furthest in the world from being prepared to make an authority here. But it is not expedient or necessary for us to decide that point, there being sufficient to shew that the pursuer here is under no restraint by writing those letters in the circumstances in which they have been written.

There is another matter on which I think it proper to say something, and that is the intervention of the Lord Advocate; and it will not be supposed for a single moment that I would do anything so unbecoming as to say one word of censure with respect to the course which the Lord Advocate has taken here. That would be entirely foreign to any purpose which I have. But we have been told, and no doubt truly, that there is no case in England of the intervention of the Attorney-General in order to demand the consideration of a plea of condonation (which is not maintained by the party), except on the ground that the party entitled to maintain it is abstaining from doing so collusively, and for some improper purpose. There is no case of that kind in England, where provision is made in terms very analogous to the provision which is made here by the Conjugal Rights Act, and the Dean of Faculty informs us it existed at common law before that provision of the Conjugal Rights Act, to protect the Court against pronouncing decree of divorce improperly arranged between the parties. It is certain there is no such case in England, and it is equally certain there is no such case here prior to the present; and when the first case occurs of anything of the importance which this has, it is incumbent on the Judges, before whom the matter comes, to indicate their views upon the subject, if, indeed, they have any: and I do happen to have some views here, and they concur entirely with what I understand to be your Lordship's.

Condonation is in its own nature very much a personal matter. It is personal forgiveness. If that personal forgiveness is followed up by the husband

ston and Lord
Advocate.

taking back the guilty wife to live with him he should certainly not be at liberty thereafter to turn round upon her, and say, "You shall suffer for your misconduct just as if this had not happened," and so with the innocent wife taking back as her husband the husband who has transgressed. But that is very much a personal matter, because the binding nature of such forgiveness, from a moral point of view—and it is that which is at the bottom of it—depends upon the state of the forgiving party's knowledge and information as to the conduct of the other. Of course, what he remains ignorant of with respect to the other party, and does not act upon the knowledge of, is for legal purposes just as if it did not exist; but I am the furthest in the world from being prepared to sanction such a notion as this, that, if a generous and forgiving husband has written a letter of forgiveness to his erring wife, saying, "Well, I receive your confession and your tears and repentance, and I forgive you; I will not go back upon what you have done," she, knowing that her conduct has been infinitely worse than anything known to him when he wrote the letter, knowing of misconduct on her part which she has not communicated to him, is bound nevertheless to use that letter of forgiveness, and to prove those expressions of forgiveness as a defence to any action which he may raise. I think the wife or the husband—for the cases are the same—is perfectly entitled to say, and is only acting with propriety and according to morality and duty in saying, "Well, I will not avail myself of this, because I know that it was written upon a generous impulse, and without that knowledge with which I could not have expected it to be written, and I will not avail myself of it." Now, I am making the observation only to indicate my own opinion that this matter of condonation and forgiveness is very much of a personal affair between the parties, and that if the spouse entitled to plead the forgiveness does not desire to do so, that it is not a case in the absence of any special circumstances, ascertained upon a special investigation, for the Lord Advocate or the proper officer, whoever he may be—it happened to be the Lord Advocate here—to intervene and say, "No, but you shall; this has been done, and it is irrevocable; and if your wife, in whose favour you did it, does not choose to stand upon it, I, in the public interest, stand upon it, and insist that the Court shall give effect to it." I think, as no instance of that has occurred in the past, we ought not, by any observations of ours, to give any encouragement to the repetition of it in the future.

With these observations, I entirely concur in what your Lordship proposes, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be altered, and decree of divorce granted.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The case now before us is an action of divorce at the instance of a man named Ralston against his wife. The ground upon which divorce is sought is adultery; and in the condescendence the adultery is said to have been committed in 1876 with a person of the name of Newlands, in October 1877 with a person of the name of Langwell, and there are other cases with other men more indefinitely libelled, the names of those other men, as the pursuer says, being to the pursuer unknown. The defender appeared, and stated defences. She denied all the instances referable to persons stated in the condescendence, but she did admit there had been adultery, because she admitted that, her husband having been away for the period of twenty months, she immediately after his return gave birth to an illegitimate child; so that undoubtedly there was adultery on her part, though it does not appear from anything admitted by the defender or stated upon record that the act was one of those special cases libelled on by the pursuer. The defence, however, is no sooner stated than it is withdrawn, though the papers remain in process and are available for the information of all concerned, including the Lord Ordinary. After a proof had been allowed the Lord Ordinary, struck by the withdrawal of the defences, yet possessed of the information on which the defences had been made, and of the importance of one of the pleas which the defender had stated, viz., the blotting out of the acts libelled by condonation, appointed intimation of the cause to be made to the Lord Advocate, that he, if he thought fit in the circumstances, might appear and take the course which he thought the interests of justice required. The Lord Advocate did appear by those whom he sent to represent him. He took part in the examination of witnesses, and he took part in the discussion which followed on the close of the proof. The result of the whole matter was that the Lord Ordinary found that there had been adultery with a person named Langwell, and that this Langwell was the father of the child to which the defender had given birth on 29th April 1879. There is no doubt, according to my view of the matter, that the Lord Ordinary decided rightly when he found that there was proof of adultery with Langwell; but I am just as clear that the Lord Ordinary inadvertently had mistaken the proof with reference to the time when this adultery was committed. The adultery with Langwell occurred not in October 1878, as the Lord Ordinary has found, but in October 1877, and hence it is as plain as anything can be, that the adultery with Langwell was not the act of adultery to which the pregnancy is to be attributed. Apart from the defence which was urged first by the wife and afterwards taken up by the Lord Advocate, viz., the defence of condonation, the mere matter of time would have been comparatively unimportant; but with reference to that defence time goes deep into the case, and indeed so deep that it is with reference to the date of this particular occurrence that I think there is furnished an answer to be made to the plea of condonation.

Now, something has been said here with reference not so much to the right as to the expediency of the appearance of the Lord Advocate to take up and maintain such a defence as this. I confess that, supposing it were necessary for me to decide that matter, I should be disposed to think that the words of the eighth section of the Conjugal Rights Act of 1861 are so broad that the Lord Advocate might appear and take part in any action of divorce in Scotland. That being so, and this being an action of divorce, it appears to me that the Lord Advocate exercised his discretion, as he was entitled to exercise it, by appearing, and I do not think that the circumstance that there is here no evidence of collusion betwixt husband and wife ousts the right which otherwise he would possess. Because, whether there is collusion or not, no one is entitled to obtain a divorce if the ground on which the divorce is sought appears upon evidence which is furnished to the Court to be a ground which has been blotted out and cannot be made the ground of any such application. Now, it appears—I am not saying there is condonation here—that when the Lord Advocate appeared, he did not know the extent to which the proof would go. He was entitled to inquire into that matter, and he appears to have inquired to the extent which he thought necessary or expedient, and it is only in the end of the day, and after there has been inquiry, that the Lord Advocate is able to make up his mind, and say whether, according to his view of the facts, and according to his view of the law, it is his duty to take part in the discussion, and maintain that the defence of condonation has been established, and that, therefore, the divorce should be refused. No. 71.

Practically, however, as regards the decision of the case, it appears to me, in this action at any rate, to be utterly immaterial what is the view we ought to take with reference to the Lord Advocate's appearance, because everything that has been brought out here might have been brought out by the Lord Ordinary himself. He saw what was the plea that was stated by the defender. He saw what was the ground in point of fact on which that plea was brought forward. And the Lord Ordinary was entitled,—nay, more, I think he was bound,—to see what was the truth of the matter, in so far, at any rate, as that could be discovered from the witnesses who were adduced for the purpose of proving the pursuer's case. Every question which was put in the course of the pursuer's cross-examination the Lord Ordinary might have put and ought to have put, and I suppose he would have put, supposing the Lord Advocate had not been there. It is a very delicate and important duty which devolves upon the Lord Ordinary when there is no appearance to defend, much more so than when there has been an appearance, and when that appearance has been withdrawn; and if, in any circumstances, condonation is to be looked upon as a plea by which a right to divorce is barred, then he cannot tell at the beginning of the case whether that plea can be supported or not; he can only know that at the end. And hence it is not only his privilege but his duty, so far as opportunity is afforded him, to ascertain what is the truth as to the facts upon which that plea is put forward. It appears to me immaterial whether the thing is pleaded or not. If it comes within his knowledge he is entitled to inquire into it, and give his decision according to that which upon the proof is ascertained to be the conditions on which the law is to be applied. And, therefore, the consideration of the question whether the Lord Advocate ought at the beginning to have intervened, or at the end to have put forward the plea of condonation, really does not seem to me to be of materiality to the discussion of this case. That plea has been put forward, and the Lord Ordinary has sustained it; and the question comes to be whether or not in the circumstances that plea ought to be sustained, as it has been by the Lord Ordinary, or whether it ought to be overruled, and decree of divorce granted.

The counsel for the Lord Advocate says that, apart from this plea, the pursuer is not entitled to his divorce, because the acts of adultery libelled have not been proved. As regards all of these, except the adultery with Langwell, I think the contention maintained by the Lord Advocate is right, and the Lord Ordinary has adopted the same view. But I am humbly of opinion that there is abundance of evidence in the case to support the charge of adultery with Langwell. The adultery was said in the condensation to have been committed in October 1877. The proof shews, I think, that adultery was committed at that time, and there is no allegation, much less is there any proof, of adultery with Langwell at any other time. That being so, we then come to consider what is the foundation of this plea of condonation. The pursuer returned to this country from his twenty months' voyage in the year 1879. He was joined by his wife, he having telegraphed to her his expected arrival, and sent an invitation that she should meet him. She came, and then she told him that she was within a short time of her delivery of an illegitimate child. The pursuer says, as he well might say, that he was staggered at the notion; but what is said by the defender—and what the Lord Ordinary apparently holds to be the language of the pursuer—was this, that he heard what the defender, with reference to this matter, had to say, and that he forgave her the wrong which she had done to him. And what this forgiveness was is evidenced, if the tenor of the letters which were written in the course of his subsequent voyage is to be looked upon as proof of condonation. Now, the question has been raised whether forgiveness and condonation are to be looked upon in the law of Scotland as one and the same thing. I think that to a large extent this is a controversy about words. Forgiveness, (if it means nothing more than forgiveness of the sin which has been committed, but without a renunciation of the right to avail himself of the protection which the law affords in severing the tie that binds him to his wife, would obviously not be a thing which would be equivalent to condonation, because I adopt entirely the view which has been presented by your Lordship, which is to this effect, that it is not the use of words by the husband towards the wife or by the wife towards the husband,—it is something which leads to a result on the part of both; and unless that can be satisfactorily established I think it is in vain to ✕ contend that forgiveness can be dealt with as equivalent to condonation.

That being so, what we have to consider here is whether the letters are or are not evidence of forgiveness, not in the sense in which I have used the word, but of condonation, which alone would be a bar to the pursuer's right to divorce. Now, there is a great deal, undoubtedly, in the consideration, in ascertaining what presumably was the meaning of the pursuer in writing these letters, that, when he returned, and his wife unexpectedly came to him, she did not live with him; but it is plain enough that he had altered his mind between the time these letters were written and the time his wife joined him on his arrival at Bremerhaven, for he refers in two passages of these letters—or in one passage, at any rate—to the meeting that is anticipated upon his return, and what he says is this,—“Hoping to have a happier meeting next time—the best we ever had.” Now, I cannot but think there is evidence there to shew that the forgiveness which had been extended by him towards the defender was not a mere forgiveness to this extent, that “I will say no more about it; I am very sorry for it, and I pity you, and nothing more will be done by me;” because I think it means this, it is a forgiveness to this extent, that they should meet as husband and wife, and that the happiness they had had before, and even greater happiness, would be the result of the meeting that is anticipated. Now, if that was the forgiveness extended by pursuer towards defender, I should not like to say in the meantime that that was not all that was required for the authorities in the law of Scotland. Cohabitation is undoubtedly the best and most pregnant proof that there has been condonation, but something short of cohabitation and intercourse between the spouses may be all that is required. While I express these opinions, it does not appear to me to be necessary in this particular case that I should definitively rest my judgment upon these, to the effect which has been indicated, because, even if it were to be taken as the defender desires it should be taken, viz., as forgiveness equivalent to condonation—nay, as condonation itself—it would not be a condonation applicable to that offence which has been proved. It is plain from that which is stated by the defender upon the record—it is even more plain from that which is stated by the pursuer in the letter dated 22d August—which may be taken as written in 1879—that the only offence he had forgiven was the intercourse to which the birth of the child was to be ascribed, because he says,—“You have my full forgiveness for what has happened." Now what had happened? The birth of the child, and the intercourse to which that birth was to be ascribed. There is nothing else there, and it is not said this particular letter had reference to anything else. But it turns out upon the evidence that a year before this child was begotten there had been intercourse with this man Langwell—that this was a thing of which the pursuer did not know at the time this letter was written, because he did not know of it till he returned to this country at the close of the voyage, and hence this act of adultery, which is a good ground of divorce by itself, is not a thing which was in his view when the forgiveness was given. Forgiveness of that was neither given nor accepted. The defender did not communicate it, the pursuer did not know of it, and hence that offence was not in the view of either party when that which is called forgiveness and condonation took place. Now, I think it plain that this forgiveness, or, if it be condonation, this condonation, is not broad enough to cover the case which has been established. There is an act of adultery proved, and that act is not covered by the forgiveness. If that be so, I see no reason why the pursuer is not entitled to divorce, and I am satisfied, from the way in which the matter is presented by the Lord Ordinary, that he would not have pronounced the interlocutor which has been brought here on this reclaiming note if there had not been a misapprehension in his mind with reference to the time when the intercourse occurred. I entirely concur in the judgment which your Lordships have given.

Superior and Vassal—Composition—Unlet shootings to be included in casualty
—Stat. 1469, c. 36.—When shootings are of such value that they might bring a rent if let, their value must be taken into account in computing the "year's mill as the land is set for the time," payable as a composition on the entry of a vassal under the Act 1496, c. 36.

On 28th January 1879 George Bulloch purchased from Lord Kinnaird and his son the lands of Ballinreoch and others, at the price of £45,000. Previous to that time Mr Bulloch had been tenant of the house and shootings at the annual rent of £700, and after he purchased the estate he continued his possession of the house and shootings.

The last entered vassal in the lands having died on 27th August 1879, the superior, Sir Archibald Douglas Stewart, brought an action against Mr Bulloch for payment of a year's rent as composition, the lands being in non-entry.

The defender offered to pay a composition of one year's rental of the lands as appearing on the valuation-roll. The shootings, being retained in the proprietor's own hands, did not enter the valuation-roll, and the defender refused to take them into account in computing the year's rent payable as casualty.

The defender pleaded ;—(2) A superior, not being entitled to take into account the annual value of shootings in determining the amount of a casualty of composition due to him, the defender should be assoilized. (3) Separatim, the shootings on the estate in question not being actually let to any one, and no rent being derived therefrom, the pursuer is not entitled to have them taken into account in determining the amount of a casualty of composition.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, in computing the composition payable by the defender, the shooting rent of the subjects libelled must be taken into account as well as the agricultural rent; and with this finding appoints the case to be enrolled for further procedure: Grants leave to the defender to reclaim."*

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—Shooting over land was a use of it unknown at the date of the Act 1469, and the Act could not have been intended to include the shooting rents. Practice was against the pursuer's demand.¹ The cases referred to by the Lord Ordinary had no application to the Act 1469, but occurred under the Entail Acts.²

Argued for the pursuer;—The right of the superior apart from the statute would be to refuse an entry to the vassal and himself to enter into possession of the land. The statute took away this right, and must therefore be construed as favourably for the superior as possible. The intention of the statute was that the measure of the casualty should be the real value of the subject to the vassal. A vassal might escape altogether from payment of a casualty if game rents were not included, as a great deal of land was let for deer forests and no agricultural rent was paid for it. Besides, the present question was ruled by the case of Leith.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question raised in this case is one of general importance, and, as the Lord Ordinary has observed, it is one which has not previously come before the Court for decision. For this reason we were very anxious to hear everything that could be stated against the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but having given every attention to the very able argument of Mr Kinnear, I am not inclined to differ from the Lord Ordinary.

The facts are very simple, but they are also important in the determi-

* "NOTE.—The question in this case is whether, in computing the composition payable by the defender as a singular successor, the shooting rent shall be taken into account. This question has never been decided, and it is said that the practice has varied.

"The composition payable by a singular successor is a year's rent, or, to use the words of the Act 1469, cap. 36, 'a year's mail as the land is set for the time.' It has, however, been determined that the right of the superior is not limited to the rent which is payable by actual tenants, but extends to the true yearly value of the lands, whether they be let or unlet.

"The question seems thus to be, whether the rent obtained or obtainable for shooting is a part of the rent of the land. The Lord Ordinary thinks that it is. It has been so regarded in a series of cases, of which Leith, 24 D. 1059, is the latest, and the rent payable for shooting has been considered as a consideration given for the use of the ground, and not as a delegation of a personal privilege. The true view seems to be that the ordinary return which is or may be obtained for the use of the lands for a year is the sum which is payable to the superior in name of composition."

nation of the case. The defender purchased the estate at the price of £45,000, and obtained a disposition dated 28th January 1879 from Lord Kinnaird and his son, the proprietors. It appears that for some time previous to the purchase he had been tenant of the house and shootings under a lease obtained from these gentlemen, who were the vassals of the pursuer, and that he had paid a gross yearly rental of £700 for the house and shootings; but of course after he acquired the lands the lease came to an end, and since then he has possessed the shootings as proprietor. The lands fell into non-entry—if one may still use that expression—on the 21st August 1879, in consequence of the death of the person last infeft, and the superior has brought this action, which is a statutory action under the Act of 1874, for payment of a year's rent as his composition for the entry of the defender as his vassal; and the question is, whether in estimating the composition we are entitled to take into account that part of the rent which represents the value of the shootings on the estate?

No. 72.

 Stewart v.
 Bulloch.

Now, there may be estates in which the value of the shootings has not only never been tested by being made the subject of a lease, but may be so obviously insignificant in amount as not to be worth ascertaining at all. There are many such cases. On the other hand, there are numerous cases in which the shootings form no inconsiderable part of the total value of the estate.
 It is with a case of this last sort that we are dealing here. Mr Kinnear says that it does not matter what the comparative value of the shootings is, and that the judgment we are to pronounce will apply to every piece of land in Scotland. I hardly think so. If the shootings are of scarcely any appreciable value, I think that our judgment will be inapplicable, just because there is nothing capable of being let. But to every case in which the shootings are either let or capable of being made the subject of a lease our judgment will apply.

Now, it is not disputed that the superior's right to a composition depends entirely on the old statute 1469, chap. 36, and what he is entitled to require in name of composition is, in the words of the statute, "a year's mail as the land is set for the time." I quite agree with Mr Kinnear that there is no subsequent statute which in any way extends the measure of the superior's right, but, on the other hand, it is perfectly obvious that the words of the statute must be subject to construction, and in practice its words have been construed in a somewhat extended sense. Before, however, we come to consider how far the statute, as it has been construed, will include the present case, I think it advisable to treat the question as if the statute were understood literally, and to put the case on the assumption that the lease which the defender formerly held was still in existence, and that some one else as proprietor was seeking an entry with the superior. Now, in such a state of matters would the words "a year's mail as the land is set for the time" include the rent paid for the shootings? I think they would. If, indeed, it were the law that a right of shootings was a mere personal franchise—as at one time the Court appeared inclined to hold —there would be a great deal to be said against the application of the words of the statute to a lease of shootings; but I think it has now been laid down in a series of decisions that this is not the nature of a right of shootings, but that what the tenant receives under such a lease is a right of occupation of land, as much as in the case of an agricultural tenant. It is for a different purpose no doubt, but it is not the less a right of occupation. The sporting tenant goes on to the land for the purpose of shooting game, just as the agricultural tenant goes for the purpose of tilling the ground; and although the object is different the one case just as much as the other is an occupation of land under a contract, and I know no other species of contract which will include the present except the contract of lease. I speak of the result of a series of judgments which need not be referred to. Now, if that be so, it is very difficult to say that a year's mail does not comprehend the mails which are payable for the land as set to the sporting tenant, just as much as the mails payable by the agricultural tenant. If, therefore, we had been dealing here with a case of let shootings, I should without difficulty have come to the conclusion that such a case is included in the very words of the statute.

But the case we are dealing with is a case in which the shootings are not let. It is, however, also one in which the shootings have been let and are of an appreciable value; and the question is, whether the value of such unlet shootings can be brought within the words of the statute 1469? Now, if the superior could not under that statute obtain anything for the value of lands which are unlet to any agricultural tenant, and are cultivated by the owner, I should have very great difficulty in saying that the shooting value should be included any more than the agricultural value. But it is just here that this ancient statute has been subject to construction; and the mode in which the value has been estimated is explained by Lord Curriehill in Blantyre v. Dunn, 20 D. 1188, in which he thus summarises the result of the decisions—"According to the established construction of this enactment, the measure of the composition payable by such an entering vassal is the rent payable to him by his tenant in the lands at the time of the entry, if they be then set in lease to a tenant, or the sum for which they might then be let if they are in the possession of the vassal himself." I do not think it can now be disputed that the statute has received this construction, and that what Lord Curriehill gives as the rule is the result of a series of decisions. Now, if that be so, and if the shootings, had they been let, would have been included in the words "a year's mail as the land is set for the time," it appears to me that the shootings must equally be included when they are, as they are here, of clear appreciable value in the hands of the vassal. I therefore entirely concur in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

It has been said that the cases on the authority of which the Lord Ordinary proceeds did not occur under the Act of 1469, but under a very different statute. No doubt that is so. But do the words of the Act of 1469 differ in any essential particular from the words of the statute on which these cases were decided? Just let us see what are the words of the Aberdeen Act which were in question in those cases. What the wife of an heir of entail is entitled to have as provision is a liferent out of a certain proportion of the lands and estate, which is described as not to exceed "one-third part of the free yearly rent of the said lands and estate where the same shall be let, or of the free yearly value thereof where the same shall not be let." Now, it seems to me that in meaning and effect these words exactly correspond to the words of the statute 1469 as construed by Lord Curriehill in Blantyre v. Dunn, and consequently that the decisions on that section of the Aberdeen Act are authorities in the present question.

Process—Appeal—Leave to Appeal—Act 50 Geo. III. c. 112, sec. 36—A. S. 12th Nov. 1825, c. 19, sec. 2.—The A. S. 12th Nov. 1825 contains this section,—"The liberty of advocating interlocutory sentences to the Court of Session, in the cases allowed by the Act 50 Geo. III. cap. 112, sec. 36, must be obtained upon an application by petition to the Sheriff. This petition must not contain any argument, but shall merely narrate the interlocutors to be advocated."

Held that the section merely regulates the mode of obtaining leave to appeal in cases where such leave is necessary.

ANDREW MILLER, Greenock, presented a petition against Thomas Macknight Crawford in the Dean of Guild Court of Greenock for warrant to alter certain buildings. The respondent pleaded, inter alia, that the case being a competition of heritable right the Dean of Guild had no jurisdiction to entertain it.

After a great deal of procedure the Dean of Guild allowed the petitioner a proof.

The respondent appealed to the Court of Session.

The petitioner objected to the competency of the appeal, on the ground that no leave had been granted to appeal, and maintained that the A. S. of 12th Nov. 1825, c. 19, sec. 2, required that leave should be obtained in all cases specified in the Act 50 Geo. III. c. 112, sec. 36, and not only in the cases specified under the third head of that section.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—On the question of the competency of this appeal I do not entertain any doubt. It is an appeal from a judgment of the Dean of Guild of the burgh of Greenock, and is brought under the 36th section of the Act of 1810 (50 Geo. III. cap. 112) on the ground of defect of jurisdiction. The appellant says that the Dean of Guild cannot competently decide the questions raised in the record. Now, the 36th section of the Act provides that there may be advocacy on any of the following grounds:—"First, of incompetency, including defect of jurisdiction, personal objection to the Judge, and privilege of party; secondly, of contingency; thirdly, of legal objection with respect to the mode of proof, or with respect to some change of possession, or to an interim decree for partial payment, provided that in the cases specified under this third head leave is given by the inferior Judge." This appeal is not one of the cases specified under the third head, and therefore under the Act of Parliament the appellant required no leave from the inferior Judge to come here. But it is said that the A. S. of 12th November 1825, passed under the authority of a totally different Act of Parliament—that of 6 Geo. IV. cap. 120—makes it necessary to obtain leave from the inferior Judge before presenting an appeal in any of the cases specified in the 36th section of the Act of Geo. III. The provision of the Act of Sederunt is in these terms:—"The liberty of advocating interlocutory sentences to the Court of Session, in the cases allowed by the Act 50 Geo. III. cap. 112, sec. 36, must be obtained upon an application by petition to the Sheriff. This petition must not contain any argument, but shall merely narrate the interlocutors to be advocated."

Now, if the effect of this provision is to take away the absolute right of appeal conferred by the 36th section of the Act of Geo. III. in regard to appeals on the ground of want of jurisdiction, it would certainly be a very serious interference with the right conferred by that statute. A Judge who exceeds his jurisdiction is not unlikely to refuse to grant leave to appeal. An objection to the jurisdiction of the Judge is just the right of all others which is most sacred. Therefore it would be very peculiar if the effect of the Act of Sederunt were to take away this right. Accordingly, I do not think that that is its meaning at all. I think the phrase "liberty of advocacy," though not a very happy one, is equivalent to the "leave" spoken of in the 36th section of the Act of Parliament. If that is the true construction, then what the Act of Sederunt does is to prescribe the form in which leave is to be obtained in those cases in which it is required; and the Act of Sederunt would read—"leave to advocate must be obtained upon an application by petition to the Court, which must not contain any argument, but shall merely narrate the interlocutors to be advocated." That is the prescribed form in which leave is to be obtained. I am quite satisfied that the Act of Sederunt was not intended to go any further.

Process—Appeal—Competency—Judicature Act, 1825, 6 Geo. IV., c. 120, et. 40—Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828, sec. 5.—A Sheriff-substitute allowed a proof on 2d September, and thereafter pronounced three interlocutors discharging the diets for taking the proof and fixing new ones, stating in a note to his last interlocutor that no further indulgence would be allowed to the defender. The defender appealed to the Sheriff-principal, who dismissed the appeal. The Sheriff-substitute, on 15th December, assigned as a new diet of proof the 20th December. The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Appeal dismissed as not timeously presented, the interlocutor of 2d September requiring to be appealed against within fifteen days under the 40th section of the Judicature Act and the 5th section of the A. S. of 1828, and the interlocutor of 15th December not being an allowance of proof or the renewal of an allowance of proof.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Forfarshire.
M.

J. & W. KINNES, Dundee, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire against Alexander G. Fleming.

On 2d September 1880 the Sheriff-substitute (Cheyne) allowed a proof, and assigned the 23d of September as a diet of proof.

On 23d September a joint minute was tabled, craving the Court to dismiss the action, but one of the pursuers having appeared, and stated that he had not given his authority to the joint minute, and that he wished the action to proceed, the Sheriff-substitute discharged the diet of proof for that day.

On 6th October the Sheriff-substitute assigned as a new diet of proof the 20th October.

On 15th October the Sheriff-substitute discharged the diet, and assigned as a new diet the 23d October.

On 23d October the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—

"In respect it is stated by the defender that his former agent has ceased to act for him, and that he has not had time to instruct another agent, discharges the diet of proof fixed for to-day, and assigns as a new diet Monday the 1st day of November next, at half-past ten o'clock forenoon, within the Sheriff Court house here: Finds the defender liable in the expenses consequent upon this adjournment; modifies these," &c. The Sheriff-substitute added in a note,—“It is with some difficulty that I have allowed this adjournment, and the defender must understand distinctly that no further indulgence will be given him.”

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Maitland Heriot), who, on 30th November, dismissed the appeal.

The Sheriff-substitute then pronounced this interlocutor:—“15th December 1880.—The Sheriff-substitute, on pursuers' motion, assigns as a new diet of proof Monday the 20th day of December current, at eleven o'clock forenoon, within the Sheriff Court house, Dundee.”

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued that the action could not proceed in respect of the joint minute by the parties.

In support of the competency of the appeal the appellant relied on the 40th section of the Judicature Act,* and the 5th section of the Act of Sederunt 11th July 1828 (quoted in the Lord President's opinion), and argued that the interlocutor of 15th December 1880 was one allowing a proof.¹

No appearance was made for the respondents.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This appeal is presented under the authority of the 40th section of the Judicature Act of 1825.

The last interlocutor pronounced in the cause is dated 15th December 1880, and in it “the Sheriff-substitute, on pursuers' motion, assigns as a new diet of proof Monday the 20th day of December current.” That is not an appealable interlocutor on the face of it. But it is said that the proof which was directed to proceed by that interlocutor was allowed by a previous interlocutor dated 2d September, and that if it be competent to bring under review the interlocutor of 2d September, then this appeal may be sustained. Strangely enough the Judicature Act does not assign a time within which interlocutors may be appealed for jury trial. It therefore becomes necessary to see if there is any other limit in point of time. The Act of Sederunt of 12th November 1825, which immediately followed the Judicature Act, regulates a good many things which were not regulated by the Judicature Act itself, and the Act of Sederunt of 11th July 1828 repeals a great many of the regulations of the Act of Sederunt of 1825. It is not necessary to refer to the terms of the older Act of Sederunt. The fifth section of the Act of Sederunt of 1828 is thus expressed,—“Whereas it is enacted by section 40 [of the Judicature Act] that in all cases originating in the inferior Courts in which the claim is in amount over £40, as soon as an order or interlocutor allowing proof shall be pronounced . . . it shall be competent to advocate such cause to the Court of Session, it is enacted and declared . . . that if . . . neither party within fifteen days in the ordinary case, and in causes before the Courts of Orkney and Shetland within thirty days after the date of such interlocutor allowing a proof, shall intimate in the inferior Court the passing of a bill of advocation, such proof may immediately thereafter effectually proceed in the inferior Court . . . and if within these periods respectively no intimation shall be made of any such bill of advocation the proof shall then proceed, and the bill, if such have been presented, together with the passing thereof, shall be held to fall as if such bill had never been presented." Now, this regulation does not in so many words say that the bill of advocation must be presented within fifteen days, but it implies it, because it says that failing such bill being presented the proof is to proceed in the inferior Court, and after this no application to remove the case from the inferior Court could be sustained.

* “ . . . In all cases originating in the inferior Courts, in which the claim is above £40, as soon as an order or interlocutor allowing a proof has been pronounced in the inferior Courts . . . it shall be competent to either of the parties who may conceive that the cause ought to be tried by a jury to remove the process into the Court of Session . . . ”

All difficulty is set aside when we look at the cases which have been decided under the Act. In the case of M'Farlane or Graham v. Duke of Montrose, Nov. 24, 1826, 5 Shaw, 38, new ed. 36, it was held "that fifteen days having elapsed from the date of an interlocutor in the inferior Court allowing a proof before a bill of advocation was presented, the bill was incompetent, although it was presented within fifteen days from the time a commission was granted for taking the proof; and (2d) that the limitation in point of time prescribed by the Act of Sederunt 12th November 1825 is not ultra vires of the Court." That case was in the First Division of the Court. In the same volume there is another case in the Second Division of the Court, viz., Falconer v. Sheills & Co., July 10, 1827, 5 S. 919, new ed. 853. There it was held "that an advocation under section 40 of the Judicature Act of a cause in which an interlocutor allowing a proof has been pronounced is incompetent, under the Act of Sederunt following on the Judicature Act, after the lapse of fifteen days from the date of the interlocutor; and (2) that it was not ultra vires of the Court to impose this limitation on the power of advocating, though given in the statute without limitation." That case occurred in the Second Division, and the Judges "entering great doubts of the judgment of the case of M'Farlane, ordered cases for the opinion of the whole Court. But the consulted Judges having returned a unanimous opinion that not only from the terms of the Act of Sederunt 12th November 1825, but from the particular circumstances of this case, the said interlocutor is right, and ought to be adhered to," the reclaiming note was refused accordingly. The interlocutor refuses the advocation as incompetent, proceeding on the decision of the First Division in the case of M'Farlane or Graham v. Montrose, and it was thus settled by a judgment of the whole Court that fifteen days from the time when an interlocutor allowing a proof had been pronounced was the time within which advocation was competent under the Act of Sederunt following the Judicature Act.

Advocation having been abolished by the Court of Session Act of 1868, I may refer to a case which occurred after the passing of that Act—Ritchie v. Ritchie, Oct. 22, 1870, 9 Macph. 43—which affords a direct authority to the effect that the appeal must be taken within fifteen days after the interlocutor allowing a proof.

Therefore the appellant, not having appealed in time against the interlocutor of 2d September, must fall back on the interlocutor of 15th December 1880; and the ground on which he maintains that he is entitled to bring it under review is that it is a new allowance of proof. Now, we must observe precisely what the procedure has been. After the original allowance of proof two other diets were successively fixed by the Sheriff-substitute, and he thereafter pronounced this interlocutor :—" In respect it is stated by the defender that his former agent has ceased to act for him, and that he has not had time to instruct another agent, discharges the diet of proof fixed for to-day ; and assigns as a new diet Monday the 1st day of November next, at half-past ten o'clock forenoon, within the Sheriff Court house here : Finds the defender liable in the expenses consequent upon this adjournment ; modifies these," &c. In a note he says that he allowed the adjournment with some difficulty. The appellant appealed to the Sheriff, who did not pronounce an interlocutor till 30th November, when he dismissed the appeal. When the case came again before the Sheriff-substitute on 15th December he assigned a new diet of proof. This was merely a matter of course ; it was the right of the pursuer to have a proof. The defender had caused the delay. Mr Rhind referred to one case in support of his contention that this interlocutor of 15th December was a renewal of an order for proof. That was the case of Murphy v. M'Keand, 15th Feb. 1866, 4 Macph. 444. The question in that case was the competency of an appeal, not to this Court, but from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff. The case was sought to be made an authority in the present case on the ground that the words of the Act there in question are identical with those of the 40th section of the Judicature Act. I am willing to assume that they are the same ; but what was the nature of the case of Murphy ? It was a case in which the petitioner sought to have an interdict which would have the effect of stopping a diligence. The petitioner had been allowed great indulgence, and had done nothing, and when the Sheriff-substitute pronounced the interlocutor appealed against the petitioner had lost his right to lead a proof. The interlocutor was a renewal of the proof previously granted, and that allowance was absolutely necessary. In my opinion I am reported to have used this expression—" I have no doubt that an interlocutor reviving allowance of proof is the same as one allowing a proof." To that expression I adhere. It is just because this interlocutor is not an allowance of proof or a renewal of an allowance of proof that I think the appeal is incompetent.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD DEAS was absent.

After the advising the respondents appeared by counsel and asked expenses. The Court refused to give expenses.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—" Having considered the question of the competency of the appeal, and heard counsel for the appellant thereupon, refuse the appeal as incompetent, and decern."

Where a heritable property was conveyed in consideration of a debt due by the disponent to the disponent, but subject to a bond over the property, held that the consideration on which ad valorem duty fell to be paid was the debt due by the disponent plus the amount of the burden.

IN the liquidation of the City of Glasgow Bank one of the partners, John Dove, residing in Glasgow, being unable to pay the calls in full, entered into a compromise with the liquidators. It was agreed that he should convey to the liquidators certain heritable subjects belonging to him, his interest in which, after deducting a bond over them for £2400, was valued at £2350. He executed a conveyance of the subjects accordingly, bearing that it was in extinction of his debt to the extent of £2350.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue having been applied to to fix the stamp-duty, held "that, in terms of section 73 of 'The Stamp Act, 1870,'* the instrument was a conveyance on sale. That the property was conveyed in consideration of the debt or liability of the grantor to the grantees to the extent of £2350, and subject to the payment of money, to wit, £2400, charged on the property, and that the said debt or liability and the said money they deemed the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance was chargeable with the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty.

The said liquidators declared themselves dissatisfied with the determination of the said Commissioners, on the ground that, upon a sound construction of the foresaid statute, stamp-duty is only exigible upon the sum of £2350. That sum is, and is stated in the said disposition to be, the value of the grantor's interest in the subjects thereby conveyed; and the extinction of the grantor's liability to the grantees to the extent of that sum was the consideration in respect of which the said disposition was granted. The only subject of the conveyance was the disponent's reversionary interest in the property. The bondholders' interest in the property was a separate estate, and was unaffected by the conveyance."

At the request of the liquidators a case was stated by the Commissioners for the opinion of the Court.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue with regard to the proper stamp to be impressed upon a deed the terms of which are set forth in the case. By that deed a person of the name of William Dove, who is described as "heritable proprietor of the subjects hereinafter disposed," sets out that he was a contributory in the liquidation of the City of Glasgow Bank, and that certain calls were made upon him which he was unable to meet; that a compromise had been arranged between him and the liquidators; and that as part of that compromise it was agreed that "I should dispoise to the said bank the said subjects, my interest in which (after deducting the principal sum contained in the bond and disposition in security (hereinafter mentioned) is valued in the declaration and relative schedule lodged by me with the said liquidators with reference to the said compromise, and that in extinction to that extent of my present and future liability to the said bank." Therefore he proceeds to dispose the subjects in question in the usual form of a disposition, and the clause of warrandice is thus expressed,—“And I grant warrandice, but excepting therefrom a bond and disposition in security affecting the said subjects hereby disposed, for the sum of £2400 sterling,” granted by certain persons who are named, and dated in May 1865.

No. 75.

Jan. 15, 1881.

Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank.

Now, the Commissioners are of opinion that this was a conveyance on sale, and that the property was conveyed in consideration of the debt or liability of the grantor to the grantee to the extent of £2350, and subject to the payment of money, to wit, £2400, charged on the property, and that the said debt or liability and the said money they deemed the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance was chargeable with the ad valorem conveyance on sale duty.

The liquidators, on the other hand, at whose request this case has been stated, maintain that the ad valorem stamp with which the deed ought to be impressed is upon the sum of £2350, being the amount of the contributory's liability to them, the discharge of which they say is the proper and only consideration of the conveyance.

Now, the question which is raised depends upon the construction of the 73d section of the Stamp Act of 1870, being the existing Stamp Act. But a good deal of light may be thrown upon the construction of that section by the history of legislation upon this subject. There are two previous statutes in which this matter is dealt with; and the first of these is the Act 55 Geo. III. cap. 184, in the schedule of which, under the title “Conveyance,” it is provided “that where any property is sold and conveyed subject to any debt or sum of money to be afterwards paid by the purchaser, the same shall be deemed to be purchase or consideration money in respect whereof the said ad valorem duty charged upon the sale and conveyance of property is to be paid.” Now, there is a plain distinction made there, or at least implied in that language, between a burden upon the property conveyed for the discharge of which the purchaser is personally bound, and one which constitutes a mere burden on the estate with no personal obligation against the purchaser. And it appears in the present case that the burden of £2400 upon the property in question is constituted by a bond and disposition in security granted by a previous owner of the estate, and unless there had been some mode of transferring the personal obligation against Mr Dove, the grantor of the disposition, he of course is not personally bound for payment of that debt, although he would have a very sufficient interest to pay off the debt, because it constituted a burden upon what has now become his property. Under this statute, 55 Geo. III., it was, I think, very naturally held, in the case of the Marquis of Chandos v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 1851, 20 L. J. Exch. 269, by the English Court of Exchequer, that where there was no personal obligation upon the purchaser it was not intended by the Act that the amount of the burden should be taken as part of the consideration of the conveyance. It was in consequence of the judgment so pronounced that an enactment of a very different kind was introduced into the next Stamp Act, 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 59, by the 10th section of which, after reciting that portion of the 55 Geo. III. which I have already read, and proceeding upon this further consideration, “Whereas it has been held and determined that the said

No. 75. ad valorem duty is payable in respect of any such sum or debt only where the purchaser is personally liable or bound, or undertakes or agrees, to pay the same, or to indemnify the vendor against the same, and it is expedient to alter and amend the law in this respect," the statute proceeds to enact that "Where any lands or other property shall be held and conveyed subject to any mortgage, wadset, or bond, or other debt, or to any gross or entire sum of money, such sum of money or debt shall be deemed the purchase or consideration money, or part of the purchase or consideration money, as the case may be, in respect whereof the said ad valorem duty shall be paid, notwithstanding that the purchaser shall not be or become personally liable, or shall not undertake or agree, to pay the same, or to indemnify the vendor or any person against the same, anything in any Act or otherwise to the contrary notwithstanding."

Jan. 15, 1881.
Commissioners of Inland Revenue
v. Liquidators
of City of Glasgow Bank.

Now, that is a very plain alteration of the previous enactment, and provides that the burden subject to which the estate is conveyed shall be deemed to be part of the purchase money, whether the vendee be personally liable to pay for it or not. If this case had occurred under that statute I do not understand the liquidators to contend that the determination of the Commissioners would be wrong. But they say that the provision of the 73d section of the existing Act is very different from this, and that its true construction leads to an opposite result. Now, the section in question is no doubt differently expressed from that which occurs in the Act 16 and 17 Vict. But the reason why it is so expressed, I apprehend, is this, that it is intended to state the matter more shortly, and, at the same time, in compliance with a rule which is now very generally observed in statutes which are intended to be applicable to the whole United Kingdom, and particularly statutes of this description,—Revenue Acts,—the language employed is not technical language either of the law of England or of the law of Scotland, but language of a popular character, equally intelligible in all parts of the United Kingdom.

Keeping that in view, let us see what is provided by the 73d section—"Where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration wholly or in part of any debt due to him"—that is, to the donee—"or subject either certainly or contingently to the payment or transfer of any money or stock, whether being or constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property or not, such debt, money, or stock is to be deemed the whole or part, as the case may be, of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable with ad valorem duty." Now, there is one part of this enactment about which there is no dispute as applicable to the present case. The property is conveyed in consideration partly of a debt due to the purchaser—that is to say, in consideration of that debt being discharged. The liquidators admit that to that extent they are liable in ad valorem duty. We shall therefore eliminate that part of this clause of the statute altogether in considering this matter, and see what are the further words of the enactment applicable to this burden of £2400, subject to which the conveyance is made—"Where any property is conveyed subject to the payment or transfer of any money, whether it be a charge upon the property or not, such money is to be deemed part of the consideration in respect whereof the conveyance is chargeable." These are the words of the clause applicable to the case we have to deal with. Now, is not the amount of this bond and disposition in security a sum of money subject to which this property is conveyed? I really cannot conceive anything more simple than the answer to that question. There cannot be the least doubt that the property in the hands of the purchasers, the liquidators, is subject to this bond and disposition in security for £2400, and when they pay off that bond, if they think fit to do so, they will then be the unburdened proprietors of a subject the price and value of which is £4750. Therefore it seems most reasonable, if it is necessary to look at the reason of the thing at all, to hold that, as they can put themselves to-morrow in the position of being the unburdened proprietors of this estate, by paying in addition to the sum that they have already given the sum contained in this bond, they have obtained a conveyance to that estate of the value of £4750 by means of the deed which is now to be stamped.

If any other rule were adopted, it is quite plain that the fair incidence of this tax would be altogether frustrated and defeated. A proprietor has an estate worth £20,000. There is a bond upon it for £10,000. He sells that estate, and the purchaser pays to him the difference between the amount of the bond and the value of the estate, so that the bond being for £10,000 he pays £10,000. The day after he obtains infestment he pays off the bond. Well, the practical result of that is that he has paid £20,000 as the purchase money of this estate, and he has obtained a conveyance with an ad valorem stamp of the value of £10,000. That is a simple defeating of the purpose and intention of the Legislature as expressed in this clause, and therefore I think, upon the plain meaning of this section, that there was no intention whatever to go back upon the enactment of the 16 and 17 Vict., and to restore the enactment of the 55 Geo. III., which is what the liquidators are contending for. On the contrary, it seems to me that the 73d section plainly intended to continue the provision of the statute 16 and 17 Vict., and therefore that the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are right.

No. 75.

Commissioners of Inland Revenue
v. Liquidators
of City of Glasgow Bank.

LORD MURK.—I have come to the conclusion that the Commissioners have taken a right view of this section of the statute. There can be no doubt of this, that when under the Act 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 59, sec. 10, a property was sold subject to a mortgage or subject to a bond the value or amount of that mortgage or bond was to be taken into consideration in fixing the ad valorem duty. That is the express provision of the section which your Lordship has read, and which proceeds upon a preamble of the older Act of 55 Geo. III. having made somewhat different and more limited provision. But in this 10th section, as I read it, I do not find the words which occur in the 73d section of the later Act, viz., "where any property is conveyed to any person in consideration, wholly or in part, of any debt due to him"—that is, due to the party to whom it is conveyed. And when the argument was proceeding it appeared to me, having regard to the peculiar terms of the phraseology of the 73d section of the Act of 1870, that there might be a point raised as to whether the debt due to the purchaser was not put alternatively as something separate from the payment of money chargeable against the property, and was to be taken as the consideration only when there was no money so chargeable. But on further consideration I am satisfied that that construction is not a sound one; for it appears to me that the intention of the 73d section was unquestionably to bring within the provisions of the Revenue Act as a consideration a debt due to the purchaser, while there is at the same time nothing to shew that it was intended by that section to put an end to the provisions of the 16 and 17 Vict. by which in a sale of property subject to a mortgage a value was to be put upon that mortgage. The words of the 73d section are, I think, broad enough to cover both. The debt due to the purchaser,

- No. 75. if the property is not subject to a mortgage or money payment, will be the consideration; but if the property is subject to a mortgage or money payment at the time when it is conveyed for a debt due to the purchaser then both are to be taken as making up the consideration. That, I think, is the fair construction of the statute, and I agree with your Lordship that the Commissioners are right.

Commissioners of Inland Revenue
v. Liquidators of City of Glasgow Bank.

LORD SHAND.—If the Court had to decide this question on the terms of the Stamp Act of 1870, without the light of the previous legislation on the subject. I should have felt it to be attended with very great difficulty, because I think there is much room for the argument maintained on behalf of the liquidators of the bank that the word “payment” in sec. 73 of the statute, occurring in the clause, “subject either certainly or contingently to the payment of any money or stock,” ought to be limited to a case in which there was a personal obligation to pay money, and would not include the case where the money or stock was a burden merely upon land without a personal obligation. But I think the difficulty is entirely removed when the previous legislation is regarded. By the statute 16 and 17 Vict. cap. 59, passed in 1853, which amended the law as it had previously existed under the Act 55 Geo. III., it was substantially provided that where a person purchased property for a valuable consideration, subject to any mortgage or pecuniary burden, the amount of the debt or mortgage should be deemed to be a part of the consideration. The result of that statute, I think, was this, that in such a case—a case in which there was, in the first place, so much money paid or a debt extinguished, and, in the next place, the property was conveyed subject to a burden—the stamp-duty payable was to be paid upon the value of the property which the purchaser acquired; and the mode of ascertaining that value was to take the sum which he was paying for the amount of the debt which he was discharging, and in addition the amount of the burden upon the property as fixed by the mortgage. The including of the amount of the mortgage in the consideration was very deliberately done by the Legislature in 1853, in consequence of the decision to which your Lordship has referred, and for a period of seventeen years so stood the law. But in 1870 the statute was passed which we have now to construe, and it is to be observed that while there is no doubt that to a considerable extent additional duties were given to the Crown by its provisions, the main purpose of the statute was really to consolidate the legislation in regard to stamp-duties with a view to the repeal of the then existing Acts, which were numerous and somewhat confusing, and which were repealed accordingly in the same session of Parliament. Now, having that in view, that this was substantially a consolidation statute, and that there is no declaration in the statute, either directly or which can be inferred from its terms, that there was any intention to go back upon that which had been done deliberately in 1853, I think, keeping that in view, there is no difficulty in the construction of the language of sec. 73. Your Lordship has fully gone over the terms of that section, and I do not mean to go over it in detail, but it appears to me, keeping in view what the existing law was, that it was intended by the section in briefer terms to preserve the law upon the same footing. The enactment is, that where the consideration is partly the discharge of a debt and partly a payment of money or stock, whether constituting a charge upon the property or not, the amount of that charge shall be a part of the consideration, and I think the word “payment” there is intended to cover the case in which the party is under an obligation to meet the burden, or, it may be, to give stock in return, while the words "constituting a charge or incumbrance upon the property" are intended to cover the case where that is the only way in which the burden is mentioned, and although there be no obligation to pay. On the whole matter, therefore, I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the Commissioners have come to a right decision.

Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy.

Interdict—Enforcing interdict against buildings erected pendente lite—Nobile officium—Equitable compensation for legal rights—Burgh—Administration of burgh property.—An inhabitant of a burgh was successful in interdicting the magistrates from erecting municipal stables on a piece of ground held by them for behoof of the inhabitants of the burgh as a bleaching-green and place of recreation. At the date when the process of interdict was commenced the magistrates had already entered into contracts for the buildings, and the works had been begun. Interim interdict was refused, and the stables were completed at an expense of £2000 before interdict was granted. In an action at the instance of the interdictor to have the buildings removed and the ground restored to its former state the magistrates offered to make over to the community a piece of ground near the ground in dispute and of double the size. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Adam) (1) that the Court had power to allow equitable compensation to be made in lieu of ordaining the removal of the buildings; and (2) that it was for the interest of the community that the offer of the magistrates should be accepted, and that the magistrates should be assoilized on lodging in process a conveyance of the subjects in terms of their offer.

(SEQUEL to Grahame v. Magistrates of Kirkcaldy, June 19, 1879, ante, 2D DIVISION. vol. vi. p. 1066.)

Lord Adam.
I.

Grahame having, on 19th June 1879, obtained an interdict against the Magistrates and Police Commissioners of the burgh of Kirkcaldy prohibiting them from erecting stables or other buildings upon a small portion of what was formerly the south links of Kirkcaldy, called the Volunteers' Green, raised on 6th March 1880 an action against the Magistrates and Police Commissioners in which he concluded for declarator (1) that the portion of the south links referred to was vested in the Magistrates in perpetuity for the use and enjoyment of the inhabitants; (2) that this portion of the south links had always been open to the inhabitants for bleaching clothes and other purposes and for recreation; (3) that the Magistrates and Police Commissioners had no right to erect buildings on this ground; (4) that the erection of buildings was illegal, unauthorised, unwarranted, and to the prejudice of the interests of the inhabitants of the burgh; and decree of declarator having been pronounced in terms of the above conclusions, that the Magistrates and Police Commissioners should be ordained to take down the stables and buildings they had erected on the ground, and restore the ground to its former state and condition. In the condescendence Grahame narrated the procedure in the action of suspension and interdict, and also in a former action in the Sheriff Court of Fifeshire in 1854, when a similar question had been tried and decided against the Magistrates. He further stated that at the date when the

No. 76. interdict was applied for, 6th May 1878, the buildings had only been commenced, and if the Magistrates had stopped building then little or no expense would have been incurred, but instead of doing so, they had, in the face of that proceeding, continued their operations, and the buildings were now completed.

Grahame v.
Magistrates of Kirkcaldy.

The Magistrates in their answers stated,—“At the time when the interdict was applied for the defenders were not only under heavy contracts, but had a considerable portion of the work actually executed, and neither the pursuer nor any others had up to that time intimated the least intention of interfering. Interim interdict was not granted, and the defenders, therefore, looking to the extent to which they were entangled by engagements already contracted, and to the urgent necessity of the buildings, completed the work during the progress of the action. The total cost of the building is £1889, 10s. 5d., including £290, 13s., the price paid for the site.” They also added,—“The inhabitants have not used the said piece of ground as an ordinary bleaching green for upwards of forty years, but the defenders are nevertheless willing to provide another piece of ground for the purposes of bleaching and recreation, of greater size and in a more convenient situation. A plan shewing the situation of the ground in question is herewith produced—its extent is 569 acres. The extent of the ground in dispute is only 256. The defenders have already endeavoured to satisfy the pursuer in this.”

Grahame pleaded, inter alia ;—(5) The question of the pursuer's rights being now res judicata he is entitled to have the said buildings removed, and to have the ground restored to its former state, as concluded for.

The Magistrates pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer, having permitted the defenders to proceed with their operations without objection, is now barred from insisting on the removal of the buildings. (2) The defenders having acted in bona fide, and having offered a full compensation for the ground in dispute, the pursuer is not entitled to decree as concluded for.

The Lord Ordinary, on 23d June 1880, pronounced an interlocutor on the terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

The Magistrates reclaimed, and argued ;—The Magistrates at the time the interdict was raised had entered into all the contracts for the erection of the stables, and if they had thrown up these contracts in the face of * “NOTE.—This case is the sequel of a former case between the same parties, decided by the Court on 19th June 1879, and reported 6 Ret., 1066.

“It is with regret that the Lord Ordinary has pronounced the preceding interlocutor, but he does not think that any other alternative is open to him.

“It is not a case in which the proceedings of the defenders, which have been found to be illegal, can be met by any pecuniary compensation to the pursuer. The compensation, accordingly, which the defenders offer to give, is to provide another piece of ground of greater size, and in a more convenient situation than that of which they have wrongously taken possession. In other words, they propose to give another ‘green’ in place of this one, in another though not so distant part of the town. The ‘green’ proposed to be substituted may probably be in a more convenient situation for many of the inhabitants of the town, but it would not appear to be so for the pursuer and the other inhabitants who live in the vicinity of the present one. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that such inhabitants have reasonable grounds for objecting to the proposal, and that they are entitled to insist that matters shall remain in that respect in statu quo. The proposal now made by the defenders seems to be similar to that which they recently endeavoured to obtain authority to carry into effect by Act of Parliament, but which the Legislature refused to authorise.

“The Lord Ordinary was referred to the case of Cooper and M'Leod v. The Edinburgh Improvement Trustees, 18th July 1876, 3 Ret., 1106, but he does not think that it applies to the present case.”

that action a large sum of money would have been lost to the community. They were in the bona fide belief that in acting as they did they were doing their best for the inhabitants of the burgh, and were within their rights. The Court had not granted interim interdict, and the buildings had therefore been proceeded with to completion. If they were now taken down the loss would be very great to the funds of the burgh, much greater than any corresponding advantage which would be gained by the inhabitants in having the ground restored to its original state. Moreover, the Magistrates were prepared to give to the inhabitants a piece of ground in close proximity to the ground in question, and of much greater size. The Court had more than once indicated and held that in such a case where restitutio in integrum was impossible, or only possible at an extravagant loss, the substitution of an equivalent would satisfy the equity of the case.¹

Grahame v.
Magistrates of Kirkcaldy.

Argued for Grahame;—The removal of the buildings was the logical result of the previous judgment of the Court.² The Magistrates had had sufficient notice of opposition, and should not have gone on with the buildings in the face of it.

LORD GIFFORD.—This case the Lord Ordinary very properly calls a sequel to a former case between the same parties, having reference to the same piece of ground—a part of what is known as the Volunteers' Green—at Kirkcaldy, of which the inhabitants of that town have hitherto had full and unrestricted use. Both cases have been raised at the instance of the respondent Grahame, who comes forward as a member of the community to prevent the Magistrates encroaching upon the ground in question. In the former case the respondent succeeded in having it decided that the Magistrates were not entitled to encroach upon it so as to deprive the community from getting the use of it as a bleaching-green and to apply it to some other purpose, even although that other purpose was one in which the community were interested. That has been the decision of this Court.

But then Grahame comes with this action, asking the Court to remove, or order to be removed, from that ground a stable, or a set of stables, of considerable extent, erected by the Magistrates as the town's stables at considerable cost; and the question is, whether the Court are to accede to this motion or not—the motion, namely, to order the removal of these stables from the Volunteers' Green, at whatever risk or cost.

Now, this is a case in which the pursuer is founding and insisting on his strict legal rights. He says that it is for the interest of the community, of which he is a member, that this piece of ground, which has hitherto been put to all sorts of common purposes, should and must, at all hazards and at whatever cost, be kept clear of all erections. He cannot, and he does not, aver that the community are so interested in it that the expense of the removal will not virtually cost the community more than it is worth; but he says the Court are bound, without considering questions of expediency, or, generally, the interest of the community at all, to order the removal of the buildings as the logical sequence of their former judgment. Now, I cannot but record my dissent from that proposition. I do not think it follows that because a party is successful in a declaratory action—an action declaring that a certain piece of ground shall not

Cases have been referred to by counsel for the appellants, and I think there are a great many others which have not been referred to, where, encroachments having been made in excusable circumstances, the Court declined to order the demolition of the buildings, as that would not be doing substantial justice between the parties where their interests could otherwise be sufficiently protected.

Shame v.
Magistrates of Kirkcaldy.

Now, the question in this case is, what is the fair construction of the respondent's rights as a member of the community in the circumstances which have arisen? In neither of the actions is anything of the nature of a servitude claimed. In the declaratory action it was sought to be declared that the ground in question is vested in the Magistrates and Council on the condition that the same should be kept in perpetuity for the use and enjoyment of the inhabitants of Kirkcaldy for the purposes of bleaching clothes, recreation, and other similar purposes; that the defenders have no right or title to dig foundations in, or in any way to trench or cut up for building purposes, the said lands, nor to erect stables or any other buildings or erections of any kind thereon, or on any part thereof, and so on. We heard nothing, and we have heard nothing yet, of rights of servitude of view, or right of seeing over this disputed ground. That was not the case at all; if that had been the case its complexion would possibly have been considerably changed. That would have been a right—a special right—of certain uses in this ground. The claim was and is that this ground is held under titles for behoof of the community of Kirkcaldy, who seem to have used it chiefly, if not solely, for a bleaching-green. It may have been put to other common purposes, but substantially it was a bleaching-green. Men may have played at quoits over it, or other games, and children may have tumbled about upon it; but these were all accessory to its use as a piece of open grass-covered ground.

Dealing with it, therefore, as substantially a bleaching-green, the question comes to be, part of it having been illegally and improperly taken away by the Magistrates, what is to be done to remedy the error they committed?

The Magistrates say, and I think say very reasonably—"We are very sorry about this. We have taken a piece of this ground,"—something less than an acre I think it is—"and so far encroached on the bleaching privileges of the community. But we are quite willing to restore what we have taken, not quite fourfold, but to the extent of twice as much as has been taken away; and although the ground we will thus substitute will be in another place, it will be equally applicable to the purposes of walking or breathing the air, and it will also be a bleaching-green." No doubt this substituted ground is not in the same neighbourhood; it is a quarter of a mile away or something of that kind. But it so happens that the ground which has been improperly abstracted for bleaching purposes was adjacent to the existing bleaching-green; and nobody who considers the position of the two greens for a moment can doubt that the new green which is proposed will relieve the pressure on the old bleaching-green, coloured yellow on the plan. This will make the new bleaching-green as good as if it were beside the old, because the inhabitants who adjoin the new bleaching-green—coloured green on the plan—will no longer resort to the "yellow" green, which will thereby be substantially enlarged for those in the immediate vicinity.

Now, it does appear to me that this is a fair and reasonable proposal; and unless there is an absolute law compelling me to order the buildings to be taken down and the ground to be restored to its former condition—not a very good or sweet condition even at the best—I am disposed to give effect to the offer the Magistrates have made, and to find that in respect of that offer the Magistrates are not bound to demolish the buildings which have been erected on this vacant piece of ground.

Grahame v

Magistrate

Kirkcaldy.

But it is further said that these buildings have been put up by the Magistrates, not in any ignorance of the claims of the respondent, but in the face of an interdict which was applied for. Now, I think it sufficiently appears—it was even so stated by Grahame's counsel—that there was a great deal done before the interdict was sought. The walls were up to the height of six feet. Substantially the whole of the contracts had been entered into, although the wright's was not signed until, I think, the 8th of May. The mason's contract had, at all events, been signed some time previously, and the work, as we all now know, was being proceeded with. I think we have enough to prove—it came out incidentally, to say the least, in the former case—that several hundreds of pounds were expended. That, I think, was substantially carrying on the contract; and if the same question had been raised at that time it would have been a fair answer to have said—"Oh! no; don't let us lose these £700 or so that have been expended. We will give you another piece of ground, which will be more than an equivalent."

I am disposed, therefore, on the whole matter, to sustain the defence of the Magistrates so far as it is covered by the second plea stated for them, and to say that although they have done wrong they are not now to be compelled to demolish the buildings which they have erected in error, which would be to lose absolutely every sixpence which has been expended on the ground; but that they have made offer of a fair equivalent to the community—for it is the community we are dealing with—by tendering the substituted bleaching-green. I think the result thus arrived at will be the fair one. Indeed, I have no doubt as to the equity of the case at all.

LORD YOUNG.—Such cases are always cases of circumstances, and of more or less nicety, according to the facts on which they stand. It appeared to me from the time I understood this case, and it appears to me now, that the true consideration is, what is the interest of the community itself?—not that we are to enter upon nice questions on that head, but that if there be strong and preponderating interest one way or another, it appears to me that we are at liberty in regard to it, and being at liberty are reasonably bound to give effect to that which appears to be the strong preponderating interest of the community. The Magistrates of Kirkcaldy are proprietors of the ground in question, called the Volunteers' Green, for behoof of the community. As matter of title, I suppose they hold it upon royal grant, as part of the common good. Now, it is very important that open spaces should be preserved in towns, and especially in growing towns like Kirkcaldy, for air and recreation, and such useful purposes as are consistent with these things, and drying clothes too, which is all that is meant by bleaching here—putting out things to dry after a washing; and the Magistrates, as proprietors for behoof of the community, and the guardians of the interest of the community, are not at liberty to change the use of pieces of ground which have from time immemorial been kept as open spaces for air and light and exercise, drying clothes, and so forth. If they propose to interfere with that very wholesome and beneficial use, any of the members of the community may have a remedy by resorting to this Court. That is my view of the

No. 76. law of such cases, and I assume that it was upon that view of the law that the Court proceeded in that application for interdict at the instance of the present pursuer against the Magistrates, of which we have heard so much. Grahame said—"You, as the proprietors of this piece of ground for behoof of the community, and the guardians of the interest of the public in the matter, are not entitled to divert this piece of ground from its established wholesome use, in the continuance of which the community is interested." The Court granted interdict in the interest of the community.

hame v.
kcaldy.

Now, I have observed in the course of the argument here what appears to me to be according to the law of the matter, that if no one interfered, or called the conduct of the Magistrates in question in dealing with community property, or proposing to deal with it in a manner inconsistent with the public interest in it, their title is abundantly sufficient to give them a right to build houses. Why, Scotland in all its considerable towns is covered with illustrations of the law being to that effect; for there is scarcely a piece of ground—an open space of ground—dedicated to the use of the community for air and recreation that has not been diminished in size by being encroached upon by buildings erected under titles granted by the Magistrates. They have been diminished all of them, and some of them very notably so. In Edinburgh we have several instances of it. There is no question about the title of the Magistrates to do that; and no question about the right of this Court, on a complaint of any of the community, to hinder the Magistrates from so acting as to interfere with the legitimate interests of the community or to preserve the status quo.

Here it so happens that when the Court was appealed to for that purpose they refused to restrain the Magistrates, they being under contracts to erect these stables, and having proceeded a certain length with the erection of them. In the result they took the view that it was in the interests of the community that the space should be kept open, but before that was determined the buildings were completely up, and the present application is to have them demolished. It so happens that they can be demolished at a cost to the community of about £2000; but the demand of the respondent would, no doubt, have been the same if the cost of the demolition had been £10,000 or £20,000—any sum you choose to instance. Mr Kinnear said you might figure an instance in which the interest would be so large against granting an order for the removal of buildings which ought not to have been erected that the Court in the exercise of its reasonable discretion would refuse to direct their removal. Now, that is the very test we have to apply in this case. The building may have been of such a kind or of such an extent that we might not have hesitated to order its removal. On the other hand, the building might be such that it would really not be acting according to the reasonable discretion committed to us, in the interests of the very public in whose interest the action bears to be brought, to order the removal of the buildings. And I think that is the present case. It is only £2000, to be sure; but that is a considerable sum, taken in connection with a little bit of ground with such a history as this has—not the Volunteers' Green, be it remembered, but a little bit of it—which, according to the evidence about it—and I am taking the précis of it as given in the report of the former case—has been kept in a very nasty manner.

In these circumstances, and seeing that the erection of these buildings was entered upon not contumaciously, but bona fide in the interests of the community, I am not prepared to say we should order them to be removed at that cost. And the cost would be not merely the pecuniary loss—for I give the No Magistrates credit for being reasonable and intelligent guardians of the interests Jan. 7 of the community, and they have determined, I suppose with the approbation Grahams of the councillors elected by the public themselves, that this is the most con- Magist venient place for the municipal stables. Therefore the pursuer here does not Kirke ask us merely to demolish the buildings. We are not merely to order their removal, and destroy the labour and material to the extent of £2000—utterly destroy it—but we are to disappoint the community itself in the convenience which has been accomplished—a convenience which the Magistrates say is a convenience for them. In such circumstances I am not prepared to order the removal of these buildings, and I would not be prepared to order their removal even if there were more of them. I suppose the ground is under a quarter of an acre in size. It is a very little bit of ground altogether, and there is a large space of vacant ground adjoining on the opposite side of the street, which appears always to have been used in a more respectable manner than this part in question has been. It would be a stronger case of the kind if the ground had been less, only some square yards perhaps; but it would only have been stronger for proceeding on such grounds as I have been indicating; the principle would have been the same. Therefore, if there were any more buildings, I should not have ordered their removal.

But we have more than that here, and I attach great importance to it, although in my view of it it is a subsidiary and not the primary part of the case. The primary part of the defence in my view is that which I have been stating. But the further and subsidiary matter is nevertheless also of importance. It is this, that the Magistrates and Council, who are the intelligent and reasonable guardians of a community's interests, have shewn us on this record—and it is not substantially disputed—that they are prepared to provide another piece of ground for the purpose of bleaching and recreation, of greater size and more convenient situation. I take it that they will do that; and I think it should be put in the judgment as a condition of the buildings being allowed to remain that they will provide another piece of ground. It seems to be according to Lord Gifford's opinion, in which I concur, that the Magistrates and Council shall do that. It is their own undertaking, and I think they will do it. They have indicated the position of that substituted piece of ground by marking it on the plan before us, and they promise upon their responsibility as Magistrates, and the guardians of the community's interest, to provide another piece of ground for the purpose of bleaching and recreation, of greater size, and in a more convenient situation.

For these reasons, I entirely concur in sustaining the second plea in law which is here put forward in defence, and in refusing the conclusion of this action.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in the result at which your Lordships have arrived. The position of the case is this: The community, through one of their number, bring this proceeding for interdict against the administrators of the common good—the Magistrates—on the ground that the Magistrates have been making a use of the property of the burgh which is beyond their right, beyond their trust, and beyond their power. We have found that that is so, and we have interdicted them from building or erecting buildings upon this ground, or in any way interfering with it so as to prevent the public purposes

76. which we have held it was substantially intended to serve. It indeed turned out that there had been a much larger piece dedicated to those purposes at one time, and it had been, it was alleged, improperly diminished; but length of time had prevented any question, to say nothing of Parliamentary interference.

ne v.

In this case, before the interdict was granted, a certain part of the buildings complained of were in course of erection, and they were indeed erected before judgment was pronounced. The question is, whether to carry out that judgment it is essential that those buildings should now be removed? It is said they can only be removed at a cost of a couple of thousand pounds to the community, or to those who illegally put them up, but that that is no matter, and that they must be removed at whatever cost. In my opinion, there is only one ground upon which the contention in the negative can rest, and that is, that although any benefit which the community might have derived from the buildings could not for a moment protect them in law, yet that as the Magistrates are in a position to offer a fair and reasonable equivalent, seeing that restitutio in integrum was not reasonably possible, that offer should be accepted instead of restitutio in integrum, and instead of specific implement of the findings of the interlocutor.

But I think we are entitled to consider the question further. It is not a matter of whether the existing buildings will be more convenient for the community than if they were removed to another place. The question is, whether or not the offer of ground to fulfil the specific purpose to which the ground was originally dedicated should come in place of specific implement of the findings referred to. I must confess I should have expected a citation of authorities on this matter; but it seems to me to be within the equitable powers of the Court—where we are satisfied on the one hand that no interest will be endangered, and on the other hand that great loss will be incurred—to authorise a party to accept an equivalent for a right of this kind. I am much mistaken if there are not a great many instances to be obtained of public rights to the use of open spaces, of public rights to wells, and other rights of that kind, being dealt with in that way—an equivalent equally convenient, and much less burdensome to the party involved, being given.

I am inclined to dispose of the case solely on that ground. I do not find in this record, nor do I hear it from counsel, that if the suggestion of the parties here as a mode of settling the case were adopted, the rights of the community would not be effectually protected and preserved.

Therefore we shall sustain the second plea in law stated for the Magistrates, and the defenders in respect thereof shall be assoilzied, on condition that the ground offered as an equivalent, and coloured green on the plan, be given.

The Magistrates accordingly lodged in process a feu-charter granted by the Raith Trustees in their favour of the piece of ground referred to in the defences to be held by them for the community and inhabitants of the burgh as a public washing and bleaching-green and recreation ground.

THE COURT, on 19th January 1881, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"In respect of the offer made by the defenders to substitute for the ground in question the ground specified in the feu-contract, No. 13 of process, recall the said interlocutor: Sustain the second plea in law stated in defence: Assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decern," &c.

Husband and Wife—Paternity of Child—Presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant.—In the case of a wife separated from her husband the presumption pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant may be overcome by direct or circumstantial evidence.

Process—Expenses—Husband and Wife—Wife's expenses of Reclaiming Note refused.—Circumstances in which a wife reclaiming against a decree of divorce was refused the expenses of the reclaiming note.

THIS was an action of divorce, on the ground of adultery, by James 1st Dr Montgomery, feuar, Airdrie, against his wife, Margaret Edmonstone or Lord A Montgomery. F

After a proof the Lord Ordinary pronounced decree of divorce.

The defender reclaimed.

LORD MURK.—We have now before us a case of divorce at the instance of a husband, who has been living separate from his wife, the defender, for several years. It appears from the evidence that there had been frequent disagreements between the parties during their married life, followed by short separations; but in the latter part of 1877 there was a more formal separation, followed by a regular deed of separation, which was executed in February and March 1878. Under that deed it was arranged that the younger children were to live with their mother, in whose favour provisions were made for the support of herself and the children; and it was also provided that the pursuer should have access to his children when he wished to see them.

On this separation being effected the pursuer went to live in Glasgow, where he has ever since resided. The defender, on the other hand, continued to reside at Glenmavis, a village in the neighbourhood of Airdrie, and about twelve miles from Glasgow, where the parties were resident at the time of the separation. The pursuer had some property in or near this village, of which he took the charge, and which he required occasionally to visit, and, in point of fact, did visit from time to time after the separation. The defender remained at Glenmavis for a short time after the separation. She then removed to Dechmont, where she resided with her mother, and ultimately she took a house at Burnfoot, a small hamlet about a mile from Glenmavis, for which John More, the co-defender, was the factor, and where she went to reside in June 1878.

At this house the defender was delivered of a child in April 1879, a year and a half after the separation, so that the question now to be disposed of relates not only to the alleged adultery of the defender, but involves indirectly the paternity and legitimacy of the child; and the delicate and important question as to the amount of evidence which is necessary and sufficient to rebut the presumption founded on the rule "Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant," in a case where the parties, though separated, did not live at a great distance from each other, and may have met and had sexual intercourse. Because, whatever difficulty there may have been some years ago in laying down the law relative to the application of that rule in circumstances such as those which here occur, it may, I apprehend, be held as now authoritatively settled, both in this country and in England, that the rule may be met by direct, or even circumstantial evidence, sufficient to negative the presumption, and that in dealing with such a case the question to be disposed of is one of fact, viz., whether the circumstances

77. disclosed in evidence are such as to satisfy the Court that no sexual intercourse took place between the parties at the period when it is alleged that it occurred.

Chancery
b-

The law was so laid down in this Court in the case of Patterson, Nov. 29, 1872, 11 Macph. p. 142, to which we were referred in the course of this argument, and in England, in the case of Morris v. Davies, first by Lord Lyndhurst when sitting in the Court of Chancery, and afterwards by Lord Cottenham in the House of Lords on appeal in 1837, 5 Clark and Fin., p. 242. In the present case the Lord Ordinary has held that the evidence is sufficient to overcome the presumption, and that the defender committed adultery with one or other of the parties with whom she is alleged so to have conducted herself, or with some other person; and after careful consideration of the evidence I have come to the same conclusion.

In dealing with the case the main question for consideration is whether there is evidence to shew that the pursuer, as alleged by the defender, came to her house at Burnfoot one night in July 1878, and there had connection with her, and that her child was the result of that connection. If the evidence is not sufficient to instruct this allegation of the defender, the inference seems irresistible that the defender committed adultery with one or other of the parties mentioned in the record, who were both in the habit of visiting the defender, or with some other person unknown to the pursuer, as the Lord Ordinary has decided.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The special ground for Mr Asher's motion that his client should get the expenses of this reclaiming note is that the case was fully heard out by the Court, and he says that the only cases in which a wife who has defended such an action and reclaimed has been found not entitled to her expenses have been where the Court adhered to the interlocutor under review without calling on the respondent's counsel. I should be sorry to lay it down as a rule that expenses are never to be refused except in that case, for I can conceive cases where the Court, though quite clearly of opinion against the claimer, might yet think fit to call on the respondent's counsel. The law was so laid down in this Court in the case of Patterson, Nov. 29, 1872, 11 Macph. p. 142, to which we were referred in the course of this argument, and in England, in the case of *Morris v. WILLIAM GALBRAITH AND OTHERS, as testamentary trustees of the late 2^d Dr
Mr Walker, were proprietors of an area of ground situated about 90 yards Ld. Cu west from Eglinton Street—one of the principal thoroughfares in Glas- 1
gow on the south side of the River Clyde. This area of ground extended

" July 4, 1873.

Walker's

Caledonian
Railway Co.

" Caledonian Railway (Glasgow Central Station, &c.) Bill.

" GENTLEMEN,—In consideration of your withdrawing all further opposition to this bill, we, the Caledonian Railway Company, do hereby undertake that if and so far as you or any of you are, in the judgment of the arbiters or oversman or jury to be appointed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, as aftermentioned, injuriously affected by the construction of any of the works authorised by this bill, your claim for compensation shall not be barred by reason of our not taking any part of your respective lands; and the amount of such compensation (if any), if not agreed upon, shall be determined in the manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, for the determination of cases of disputed compensation, but without prejudice to all claims competent to you or any of you, under and by virtue of the said Act and of any other Acts regulating the construction of railways, in all cases where the lands of you or any of you, or any part thereof, may be taken by us for the purposes of this Act."

The bill thereafter passed, and the company proceeded to execute their works. The access to Eglinton Street, which they substituted for those by Canal Street and Victoria Street, was by a road or street called Salkeld Street, which ran south for some distance parallel to Eglinton Street from a point 40 yards west from that street in Cook Street, a street considerably to the north of Canal Street, and running parallel to it. Salkeld Street crossed the new line of railway by means of a bridge and finally joined Eglinton Street at a point some distance to the south of Victoria Street. The accesses to Eglinton Street by Canal Street and Victoria Street had been perfectly level and straight, but the effect of the company's operations was to cause a considerable detour in going from Walker's trustees' property to Eglinton Street, and to change the gradients of the streets from level to 1 in 20.

On the completion of the works in January 1879 Walker's trustees served a statutory notice and claim on the railway company, in which they set forth that their property had been injuriously affected by their works, in so far as their accesses had been injured both in respect of detour and gradients. They claimed £7500 as compensation, and in event of that sum not being paid they called on the company to settle the same with them by arbitration in terms of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845. The railway company refused to entertain the claim, and Walker's trustees, on 11th February 1879, nominated George Bell, architect in Glasgow, as arbiter on their part. The railway company, on 24th February, under protest, nominated Thomas Binnie, valuator, Glasgow, as arbiter on their part. These gentlemen accepted of the office of arbiter on 12th and 14th March 1879, and appointed Mr M'Jannet, writer, Glasgow, to be oversman.

On 19th March 1879 the railway company presented a note of suspension and interdict, praying to have the arbiters and oversman interdicted from acting in the arbitration, and Walker's trustees interdicted from taking any steps of procedure under the arbitration or in any other way. They pleaded;—(1) The property of the respondents, trustees foresaid, not having sustained any permanent physical injury, nor been injuriously affected in the sense of the special Act, or of any of the Acts incorporated therewith, by the complainers' operations, the complainers are entitled to the interdict craved.

Walker's trustees lodged answers, and pleaded;—(1) The complainers having, as a condition of the respondents withdrawing their opposition to their Gordon Street Station Bill, given the undertaking of 4th July 1873, they are not entitled to suspend and interdict the proceedings under the arbitration provided for therein. (2) The complainers having, by the said undertaking, renounced any right they might have to refuse compensation on account of the respondents' land not being taken under the statutes, they are bound to proceed with the arbitration. (3) The complainers having by the said undertaking constituted arbiters the sole judges whether, and to what extent, the respondents' property is injuriously affected by the construction of the complainers' works, they are bound to adhere to the said arrangement, and to proceed with the arbitration. (4) The respondents' property having been injuriously affected within the meaning of the special Act and the Acts therewith incorporated, the respondents are entitled to compensation, and to have the same assessed in terms of the Lands Clauses Acts.

* "NOTE.—The respondents, Walker's trustees, are owners of certain subjects in the neighbourhood of Eglinton Street, Glasgow, and they claim from the complainers, the Caledonian Railway Company, compensation in respect of their said property having been injuriously affected by and through the execution of certain works by the complainers, in virtue of the powers conferred on them by 'the Caledonian Railway (Gordon Street, Glasgow, Station) Act, 1873.' For the purpose of settling the amount of compensation by arbitration, in terms of 'The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845,' the respondents nominated Mr George Bell, architect, Glasgow, to be arbiter on their part, and the complainers nominated Mr Thomas Binnie as arbiter on their part, but under protest that the respondents, Walker's trustees, had no right to any compensation, and that no dispute had arisen between the parties entitling the respondents to insist in the arbitration. Mr Bell and Mr Binnie accepted the office of arbiter, and appointed as oversman in the reference Mr William M'Jannet, writer in Glasgow, who accepted the office on 14th March 1879. The complainers, on 19th March, presented this note of suspension and interdict in the Bill-Chamber, for the purpose of having the respondents, Walker's trustees, and the arbiters and oversman, interdicted from proceeding with the arbitration. Interim interdict was granted on that day by Lord Adam, and was continued by Lord Gifford on 28th March 1879, on which day the note was passed for the trial of the questions upon which the parties are at issue. The record having been closed, and the cause having been very fully and ably argued in the procedure-roll, I have come to be of opinion that the Court ought not to interfere to prevent the arbiters from proceeding with the reference.

"The facts of the case, in so far as admitted, are as follows:—The respondents' property is at present occupied as a cotton mill, and is bounded upon the north by Canal Street, on the east by Francis Street, and on the south by Victoria Street. The east front of their premises is parallel to, and about ninety yards distant from, Eglinton Street, which is one of the main thoroughfares of the portion of Glasgow on the south side of the Clyde. Canal Street and Victoria Street are public highways, and were, until the operations of the complainers aftermentioned, level streets intersecting Eglinton Street at right angles, and affording direct and easy access between that street and the north and south sides of the respondents' property. At a considerable distance north of Canal Street there was, and still is, another street named Cook Street, running westwards from Eglinton Street and parallel to Canal Street, but there was no communication between Canal Street and Cook Street except by Eglinton Street. In 1873 the complainers applied to Parliament for powers to make a new line of railway on the site of part of the west side of Eglinton Street. It appeared to the respondents that if the proposed operations were sanctioned by Parliament, Canal Street and Victoria Street, and the access to Eglinton Street, would be so much interfered with that their property would be seriously injured, and they accordingly joined certain other owners of property in the neighbour-

The railway company reclaimed, and on 2d December 1879 the Second Division adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. In pronouncing hood in petitioning Parliament against the complainers' bill. While the bill was in dependence in the House of Lords, the committee of the House refused to hear the petitioners on the preamble, but intimated that they would be heard in support of clauses for the protection of their interests. Before any such clauses came to be discussed, the complainers (through their agents, Messrs Grahames & Wardlaw), prepared and offered to the petitioners the undertaking afterwards quoted, provided they would withdraw their petition. And the petitioners (including the present respondents) in respect of said undertaking, agreed to withdraw, and did withdraw their opposition to the bill—which thereafter was passed into law as 'The Caledonian Railway (Gordon Street, Glasgow, Station) Act, 1873.'

"In virtue of the powers contained in that Act the complainers have performed the following operations:—

"(1) They have converted into a line of railway, and otherwise applied to railway purposes, the whole of the west side of Eglinton Street between Canal Street and Victoria Street, and for a considerable distance to the north of Canal Street and to the south of Victoria Street, and they have thereby entirely blocked up the ends of these two streets, which formerly opened directly and on the level into Eglinton Street.

"(2) They have formed a new street called Salkeld Street, leading southward from Cook Street, and nearly parallel to Eglinton Street, until it reaches a point between Francis Street and Eglinton Street, where it crosses the complainers' new line of railway by means of a bridge, and it then bends in a south-easterly direction towards Eglinton Street, which it joins a short distance to the south of the former end of Victoria Street.

"(3) Both Canal Street and Victoria Street are thus connected with Salkeld Street, which now forms the respondents' only access to Eglinton Street. Instead of having two short, straight, and level accesses to that street, they have virtually only one, and that is not only circuitous, but steep. The gradient of Salkeld Street from the end of Canal Street to the top of the bridge is 1 in 27, —the gradient of Victoria Street from the respondents' premises to the top of the bridge in Salkeld Street is 1 in 19, and the gradient of Salkeld Street from Eglinton Street to the top of the bridge is correspondingly steep. The gradient of Canal Street itself, so far as it still exists, has not been altered, and Victoria Street, so far as it is ex adverso of the respondents' property, is still on the level. Access may now be had from the respondents' property to the north end of Eglinton Street by means of Salkeld Street and Cook Street; but that route is very circuitous.

"(4) No part of the respondents' property has been taken by the complainers, and none of these operations have been carried on ex adverso of that property.

"The respondents allege that their property has been injuriously affected by these operations of the complainers, in respect that 'they have demolished the houses and shops and other buildings forming the west side of Eglinton Street at this place, and substituted therefor a railway, thereby permanently taking away the thoroughfare from that part of the street. They have also shut up Canal Street, and diverted Victoria Street to the south, thereby causing a detour to all traffic entering or leaving the claimants' property, of 1032½ feet on the north and 150 feet on the south entrance, and they have further injured the gradients of these accesses from 1 in 712 to 1 in 19 on the south entrance, and from 1 in 158 to 1 in 34 on the north entrance. They have also obliged the claimants, in place of their former level entrances into Eglinton Street, to enter a narrow street or road called Salkeld Street, which neither has, nor ever can have, shops or buildings or thoroughfare, and by these operations they have greatly diminished the value of the claimants' property.' This quotation is taken from the formal claim and notice lodged by the respondents with the complainers, in which they demand, 'as compensation for the injury, loss, and damage to the said property, the sum of £7500 sterling.' In their record the judgment their Lordships confined their remarks to the effect of the undertaking granted by the railway company, which they held bound the respondents further aver that they have a special interest in these streets, which had been formed and maintained by them and their predecessors, and which formed the special, and indeed the only accesses to their property, and that the construction of railway works 'across the line of the foresaid streets, cuts off the access between the respondents' property and Eglinton Street, the leading thoroughfare of the district, and necessitates a long detour for all carts, carriages, and passengers coming to or leaving the respondents' works. The direct access which the respondents formerly had by the said street to Eglinton Street rendered their property more valuable, and by the construction of the complainers' said works it has been permanently damaged, and its value greatly diminished.'

"The complainers' answer to the case made by the respondents is substantially this, that the respondents' property 'has sustained no permanent or peculiar physical injury, and although the respondents, in using Victoria Street as altered, have to use at some distance from their property a somewhat steeper gradient than before, they have to do this in common with all the members of the public who require to use the said streets;' and they maintain that the injury which the respondents allege has been caused to their property is not such as can be made a ground of compensation under any of the statutes. In the present process of suspension they ask the Court to interdict the arbiter from proceeding with the statutory arbitration into which the respondents are desirous to force them.

"The respondents maintain that by the arrangement already referred to, which was made between them and the complainers while their bill was passing through Parliament, the complainers became absolutely bound to submit to arbitration the claim of the respondents. It is necessary therefore to examine with care the undertaking which was given to the respondents and the other petitioners while the bill was in the House of Lords. The letter, which is dated 4th July 1873, and which is addressed to the claimants, sealed with the common seal of the railway company, and signed by the secretary of the company, is in the following terms:—'Gentlemen,—In consideration of your withdrawing all further opposition to this bill, we, the Caledonian Railway Company, do hereby undertake that, if and so far as you are, in the judgment of the arbiters or oversman, or jury to be appointed under the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, as aftermentioned, injuriously affected by the construction of any of the works authorised by this bill, your claim for compensation shall not be barred by reason of our not taking any part of your respective lands, and the amount of such compensation, if any, if not agreed upon, shall be determined in the manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, for the determination of cases of disputed compensation; but without prejudice to all claims competent to you, or any of you, under and by virtue of the said Act and of any other Acts regulating the construction of railways, and in all cases where the lands of you, or any of you, or any part thereof, may be taken by us for the purpose of this Act.' I am inclined to think that that letter does not amount to an absolute undertaking to submit to arbitration whatever claim for compensation the respondents might bring forward on the ground that their property was 'injuriously affected.' I think that the true meaning of the undertaking was this, that although no part of the respondents' lands was taken by the railway company for the purposes of their Act, they were nevertheless to be entitled to insist before arbiters or a jury upon all claims, on the ground of their lands being injuriously affected, which would have been competent to them had any part of their lands been taken. I do not think that the letter, when fairly construed, binds, or was intended to bind the railway company to submit to arbitration any claim by the respondents for compensation, unless they should be in a position to allege that their lands were 'injuriously affected' within the meaning of the various Consolidation Statutes regulating such claims.

"This being so, the next question is, how far, in claiming compensation, the

No. 78. company to enter into the arbitration. Upon the relevancy of the grounds of damage set forth in the claim their Lordships reserved judgment.

Railway Co.

respondents are to be dealt with as landowners, part of whose lands have been taken by the complainers? It appears to me that any claim for compensation which the respondents may have in respect of their lands being 'injuriously affected' by the operations of the company may now be insisted in by them (irrespective altogether of the undertaking by the complainers in their letter) under section 6 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, which entitles an owner of land to compensation for lands 'taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof.' There are some kinds of damage, such as injury to amenity, for which compensation is not, in the general case, allowed, unless injury is caused to the rest of the estate by the operations of the company upon some part of the lands taken from the proprietor; and had the respondents been able to state a case of damage of that kind the complainers would have been barred by their letter from objecting that no part of the respondents' lands had been taken. But that is not the kind of case which is stated by the respondents. Compensation however is, by the Railway Clauses Act, allowed to all landowners whose lands are 'injuriously affected' by the construction of the works, whether any part of their lands has been taken by the company or not. And the 6th section provides that the amount of such compensation is to be ascertained and determined in the manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act for determining questions of compensation with regard to lands purchased or taken under the provisions thereof,—that is to say, by arbitration or by the verdict of a jury. The 6th section of the Railway Clauses Act deals with two distinct classes of landowners—(1) with owners, part of whose land is taken by a railway company, and (2) with owners whose lands, though not taken or used, are 'injuriously affected' by the construction of the works. Owners of the first class are to get compensation, not only for the value of the lands actually taken, but for severance, loss of amenity, and for everything which shall be held injuriously to affect the portion of the estate not taken by the company; while owners of the second class are to be entitled to compensation if their lands, though not taken or used, are 'injuriously affected' by the construction of the work. This distinction was very clearly pointed out by Lord Colonsay in his judgment in Hammersmith Railway Company v. Brand, 1869 (L. R., E. and I. Apps., vol. iv. 211). So that, unless the respondents' claim for compensation can be shewn to be one competent only to a landowner, part of whose lands has been taken by the railway company, they can really take no benefit from the undertaking given by the company in July 1873, because, if their lands are 'injuriously affected,' they have, under the 6th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, a statutory right to compensation.

"The next and the truly important question in this case is, whether the averments of injury to their lands made by the respondents are such as, if proved to the satisfaction of arbiters or of a jury, would in law entitle them to compensation. Questions of this kind are always attended with more or less difficulty, and there have been numerous decisions, both in this country and in England—several of them judgments of the House of Lords—all of which, however, it is not very easy at first sight to reconcile. But I think, on a careful study of these cases, it will be found that the principle which runs through them all is this:—That in order to found a claim for compensation in respect of railway works 'injuriously affecting' land, the injury must be a real injury—that is, it must physically injure, or otherwise permanently diminish the value of the lands. Personal inconvenience to the proprietor, which he shares with the rest of the public, will not ground a claim for compensation. There must be some special or peculiar damage done to the lands by reason of the construction of the works, and the damage, as I have said, must be of a permanent and not a temporary character. It will depend very much upon the facts ascertained by the arbiters or the jury whether, or to what extent, the claim for compensation is well founded. Whenever, therefore, a claim for compensation is granted upon allegations of permanent and particular injury to land, I think the proprietor is entitled to have his claim for compensation determined in the manner prescribed by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Of course if the claim is founded upon allegations which, on a fair construction, do not amount to averments of real or permanent injury to land, the Court will not force the railway company into a discussion of the question of compensation before arbiters or a jury; but where a relevant statement is made in support of the claim, the Court will not interfere to prevent its determination. The question then is—Have the respondents here made relevant averments in support of their claim? I am humbly of opinion that they have, and that the arbitration into which the parties have provisionally entered should be allowed to take its course.

“The main authority relied on by the complainers is the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy (2 Macq. App. 229). What the landowner there complained of was the inconvenience caused by the railway crossing on the level a public road forming the access between his lodge and gate and the public highway. The House of Lords, reversing the judgment of the Court of Session, held that that was not damage to the estate entitling the owner to compensation, but was merely a personal inconvenience to which everybody using the road was subjected, the proprietor no doubt being more frequently subjected to it than others, for in the language of the Lord Chancellor (Cranworth)—‘All attempts at arguing that this is a damage to the estate is a mere play upon words. It is no damage at all to the estate, except that the owner of that estate would oftener have a right of action from time to time than any other person, inasmuch as he would traverse the spot oftener than other people would traverse it.’ That case, which is a leading one, and is referred to as an authority in all subsequent cases, and has been commented on and explained by eminent Judges who took part in subsequent decisions, has always been treated as a case decided on the ground that a claim for personal inconvenience was not a ground for statutory compensation in respect of the injurious affecting of lands. And if in the present case the complainers, instead of blocking up the entrance to Canal Street and Victoria Street, where these formerly entered Eglinton Street, had placed level crossings there, it is possible that the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy might have gone far to support their views, although it is not impossible that a different rule might have been applied to a level crossing in the centre of a crowded commercial district from that applied to a similar crossing in a thinly inhabited rural district.

“But in the present case there are positive averments of injury to the respondents’ property by the actual shutting up of two direct accesses to Eglinton Street, by the substitution of a deviation road upon steep gradients instead of practically level roads, and by the deviation road being so constructed that the access to Eglinton Street is now long and circuitous, in place of being short and direct, and is moreover made in the form of a mean and narrow street, in which there would be little thoroughfare and few shops of any consequence. In short, it is averred that the operations of the railway company have ‘injuriously affected’ the respondents’ lands by impairing the accesses to them, and thereby diminishing their value as commercial subjects. Whether or not these allegations are true in point of fact, or to what extent they are true, it is not the province of this Court to determine. It is for the arbiters or the jury to ascertain the matters of fact. It may be that the statements of the respondents are unfounded in fact, and that the property has not been diminished in value; but I humbly think that the averments of real and particular damage to their property are not, as they were in Ogilvy’s case, a mere play upon words, but are relevant and plausible averments of real substantial damage.

“The case appears to me very closely to resemble the case of Chamberlain v. The West End of London and Crystal Palace Railway Company (1862) 2 B. and S., 605 and 617. There a railway company was authorised to take part of a highway, and make a deviation road, and to bridge over the highway, thereby blocking up the highway at a distance of seventy yards from Chamberlain's houses, with the effect of placing them in a sunk lane, so that his access to the highway by the deviation road was both circuitous and steep. None of his property appears to have been taken by the railway company. Chamberlain claimed compensation, in respect that by these operations his property had been injuriously affected, and the matter was referred, in terms of the English Consolidation Statutes, to arbitration. The arbiter's award was in the following terms:—'I find that by reason of the obstruction of the highroad leading from London to Wandsworth, and the obstruction of the said railway across the same . . . the access to the said several houses, &c., notwithstanding the substitution of the said deviation road as indicated and described in the said plan, is rendered less convenient for the occupiers thereof and all other persons, than it was, and would have been, but for such obstruction, and by reason of the said obstruction very many persons who, but for the same, would have passed the said several houses, buildings, tenements, and premises of the said Benjamin Chamberlain, have been, and will be, by reason of the said obstruction, prevented from passing the same, and the number of persons who, but for the obstruction, would have passed the said several houses, &c., has been, by reason of the said obstruction, greatly diminished, and the said several houses, &c., have thereby been rendered less suitable for the purposes of being used and occupied as shops, and by reason of the premises, the value of the said houses, &c., has been greatly diminished: And I find that, by reason of the premises, the said several houses, &c., have been injuriously affected by the execution of the works of the said company: And I find and assess the amount of compensation to be paid to the said Benjamin Chamberlain by the said company, in respect of such injurious affecting, at £1050.' Chamberlain brought an action in the Court of Queen's Bench to enforce the award, and that Court decided in favour of the plaintiff, and the judgment was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chambers, Erle, C. J., saying:—'I take the principle which governs these cases to be correctly laid down in the note to Ashley v. White, 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 252, 5th ed. There are indeed certain cases in which an act may be in law an injury, and may produce damage to an individual, and yet in which the law affords no remedy, or at least no immediate one. These are cases in which the act done is a grievance to the entire community, no one of whom is injured by it more than another. In such a case the mode of punishing the wrongdoer is by indictment, and by indictment only—L. Coke's Inst. 56a. Still, if any person has sustained a particular damage therefrom beyond that of his fellow-citizens, he may maintain an action in respect of that particular damnification. I think that the fact found by the umpire, that the plaintiff's houses have been injuriously affected, is a finding that he has suffered particular damnification, and he finds specially how that injurious affecting would be occasioned, viz., that by the obstruction to the thoroughfare the number of persons passing by the plaintiff's houses would be diminished, and consequently the prospect of customers to the occupiers of the houses in respect of any branches of industry carried on in them would be injured. Therefore I am of opinion that particular damage to the plaintiff by the obstruction of the highway is made out. . . . Mr Clarke relied upon the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy, where the defendant was held not entitled to compensation by reason of the railway crossing the highway on a level near the lodge to his mansion. That looks like a judgment in favour of the defendants, but the principle of that judgment was that the respondent was claiming compensation for personal inconvenience or annoyance, and not for injury to his property.'

"In the case of Beckett v. The Midland Railway Company (1867), L. R., 3 C. P. 82, the whole question was very fully considered. There the plaintiff was possessed of a house fronting to a public highway, on part of which the defendants, the railway company, under the powers of their special Act, erected an embankment opposite the plaintiff's house, thereby narrowing the road from fifty to thirty-three feet, thus, according to the evidence, materially diminishing the value of the house for selling or letting, the access of light and air being also obstructed. There was no question as to the relevancy of the claim for the deprivation of light and air; the question which had to be decided by the Court was whether the interference with the highway was a permanent injury to the plaintiff's property, entitling him to compensation under the Consolidation Statutes. The Court held that it was such permanent injury. In giving judgment, Bovill, C. J., said,—‘If the claimant's right of access from or to the highway was taken away, nobody would doubt that he would be entitled to compensation. These are injuries to the particular individual quite apart from any that may be sustained by the public at large. If the entire obstruction to the claimant's access by raising, or lowering, or diverting the road, gives a cause of action or a right of compensation, I am at a loss to understand upon what principle it can be contended that the obstruction of a substantial part of it does not give the same right of action and compensation. In the one case the premises would be of no value, in the other their value would be substantially diminished. It is only a question of degree. A very slight detraction from the width of a road, like a slight obstruction of light and air, might occasion no damage or injury. This, as it seems to me, is quite in accordance with the law as laid down by the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, and in Chamberlain v. Crystal Palace Railway Company, and also with the view of Erle, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Rickett v. Metropolitan Railway Company, May 16, 1867, L. R., 2 H. L. 175, and the decision of the House of Lords in the same case. The case of Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy has been much pressed upon our attention, and must, it is said, govern our decision here. It was there held that an interference with a public road by crossing it on the level gave a private individual no claim against the company. The obstruction there was one which occasioned a general inconvenience to all Her Majesty's subjects. The facts do not very clearly appear in the report, but the decision evidently proceeded on the ground that no particular damage or inconvenience was sustained by the claimant beyond that which was suffered by the general public. At p. 250 of the report, Lord St Leonards says,—‘I can see nothing by which this gentleman would sustain damage beyond what everybody else sustained. His estate is not injured.’ In the present case the plaintiff's estate was found by the jury to have sustained damage, &c. The damages are assessed, not by reason of any matter merely personal to the plaintiff, but the house itself was damaged. The opinion expressed by the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cranworth) is pretty much to the same effect. This case is, therefore, clearly distinguishable from Ogilvy's case. I think the plaintiff is entitled to retain the verdict.’ And, in the same case, Keating, J., referring to Chamberlain's case, says,—‘Now, what was it that injuriously affected the land in Chamberlain's case, so as to bring the case within the Act of Parliament? It was the partial obstruction of the old road and the substitution of a new one, and so rendering the access to the plaintiff's premises less convenient. Both roads were public highways, and yet it was held in Chamberlain's case that the property was injuriously affected within the Act.’

“Then, in the case of the Metropolitan Board of Works v. M'Carthy (1874), L. R., 7 E. and I. App., p. 243, the matter was again fully considered in the Court of Common Pleas, and, on appeal, in the Exchequer Chamber, whose judgment was affirmed in the House of Lords. The circumstances in that case were as follows:—M'Carthy was lessee or occupier of a house in close proximity to a draw-dock which opened into the Thames. He had no right in any way to the use of the dock, except as one of the public, but, his premises being in close proximity to it, his use of it for the purposes of his business was very constant. It appeared that the distance between his house and the head of the dock was only twenty feet, and that the ground between his house and the dock was a public highway. The dock was entirely destroyed by the works of the Thames Embankment, and the case submitted to the Court set forth, as matter of fact, that, by reason of the destruction of the dock, and the destruction thereby of the access to and from the Thames, the plaintiff's premises became, and were as premises either to sell or occupy, in their then condition, and with reference to the uses which any owner or occupier might put them in their then state and condition, permanently damaged and diminished in value. M'Carthy claimed, and was found entitled to, compensation, on the ground that a special value was attached to the premises by reason of their proximity to, or relative position with, the Thames, which was there a public highway, and that this special value had been injured by the obstruction. In that case Lord Chelmsford (p. 254) comments thus on Chamberlain's case:—‘I may now say that, the umpire having found that by the construction of the railway across the highroad the access to the houses of Chamberlain was rendered less convenient, and, by reason of the premises, their value had been greatly diminished, I do not see how the Court could well come to any other conclusion than that the houses were injuriously affected. Part of the damage in this case of Chamberlain was stated to have arisen from the obstruction having prevented many persons who would otherwise have passed the houses from doing so. This in itself would have been no ground for compensation, but without it sufficient remained in the statement of the interference with the access to the houses, and the consequent diminution of their value, to bring the case within the compensation clause in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act.’ And then, in dealing with the facts of M'Carthy's case, Lord Chelmsford goes on to say,—‘The question, therefore, is, whether the respondent, as the owner of premises which were in close proximity to the public draw-dock, has, by its destruction, suffered an injury and damage differing in kind from that of the public in general? It is to be observed that in the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy there was no complaint of any interference with the access to the house, but the injury alleged was an interruption of the access to the highroad by a cause which was not in any way connected with the house, but which subjected the plaintiff and his family to personal inconvenience, more frequently experienced, indeed, but not differing from that which was felt by every individual of the public desirous of using the highroad. Now, it is stated as a fact in the special case here, that by the access given by the dock to and from the River Thames, the respondent's premises were rendered more valuable as premises to sell or to occupy with reference to the uses to which any owner might put them—in other words, that the access to and from the Thames by means of the dock was a valuable appendage to the respondent's premises, and that by the stopping up and destruction of the dock the premises became, and were, permanently damaged and diminished in value. Is not this an injury and damage to the respondent, distinct from what would be sustained by the public generally, though probably shared in by the other occupiers of premises in the neighbourhood of the dock? And what conclusion could fairly be drawn from the statement but that the respondent's house was injuriously affected?’ And Lord Penzance, in deciding M'Carthy's case, says (page 263),—‘The immediate contiguity to a highway commonly called frontage is a well-known and powerful element in the value of all lands in populous districts. Where frontage to a highway does not exist, propinquity and easy access to a highroad are equally undoubted elements of value in such districts, distinguishing lands which have them from those which have them not. If, then, the lands have a special value by reason of their proximity to any particular highway, surely that owner will suffer special damage in respect of those lands beyond that suffered by the general public, if the benefits of that proximity are withdrawn by the highway being obstructed. And, if so, the owner of such lands appears to me to fall within the rule under which an action is maintainable, though the road interfered with is a public one. It was asked in argument,—Where are the claims to compensation to stop if the rule be so applied? The answer, I think, is, that in each case the right to compensation will accrue whenever it can be established to the satisfaction of the jury or arbiter that a special value attached to the premises in

been continued on tacit relocation at the same rent ; and the rent of the remainder is £108, 10s. per annum. (Third) That the claimants have sustained no loss or damage, in respect of diminution or reduction of rents since the time the respondents' operations began. (Fourth) That during the respondents' operations and since their completion the claimants' property has not by reason of these operations sustained any physical injury in its structure as buildings, or in respect of drainage, light, or air. (Fifth) That prior to the respondent's operations the claimants had direct, straight, and practically level access to and from their property, from and to Eglinton Street on the east (first) by Canal Street and (second) by Victoria Street, Eglinton Street then forming (as it does still) a leading thoroughfare from the centre of Glasgow to the south. (Sixth) That since the respondents' works were executed, and by reason of their execution, the following results have happened :—(First) Canal Street has been shut up as a direct access to Eglinton Street, and in place of that direct access the respondents have formed as a substitute therefor Salkeld Street, a public but a back street of 50 feet wide, running nearly parallel to, and to the west of, Eglinton Street ; (second) Salkeld Street is not direct or straight, but slightly curved in its formation, and is steeper in its gradients than Eglinton Street, for the corresponding distance between Canal Street and Cook Street, the steepest gradient being 1 in 34 as compared with Eglinton Street, the steepest gradient in which within the same distance being 1 in 59 ; (third) for the purpose of traffic carried or going to or from the claimants' property to Glasgow on the north, the detour caused question by reason of this proximity to a relative position with the highways obstructed, and that this special value has been permanently destroyed or abridged by the obstruction. If this limit be thought a wide one, and the number of claims under it likely to be numerous, that is only the misfortune of the undertaking, for the limit does not exceed the range of the injury. On the other hand, all claim for compensation will vanish, as, receding from the highway, the case comes into question of lands of which (though their owners may have used the highway and found convenience in so doing) it cannot be predicted and proved that the value of the lands depends upon the position relatively to the highway which they occupy. This view of the law on this subject, and its application, is, I think, entirely supported by the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in the case of Chamberlain v. The Crystal Palace Company, and, believing that case to be rightly decided, I humbly advise your Lordships to affirm this judgment.'

"I have quoted at length these passages from the opinions of Lord Chelmsford and Lord Penzance, because it appears to me that they are in every sentence applicable to the present case. The averment of the respondent is that the direct and level access, which they had by means of the highways called Canal Street and Victoria Street to the great public thoroughfare called Eglinton Street, was a valuable accessory to their property, and that the obstruction of that direct access, and the substitution of a circuitous deviation road of greater length, of steep gradients, and passing through a new and mean street, has permanently diminished the value of the property. These averments, if true, appear to me to be as relevant to found a claim for compensation under the Railways Clauses Act as the corresponding averments in the cases of Chamberlain, Beckett, and M'Carthy. It will, of course, be the duty of the arbiters to determine upon the evidence laid before them to what extent, if any, the respondents' premises have in point of fact been permanently injured and diminished in value. It may be that they are situated at such a distance from Eglinton Street that a direct access to it by means of Canal Street and Victoria Street was of little or no value ; but that is a matter, as I have said, for the arbiters, and not for the Court to determine. I am therefore of opinion that the arbitration must proceed, and that the present suspension ought to be refused, with expenses."

by this substituted street is immaterial; but taking the west end of Cumberland Street as a common point by Eglinton Street and by Salkeld Street from Canal Street the detour or extra distance caused by the respondents' works extends to about 1485 feet, and now applies to all traffic from the claimants' property carried or going eastward along Cumberland Street; (fourth) that Victoria Street has not been shut up, but has been slightly diverted with no appreciable detour, as an access to the claimants' property to or from Eglinton Street and the south, but with a detour or extra distance caused by the respondents' works of about 265 feet, which now applies to all traffic carried or going by Eglinton Street to the north; and the diversion of Victoria Street, and the building of a bridge over their railway by the respondents, have had the effect of altering the gradient of a street formerly almost level, to 1 in 20 for a space of about 116 feet, and 1 in 34·7 for a space of about 197 feet. (Seventh) That the new substituted access by Salkeld Street forms, in conjunction with Canal Street, Cook Street, and Victoria Street, the principal access to Eglinton Street for the claimants' property and the other properties situated in the same locality, including the Joint Line Railway station and the canal basin. (Eighth) That, in these circumstances, and having regard to the facts and circumstances proved, the claimants' property is in my opinion injuriously affected by the construction of the respondents' works; and on the assumption that the claimants are legally entitled to be compensated by the respondents for the injury so caused, I fix and assess the pecuniary amount of this compensation at the sum of £1500 sterling, whereof I allocate the sum of £1200 as applicable to compensation for damage by detour; and the sum of £300 to compensation for damages by change of gradients: And accordingly, on said assumption, I find the claimants entitled to said sum of £1500 (made up as aforesaid), with interest thereon, at 5 per cent per annum, from 13th April 1880, till payment."

The railway company having refused to pay the compensation decreed for, Walker's trustees, on 22d September 1880, raised an action in the Court of Session, concluding for the amount in the decree-arbitral, with the expenses decreed for.

The railway company defended the action, and based their defence, first, on the following passage in the oversman's notes of proposed findings, of date April 13:—"And I explain that in fixing the compensation I have not given effect to any compensatory elements arising from (1) the respondents taking and so withdrawing feuing ground from the market; or (2) the fact of their having placed a passenger station in the immediate neighbourhood."

They maintained that if effect had been given to these considerations no compensation would have been found due. Their second ground of defence was that Walker's trustees "had no special or exclusive right of property or otherwise in the streets, parts of which have been taken. . . . The said streets are public streets, and the pursuers had no right to use the same other than as members of the public. . . . Neither as regards detour nor the use of steeper gradients have the pursuers suffered any peculiar injury or damage different from the rest of the public requiring to use the streets in question."

The railway company pleaded;—(1) The property of the pursuers not having sustained any permanent or peculiar physical injury, nor been injuriously affected in the sense of the special Act, or any of the Acts incorporated therewith, by the defenders' operations, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (2) The pursuers not being entitled to compensation either in respect of the undertaking of the defenders, or any of the Acts of Parliament before-mentioned, the defenders are entitled to absolver. (3) In determining the question whether or not the pursuers' property was injuriously affected by the defenders' operations, the oversman ought to have considered the whole effect of these operations, and to have given effect to any compensatory elements arising therefrom benefitting the pursuers' property, as well as those injuriously affecting the same. Walker's

Trustees v
Caledonian
Railway Co

On 10th November 1880 the Lord Ordinary repelled the third plea in law for the railway company, and decerned against them in terms of the conclusions of the summons.*

The railway company reclaimed, and argued;—The effect of the written undertaking was truly that the proprietors were to be treated with as if some portion of their lands had been taken. But that being so, they were not entitled to compensation arising from the construction of the railway to which they would not have been entitled at common law.¹ Injuries to accesses by public streets were injuries shared in common with the rest of the public, and conferred no common law right to compensation from the company.² The sort of injuries here attempted to be made out were of a totally different kind from those contemplated when the undertaking was granted, and which had been sustained as relevant to infer compensation.³ The access cases, as a rule, were where the access was ex adverso of the property, and not, as here, at a distance from it, or not such as structurally to affect it.⁴ In order to be successful in such a claim it must be proved that what is suffered is not merely inconvenience by the proprietor, but actual injury to the property.²

Argued for Walker's trustees;—The undertaking was given to buy off opposition, and under it the company became bound to enter into an arbitration. The oversman had now found that injury had been suffered by the property, and the company had no option but to pay, any objec-

* "NOTE.—The defenders object to the oversman's award, on the ground that he does not give any effect to compensatory claims arising (1st) from the defenders withdrawing feuing-ground from public competition, and so rendering the complainer's ground more valuable for that purpose; (2d) From the establishment of a passenger station in the neighbourhood. I am of opinion that the oversman would have erred had he taken these elements into consideration. The pursuers have suffered direct injury by the access to their property being rendered more steep and circuitous than before, and by the consequent increased cost of cartage, tear and wear of horses, &c. They were content with their property as it stood before the railway company interfered with it; they did not desire to feu their ground; and they had no wish to have a passenger station forced upon them. All these things, I think, must be assumed in their favour. The question, and the sole question, for the oversman, was the amount of damage to the pursuers' accesses actually caused by the company's works; and it is not relevant in such an inquiry to discuss whether in other respects unconnected with access these works may be expected to benefit the pursuer. The cases of Senior v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, 32 L. J., Exch., 225, and Eagle v. The Charing Cross Railway Company, L. R. 2 C. P., 638, seem to be authorities very much in point. I have therefore sustained the oversman's award, and decerned for the amount thereof, with expenses."

tion on the ground of no land having been taken having been expressly waived. The course of decision was perfectly distinct, that if the property was injured then compensation was due.¹ The oversman had found that the property was injuriously affected, and therefore the argument based on Ogilvy's case did not apply. What was claimed was compensation for injury to property, not to comfort or convenience of owner.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Divested of details, the state of facts under which the claims of the respondents arise is the following :—They are proprietors in trust of a block of ground lying to the west of Eglinton Street, in Glasgow, which is one of the great thoroughfares of the city. This block of ground, which is used for a spinning-mill and the relative buildings, extends to over 6000 square yards. It lies about 130 yards from Eglinton Street, and is flanked on the north and south sides by two streets of 60 feet in width, both of which are contiguous to the premises, and are parallel to each other, there being a distance of 100 yards, or rather less, between them. Before the operations of the railway these two streets afforded a straight and level access from either side of the premises to Eglinton Street, which they both joined at right angles. The effect of the railway operations is substantially to destroy both these accesses as they stood. The railway works are so constructed as to interpose a new street called Salkeld Street, running parallel to Eglinton Street, between the premises and Eglinton Street, cutting off entirely the end of Canal Street, so that access can only be had to Eglinton Street from the works by a considerable detour on the north, and a less but still a considerable detour on the south. The gradients of Victoria Street have been altered from a level to 1 in 27, and the other gradients are materially altered for the worse.

Such being an outline of the alleged causes of damage, the respondents opposed the company's bill in Parliament, on a narrative in their petition of the special grounds of damage which I have generally indicated. In the end they consented to withdraw their opposition, on a formal undertaking by the company in the following terms :—[reads ut supra, p. 406.]

On the bill passing, the respondents gave the usual notices to have the amount of their claim fixed by arbitration, nominated their arbiter, and called on the company to nominate theirs. This the company did, but at the same time presented a note of suspension and interdict praying to have the arbiters and parties interdicted from proceeding, on the ground that the claim of the respondents presented no case in law on which they could demand compensation. The Lord Ordinary refused the interdict on its merits, and added a long and very careful exposition of his views. We adhered to his judgment refusing the interdict, but reserved our opinion on the question of relevancy until the facts should be found by the arbiter. The oversman in the arbitration has now pronounced his award, and in a detailed decree-arbitral, explaining fully the grounds of his decision, he has found the respondents entitled to a sum of £1500 in name of compensation for injury to the premises, allocating £1200 in respect of detour in the accesses, and £300 in respect of gradients. The company then challenged the award before the Lord Ordinary, who has sustained it, and the whole matter is now before us in this reclaiming note.

If I were obliged to decide this case solely on the terms of the written agreement, the inclination of my opinion would be to construe those terms as an admission of liability, if the arbiters should find in point of fact that the premises were injuriously affected by the company's operations. The agreement must be construed according to the subject-matter to which it related. Injury to the premises by reason of alteration of access was the thing complained of in the petition, and the agreement was the consideration given for its withdrawal. The assumption of the agreement seems to be that whatever question there might have been as to the facts alleged in the petition as the ground of a claim for compensation under the 6th section of the Railway Clauses Act there could have been none under the 17th and following sections of the Lands Clauses Act, had the operations of the company been executed partly on land taken from the petitioners; such was the law laid down in the cases of the Duke of Buccleuch, L. R. 5 E. and L. App. 418, and that of the Hammersmith Company, L. R. 4 E. and L. App. 171, by the House of Lords. The good faith and true import of the agreement was, that as the injuries to the accesses alleged would have formed a good element of damage if pleaded as an incident or accessory to a claim for land taken for the operations complained of, the present claim should be allowed to stand on the same footing; and therefore the agreement left no question over but the fact of injury and the amount of damage payable in respect of it. This has been decided by the oversman, and there, I think, the dispute was intended to terminate.

I have, however, after the full argument which we heard, come to be very clearly of opinion that had there been no agreement between the parties, and had this claim stood exclusively on the 6th section of the Railway Clauses Act, the award of the oversman ought to be sustained.

I have said that the two contiguous accesses by which these premises communicated with Eglinton Street are substantially destroyed by these operations. Whether sufficient substitutes have been provided is another question, but these special accesses no longer exist by reason of the works complained of. I think the only question of relevancy raised here is conclusively settled by the case of The Metropolitan Board of Works v. M'Carthy, supra, p. 418, n. 1. In that case certain premises had two accesses—one by a road and another by water—both being public highways, and not in any degree private property. The embankment works destroyed one of these accesses, and it was found that the Board of Works were bound to make compensation. Here both accesses are taken away, and unless the railway company can shew that they have substituted accesses which are fully equivalent—which was a matter for the oversman—the right of compensation is clear.

Of course the theoretical difficulty which attends a claim for injury done to an access over a public road or street is, that as, according to the proverb, all roads lead to Rome, a claim might be preferred for damage done to a public road at a considerable distance. But the question must be solved reasonably, and the opinions of the noble and learned Lords in the case referred to indicate the true solution. The injury alleged must be such as attaches specially to the premises in question, not exclusively, but specially. In this case no difficulty can arise on that head, because these two accesses by Canal Street and Victoria Street specially subserved these particular premises, and, indeed, did so almost exclusively. They certainly were of much greater consequence to them than to any other premises.

It is said, no doubt, that other accesses were provided. But the oversman has found—and it was for him to decide that matter—that these accesses so provided are insufficient by reason of detour and gradients; and he has estimated the value of the insufficiency at the sum in the award. I have no doubt of his power to do so, and have no right to question the conclusion he came to.

This short view makes it unnecessary for me to canvass at length either the decisions or the opinions in the numerous and not very consistent cases by which this branch of the law is encumbered. If I may say so without presumption, I think there has been a tendency throughout the series to run these questions into subtle generalisations, or ingenious but hazardous definitions, when the application of ordinary practical rules of everyday life would suffice for their decision. I am not prepared to affirm, in its generality, the proposition that the measure or test of such a claim as this is the right which the claimant would have had against any one who had performed the same operations without Parliamentary authority. This is a claim founded on and given by statute, and it cannot be the same, I should have thought, as any common law right, and the considerations which would have affected any proceeding at common law must be other than and different from those applicable to the statutory claim. Neither do I think it sound to lay it down as a general proposition that it is any answer to such a claim that to sustain it would leave the claimant in a better position than if the works complained of had never been executed. So far, in my opinion, is that from being at variance with the policy of these statutes, that it is a result which lies at the foundation of them. The statutory powers are given in order that the community may profit by their execution. But those of the community who profit by them are of course a limited class, and of that limited class some profit more than others. But that consideration cannot enter into a question of compensation for injury done to property, which only implies an obligation on the railway company to place the party injured in the same position as that which he would have held if his property had not been injured.

I do not think it is sound to say, as has been argued on the authority of the case of Ogilvy, that an injury which is shared by the public cannot support a claim for compensation. It is more sound to say that if the injury be specific and proved it is of no moment how many other premises are also injured. "The public" is merely a generic term for persons who are entitled to use, and do use, the access; and in proportion to the use they make of it may be the injury suffered by their premises by the operations on it. When the use made by one or more of the public is so far special and peculiar the injury becomes individual. When the injury is shared by many it of course loses its individual character. It may be difficult to define the line in words, it is a question of degree, but practically presents little real perplexity in any given case.

The case of Ogilvy itself (although we may doubt whether, with the further elucidation these questions have received, all the dicta to be found in the judgments would have been delivered) illustrates what I have said. There was no evidence there of any damage other than would have been equally occasioned if the level crossing had been an inch off, and the amount of injury to the premises was in itself hardly inappreciable.

LORD YOUNG.—Three questions are presented, and were fully argued.

I. The first is, Whether upon the facts found by the arbiter, and which are not disputed, the respondents' property has been injuriously affected by the operations of the complainers (the railway company) so as to entitle them to compensation irrespective of the special undertaking in the complainers' letter, which forms the subject of the second question? On the one hand, it is clear that when a portion of any property is so taken that the residue is thereby injured (i.e., depreciated in value), this is an injury for which compensation is due. This may perhaps in all cases be called severance damage, although that term is usually applied, though it may not be confined, to the case where a property is divided, portions of it being left on either side of the part taken, which severs them from each other. But although such severance may not be occasioned, and is not when the extremity of a property is taken at any end or side, it is, I apprehend, not doubtful that if the effect of taking a part is to deprive the residue of a frontage or of a valuable entrance and egress which the whole had before, this is an injury for which compensation is due, and whether it be called severance or by another name is plainly immaterial. On the other hand, it is clear, at least in the sense of having been authoritatively decided, that where the only injury complained of is that a public road has been rendered less commodious to the public, as by a level crossing, a proprietor of land in the neighbourhood is not distinguishable from the rest of the public and entitled to compensation because the road is frequently used by him as an access to his property, and so the inconvenience of the level crossing is frequently experienced by him. It was so decided in the case of the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy, the decision being put on the ground that the claim was truly for personal inconvenience suffered in common with the public at large, and that "all attempt at arguing that this is a damage to the estate is a mere play upon words." The question has since been a good deal considered, and been illustrated by several decisions. These decisions (subsequent to Ogilvy) are so fully and clearly noticed by the Lord Ordinary in his note of 16th June 1879 that I shall content myself with stating the result of them as I collect it. It is, that wherever property is in fact injuriously affected by the operations of a railway company compensation is due to the proprietor, notwithstanding that the operations by which the property is injuriously affected are on public streets or roads, and may, and in fact do, cause inconvenience to the public at large. The first part of this proposition is just the enactment of the general Act, and the materiality and value of it is in the latter part, which is the correction of an erroneous conclusion which had for a short while been drawn, perhaps excusably, from the case of Ogilvy. In that case there were apparently plausible grounds for contending that the proprietor had represented, and the valuation jury approved, that his property was injuriously affected by the level crossing within a few yards of the principal entrance gate; and on that assumption the only objection to the claim was, or might reasonably be represented to be, the fact that the crossing which damaged the claimant's property was also an inconvenience to the public. But the noble and learned Lords certainly negatived this contention, and decided the case on the footing that the property was not injuriously affected, and it is very noticeable that the decision is so explained and accounted for in the subsequent cases. As thus explained, the decision is authority for no larger proposition than this, that a man cannot have compensation for the personal inconvenience of a level crossing on a public road in the vicinity of his property which is not in fact injuriously affected thereby. I do not suppose that it was intended to be decided as matter of law that no property whatever could be damaged, i.e., the value of it substantially deteriorated, by any level crossing on an adjoining public road, and I do not find this view of the judgment suggested in any of the subsequent cases.

But leaving aside level crossings, which may perhaps in deference to the case of Ogilvy stand as a class apart, and reverting to the general question exclusive of that class, I am prepared to assent to the proposition that when property is in fact damaged in the sense of being deteriorated in value by the works of a railway company, the proprietor is entitled to compensation, and that it is immaterial that the works causing the damage are on a public road or street (or what was so) which has been taken or used therefor. When such damage is alleged on the one hand, and denied on the other, I think the issue raised is prima facie one of fact only, and is to be tried as directed by the statute. It has been so tried between the parties before us, and decided in favour of the respondents. The decision is that the respondents' property is injuriously affected by the complainers' works to the amount of £1500, and I find no reason in law why this decision should not have been made, or why, having been made, it shall not have effect. It is said that the injury to property to be compensated for must be physical. This is obscure language. If it means that the injury must be caused by works or operations on the property, the proposition is condemned by all the recent cases, and I cannot therefore attach this meaning to it. That the injury alleged is too remote to be taken account of is another matter. If the arbiter or jury think so, they may act on that opinion; and there may be cases in which the remoteness of the damage is so apparent that the Court would interpose either to prevent an idle trial, or after trial to refuse effect to an award or verdict. I do not pursue this topic or illustrate it by fanciful suppositions, for I am of opinion that there is here no good objection to the claim or to the award on it on the ground of the remoteness of the damage.

II. The opinion which I entertain, irrespective of the complainers undertaking that the respondents' claim, if affirmed by an arbiter or jury, should not be barred "by reason of our not taking part of your respective lands," renders it unnecessary that I should express any opinion on the effect of that undertaking, which was the second question argued before us.

III. The third question regards the contention of the complainers that they are entitled to set the benefits which they have conferred on the respondents' property against the damage which they have done to that property of a character entitling them to compensation under the statute. This contention is admittedly novel, and I content myself with saying that it is in my opinion inadmissible. There may be, and probably are, cases in which the damage done to a landed estate by the formation of a railway through it exceeds the benefit, but the common and familiar case is no doubt otherwise. There is usually, almost universally (in the case of estates in the country), a large balance of benefit. It has never, however, been doubted, so far as I know, that the railway company must pay compensation for the damage they do, and look to their traffic receipts for remuneration for the benefits they confer. This is according to the invariable practice of about forty years, and I can give no countenance to the present attempt to invert it.

North of Scotland Bank Co. v. Behn Möller, & Co.

Agent and Principal—Bill of Exchange—Acceptance “per pro.”—Liability of principal.—B., M., & Co., a firm of merchants in Hamburg, in 1869 opened a branch of their business in Dundee under the charge of an agent H, in whose favour they executed a power of attorney authorising him to sign letters, deeds, bills, &c., “per procuration” of the firm. The power of attorney was lodged with the A bank, where the firm kept its account, and where the bills of the firm were domiciled. On 1st September 1879 the firm put an end to the agency, and arranged that thereafter goods purchased by H should be bought on his own account, and sold by him to the firm. Subsequently the B bank, in the knowledge of these facts, discounted bills drawn after 1st September 1879 by a firm of which H was known to be a partner, and bearing H's signature as acceptor per pro. of B., M., & Co.

In an action for payment brought by the B bank against B., M., & Co., it was proved that since the termination of the agency the power of attorney had remained in the hands of the A bank, and that H had been allowed to endorse by his own signature, per pro. of B., M., & Co., foreign bills payable to B., M., & Co. which they had forwarded unendorsed in payment of his accounts, and that on three occasions he had been allowed to draw cheques per pro. of B., M., & Co., upon their account in London. It was also proved that the bills sued on were not granted with B., M., & Co.'s authority or for their behoof.

Held that the B bank having discounted the bills in the knowledge that the agency had ceased, had proceeded at their own risk, and that B., M., & Co. were not liable to pay the amount of the bills.

Opinions as to the duty devolving on a person discounting bills signed per pro. to inquire into the extent of the agent's mandate.

Question, whether a bill signed per pro. by an agent, authorised to do so, is binding upon the principal where signed fraudulently. Opinion per Lord Rutherford Clark that it is binding.

MESSRS BEHN, MÖLLER, & Co., merchants in Hamburg, in January 1869 established a branch of their business in Dundee under the management of an agent, Mr Julius Heyde, to whom they granted a power of attorney, dated 7th January 1869, whereby he was, inter alia, given “full power and authority (procura.) to sign all letters, deeds, assignments, acts, indentures, and bills of exchange with our firm, adding to it the words ‘per procura.’ and his name, to oblige our firm in that way, and in every wise to sell and to transfer real property, shares, and mortgages, and to extinguish the latter, to ask, demand, sue for, recover, and receive every sum and any object due to us, to compound with any person, to give good and sufficient releases and discharges, to appear and to plead before every inland or foreign Judge and Court of justice whatsoever, and to prosecute such actions and suits to judgment and execution, to seize, sequester, and arrest merchandises, claims, or other objects whatsoever, giving, and hereby granting unto our said attorney full power and authority to do and perform all and every act and thing whatsoever requisite and necessary to be done in and about the premises as fully to all intents and purposes as we might or could do if personally present, with full power of substitution and revocation, hereby ratifying and confirming all that our said attorney or his substitutes shall lawfully do or cause to be done by virtue hereof.”

Lord Rutherford Clark
B.

This power of attorney was delivered to the Commercial Bank, Dundee, with whom Behn, Möller, & Co.'s account was kept.

On 1st September 1879, Behn, Möller, & Co. closed their Dundee branch, and put an end to Heyde's agency.

No. 79. On 27th September 1879, William Dewar, of the firm of William Dewar & Co., manufacturers, Lochee, of which firm Heyde was a partner, drew a bill for £89, 4s. 5d. on Behn, Möller, & Co., and bearing to be accepted by them per procurationem of Julius Heyde, payable three months after date. On 30th September, 11th October, and 18th October, all of the same year, bills were drawn and accepted in a similar way, the bills being for £164, 9s. 2d., £195, 16s. 5d., and £242, 13s. 4d. respectively.

These several bills were discounted by the North of Scotland Banking Company, and endorsed to them, and were duly presented for payment when they fell due, but were dishonoured by the acceptors, Behn, Möller, & Co., and protested for non-payment.

In these circumstances the banking company raised an action in the Court of Session against Messrs Behn, Möller, & Co., concluding for payment of the amount of the said four bills.

The defenders pleaded;—2. The said Julius Heyde having accepted the said several bills per procurationem of the defenders without authority to do so, the defenders are not liable for the amounts of the said bills. 3. The said Julius Heyde having ceased to represent, and having ceased to have authority to bind the defenders as their agent or otherwise prior to the dates of the said acceptances, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

Proof was led in the case, the import of which is fully given in the opinion of Lord Shand.

On 10th July 1880 the Lord Ordinary assolizied the defenders.*

* "NOTE.—The bills sued on are accepted by Julius Heyde per procurationem of the defenders. The Lord Ordinary is satisfied on the evidence that they were not honestly accepted in virtue of the procuration which, for a certain time at least, Heyde held from the defenders. He thinks that they were accepted for the accommodation of Heyde and his partner Dewar. On the evidence of Dewar the Lord Ordinary can place no reliance.

"The defenders contended that this fact was sufficient to entitle them to absolvitor, on the ground that they could not be liable for any bills accepted by Heyde in violation of his mandate. The Lord Ordinary cannot assent to this view. He thinks that when a person acts within the sphere of his mandate his acts are, in a question with third parties, binding on his principal, even though they are fraudulent. It was maintained that, as the bills bore to be signed per procurationem, they disclosed that the person who accepted them was acting under a mandate, and therefore that the pursuers were bound to satisfy themselves that the mandatory truly held the power which he proposed to exercise. So far this is quite true. The procuration must exist, or the alleged granters of it cannot be bound. But if it does exist, the granters must, it is thought, be responsible for all acts which are apparently within the mandate. To hold otherwise would be to hold that no bank would be safe in discounting a bill signed 'per pro.' without making inquiry at the principal whether his agent was entitled to draw or accept that particular bill.

"But the defenders maintain a further defence, which, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, is well founded. Heyde was the agent for the defenders, and it was in that capacity that he held a procuration to draw and accept bills. This agency terminated on 1st September 1879. The pursuers knew that Heyde held the defenders' procuration as agent, and they knew of the termination of the agency, which by implication terminated that procuration. When bills bearing to be signed 'per pro.' of the defenders were presented for discount, the manager of the pursuers asked Heyde for an explanation, and was satisfied with the statement that, though the agency was terminated, the transactions in connection with it had not been closed. But the bills presented for discount increased to an unusual amount, and the pursuers knew that Dewar who drew Argued for the defender;—In the circumstances, there was a duty of inquiry imposed on the pursuers.² A man taking a bill signed per pro. does so at his own risk.³ The duty of inquiry here was imperative, as the bank knew of the termination of the agency before these bills were accepted.

LORD SHAND.—This is an action at the instance of the North of Scotland Banking Company against Messrs Behn, Möller, & Co., who, although designed as merchants in Dundee, are really merchants in Hamburg, but who carried on business in Dundee for a time; and the claim is one for payment of four bills, which, together, amount to about £700.

These bills were drawn by Messrs William Dewar & Co., manufacturers in Dundee, on Messrs Behn, Möller, & Co. in September and October 1879, and Behn, Möller, & Co. are sued as acceptors, the bank having discounted the bills on the request of William Dewar & Co. The bills are not accepted by Behn, Möller, & Co., but by Julius Heyde, per procuration of them, and, having been discounted by the bank, the proceeds were placed to the credit of the account of Dewar & Co. It was explained, and I think it appears from the evidence, that besides the four bills which are the subject of this case there are several others of subsequent dates—I think, extending into November and December 1879—which are all in the same position, and the fate of all of these will be determined by the result of this action.

It appears that in January 1869 Messrs Behn, Möller, & Co., being desirous of carrying on business through an agency in this country, entered into an agreement with Mr Heyde, by which they arranged that he should act on their behalf in Dundee, taking the management of the agency house, which they were then about to open, and that for the purposes of that agency they gave him a procuration to sign documents on their behalf. Of the same date as the agreement the firm executed a power of attorney, giving very large powers to Heyde, as their agent, to bind the firm. That power of attorney authorised Heyde to sign letters, deeds, assignments, and bills of exchange, but that not by adding the firm of Behn, Möller, & Co., which he had no authority them was a partner of Heyde, who accepted them. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the circumstances were such as to give rise to grave suspicion of the honesty of Heyde, and to throw on the pursuers the duty of making inquiry. They failed to discharge this duty, and they must, it is thought, suffer the consequences of their failure."

No. 79. to do, but only by signing per procuration of that firm. And this power of attorney was limited by the stipulation, that it was only in the affairs of the firm of Behn, Möller, & Co., and in transactions on their behalf, that he was authorised to sign in that way. This power of attorney was delivered to the Commercial Bank, who were from the date of its being granted apparently the bankers of Behn, Möller, & Co. in their ordinary banking transactions. In that bank the firm kept their cash-account, and in that bank also it appears that all drafts on the firm were domiciled. The power of attorney appears never to have been out of the hands of the Commercial Bank, and it is not alleged in this case that it was seen, or that its terms were specially known by the pursuers. Following on that agreement, in January 1869, there appear to have been a large number of transactions extending over a period of nearly ten years,—down to, I think, 1st September 1879. These consisted of the purchase of goods of considerable amount from manufacturers in Dundee and elsewhere in Scotland, in the name of Behn, Möller, & Co., and invoiced to Behn, Möller, & Co., and the mode in which these goods were paid for was by acceptances granted by Behn, Möller, & Co., the signature being adhibited by Julius Heyde invariably by procuration of that firm. As I have already explained, these bills were domiciled at the Commercial Bank, and Behn, Möller, & Co. provided the funds from time to time as they fell due and were payable at that bank. By September 1879, however, Messrs Behn, Möller, & Co. seem to have become dissatisfied with Heyde's actings. They were apparently largely in advance to him, and they resolved to terminate their agency, and all parties are agreed that the agency was terminated at 1st September 1879, which, it will be observed, was before the date of the bills now in question. The result of the termination of the agency was that Heyde was no longer authorised to buy goods in name of Behn, Möller, & Co. He therefore had no longer authority to sign acceptances for goods to be supplied to Behn, Möller, & Co., the arrangement after this time being that Behn, Möller, & Co. purchased goods from Heyde, and that Heyde was to take his own means of acquiring the goods which he was to sell to them. From that date it farther appears that in point of fact no goods were ever ordered in the name of Behn, Möller, & Co., either from Dewar & Co. or any other merchants they had been in use to deal with in the name of their firm. Heyde also altered the order form which had been in use in the name of Behn, Möller, & Co., and all goods were thereafter purchased by him in his own name, invoiced by the manufacturers to him, and, in so far as the defenders became purchasers of these goods, they were invoiced by Heyde to them. The bills in question were granted substantially as the price of goods in that position,—I mean goods which Heyde had ordered in his own name, and for which he was the debtor, but which it appears were sold by Heyde and forwarded to the defenders, and invoiced by him to them.

It is clear, indeed I think was not disputed on behalf of the bank, that in a question between Heyde and Behn, Möller, & Co., Heyde had certainly no authority to sign these bills per procuration of Behn, Möller, & Co., and I think it is clear also on the evidence that Dewar & Co., the drawers of these bills, could not have recovered as against Behn, Möller, & Co. the price of these goods as for goods sold to the defenders, and could not have demanded acceptances for the price. The evidence plainly shews that although Dewar & Co. understood that the ultimate destination of these goods might, and probably would, be to Behn, Möller, & Co., yet they were selling to Heyde, and to Heyde only, and that Heyde alone was responsible to them. I observe that in the evidence of Mr Dewar, of the firm of William Dewar & Co., he says—"Previous to 1st September all the goods ordered were ordered in name of Behn, Möller, & Co. Subsequent to 1st September every written order we received, save one, was from Heyde & Co. The goods which were ordered by the old firm of Behn, Möller, & Co. were invoiced by us to Heyde & Co. (Shewn Nos. 673-679 inclusive)—These are orders we received from Heyde & Co. Some of them are on new forms printed with Heyde & Co's. name, and others on the old forms with Behn, Möller, & Co. altered. All the goods sent to Heyde & Co. after 1st September were invoiced by us to Behn, Möller, & Co." And there is the witness Blair, who succeeded Heyde as agent or representative of Behn, Möller, & Co. in Dundee, whose evidence is very clearly to the same effect.

No. 79.

Jan. 21, 1881
North of Scotland Bank v. Behn, Möller, & Co.

But although Heyde was not entitled to accept these bills per procuration of Behn, Möller, & Co., and although Dewar & Co. were not entitled to obtain acceptances, or to require Behn, Möller, & Co. to pay the prices of these goods, the question still remains whether, looking to what had occurred before these bills were presented for discount, the bank were entitled to discount the bills on the faith of Heyde's signature per procuration as binding the defenders. On that question, besides what occurred after September 1879, the material facts relied on by the pursuers appear to be these: In the first place, the existence of the procuratory or power of attorney, to which I have already referred, which had never been formally recalled; in the next place, the extensive actings which followed upon that procuratory, large transactions by way of purchases of goods, and a very large number of bills which had passed through the Commercial Bank, having been discounted by the sellers of these goods, and having the signatures of "p. p. Behn, Möller, & Co., Julius Heyde;" and third, no special notice in Dundee that the agency had terminated, and that Heyde no longer had power to sign bills. A question has been raised by the defenders as to their legal obligation under a signature by Heyde per procuration as to whether it would be binding on them even if the mandate authorizing him to accept bills had been admittedly subsisting, seeing that the signature he was authorised to affix was per procuration only, and not the signature of the firm. It has been maintained that with such a mandate and a signature of this description, the defenders would not be bound in any transaction which did not fall within the terms of the mandate, but could only be bound in transactions on their behalf, which this plainly was not. We were referred to authority in English cases to support the view that with such a mandate as this, in which an agent is authorised only to bind his constituents for transactions entered into on their behalf, and by signing per procuration of their firm, a party discounting such a bill must satisfy himself that the particular transaction falls within the mandate—that it was a transaction for behoof of the party granting the mandate—and that he must take the risk of this upon himself making his own inquiries. The Lord Ordinary has expressed an opinion adverse to that view. It appears to me to be unnecessary to decide that question, and I do not mean to express a final opinion on it. I shall only say that the cases which have been referred to, and which have probably governed mercantile transactions in England for a number of years, must receive very serious consideration in any case raising that question for the decision of the Court. In the present case I think there is enough in the facts disclosed in this proof to prevent the pursuers from found-

No. 79. ing successfully on the mandate which authorised Heyde to sign acceptances per procuration of his firm. The facts which appear to me to be sufficient to shew that the pursuers are not entitled to succeed are these,—In the first place, Jan. 21, 1881. North of Scot- and Banking Co. v. Behn, Möller, & Co. and mainly, that on the 1st of September 1879, before these bills were granted, the agency of Heyde on behalf of Behn, Möller, & Co. had not only been recalled, but that the bank knew that that was so. There is no doubt about this. The agent for the bank at Dundee expressly admits it, and we find the subject referred to in letters to the head office two or three weeks before the agency in point of fact terminated. In the next place, it appears that the bank, through its agent, was also aware that Heyde had no longer authority to buy goods in the name of Behn, Möller, & Co. for which they were to be responsible, and that, in pursuance of an agreement to that effect, Heyde was to buy goods in his own name, and to supply them to Behn, Möller, & Co., he being himself the debtor to the manufacturers. And beyond this the banking transactions between Heyde and the North of Scotland Banking Company were changed in their character. A material change occurred after 1st September, for while Heyde had all along an account with the North of Scotland Banking Company in his own name, which was of the nature of a wages account, into which small amounts were deposited from time to time, and on which he made drafts for the wages of his workers, after that date the character of this account was entirely changed. It was no longer a wages account, but an account of very much larger transactions. Heyde was still connected with Behn, Möller, & Co., and was in the way of supplying them with goods, and it is not to be thrown out of view that all the bills previous to September 1879, as I have already mentioned, had been domiciled at the Commercial Bank,—the bank where Behn, Möller, & Co. had their account, and where these bills were made payable,—whilst the bills now in question were not so domiciled. Now, taking all these circumstances together, with the fact that Heyde had no authority to sign the name of the firm in a question between him and those who were formerly his constituents, it appears to me that the bank must fail in this action. The termination of the power to purchase goods on behalf of Behn, Möller, & Co., and in their name, necessarily terminated the right to grant acceptances as for goods, and the bank knew that, and yet these are acceptances as for goods. The bank-agent explains that, in the knowledge of the circumstances I have now mentioned, he made some inquiry,—that is, inquiry at Dewar & Co. and at Heyde,—as to what was the consideration for which these bills had been granted, and all that can be said is that these persons misled him in answer to these inquiries. The bank-agent explains that Heyde told him that these bills had some connection with transactions of Behn, Möller, & Co. which had not been wound up, and he thought fit to take these explanations as sufficient. If he did so, it appears to me that the bank must take the consequences. They were misled, but I think that in the circumstances in which they were placed—with distinct knowledge of the termination of the agency, clear knowledge that Heyde was no longer entitled to bind Behn, Möller, & Co. for goods purchased by way of acceptances—they themselves took the risk of discounting such acceptances as were presented. And there is another circumstance that is material upon this branch of the case,—I mean as to whether the bank had been misled by the defenders in this matter. It appears that Dewar & Heyde were, in the knowledge of the bank, themselves partners in another business, a calendering business, which had gone on for some time. They were upon the closest relations, and nothing was more likely than that they should grant accommodation bills to each other, as in point of fact they did. Taking all these facts into account, I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that in the circumstances in which Dewar & Heyde were placed the pursuers were not entitled to rely upon the signature of Heyde as sufficient, and that the insufficient inquiries they made have been the cause of the loss, which I think they must sustain.

Counsel for the pursuers very properly brought under the notice of the Court some circumstances to which I have not as yet adverted, but which I must notice in order to shew that they have received due consideration. It was said that although the agency was terminated there were two classes of documents that Heyde had been allowed to sign per procuration of Behn, Möller, & Co. The first of these were bills purchased by Behn, Möller, & Co. abroad, and sent home as remittances to account of their obligations to Heyde & Co. in this country. These bills were purchased in name of Behn, Möller, & Co., and in place of Behn, Möller, & Co. endorsing them before sending them to this country they sent them unendorsed, and allowed Heyde to sign per procuration of their firm and thus collect the money. It perhaps was, and I do not say it was not, a loose way of doing business to allow that system to continue, but it must be observed that these bills were in a totally different position from the bills now sued on, in this respect, that the only purpose for which Heyde's signature of the firm was required was to enable him to collect the money—that is, to cash the documents so as to make the money available for the payment of Behn, Möller, & Co.'s obligations. It was quite unlike an acceptance of a bill creating a new obligation. It was simply an indorsation like an indorsation on the back of a letter of credit or on the back of an order to enable a person to receive the money, and I do not think that documents of that class are material in this question, or that it can be said that Heyde, who was no longer the agent for Behn, Möller, & Co. to purchase goods and grant acceptances for them, might not still be allowed to sign documents of that kind as he had been in use to do.

The other circumstance referred to by counsel for the pursuers was that certain cheques which Heyde was allowed to draw upon the defenders' bankers in London after the termination of the agency on 1st September 1879 had been honoured by the defenders. These were not numerous, being, I think, three in number altogether. Whether there was any special arrangement about these or not I cannot tell. There appears to have been some special authority however, because in the evidence of Blair he speaks to special authority to sign cheques, or it may be that the defenders might have disputed their liability for these cheques.

But this circumstance, even taken with the fact that these cheques had been honoured, is not, I think, sufficient to take off the broad effect of the agency having terminated, and that Heyde had no longer power to purchase goods for Behn, Möller, & Co., and to bind them for the prices thereof.

In the whole circumstances, while I cannot help saying that there was some neglect on the part of Behn, Möller, & Co. in not giving more general notice that the powers held by Heyde had ceased, still I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the pursuers cannot succeed. The absence of notice is supplied by the fact admitted by the bank-agent, that he really knew all that Heyde knew as to the termination of the agency, and the position in which Heyde was placed after 1st September 1879, and I therefore recommend to your Möller, & Co.

LORD MURE.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary, and with the judgment pronounced by Lord Shand. There are two questions in this case, as the Lord Ordinary has explained in his note, the first, as to the terms of the authority granted to Heyde, and the law relative thereto, which it is not necessary to dispose of in the view which the Lord Ordinary and Lord Shand take of the case, but, for my own part, I confess I am inclined to be of the Lord Ordinary's opinion upon it. On the second question also, after anxious consideration of the evidence, I come to the same conclusion as Lord Shand and the Lord Ordinary. The transactions were undoubtedly somewhat loose from a business point of view; but still it is clear on the evidence that the bank were well aware by the 1st September, and even before that, as is proved by the terms of their own letters dated prior to that day, that the agency was to come to an end, and Heyde was to do business on his own account from that date. Inquiry was no doubt necessitated. By the terms of the power of attorney, as shewn in the translation before us, it is plain that the power to sign per procuracion of their firm was given by Behn, Möller, & Co. to Heyde, as their agent in a certain concern, for in the first head of the agreement, as we have it translated in English, they confer on him the "management of the branch house which they are to open on the 15th January of this year in Dundee, under the same firm, and at the same time give him procuracion," procuracion, that is, in regard to the management of the branch house. The procuracion was clearly given to Heyde qua agent in that concern. If the bank had asked then to see that document, and had made the inquiries which they ought to have made, they would have ascertained that the nature of the business to be carried on by Heyde after the 1st September would not warrant him in accepting bills per procuracion of the firm. As they did not make that inquiry it is plain on the evidence that they are not warranted in the demand they now make. It was quite well known that Heyde had had such a power from Behn, Möller, & Co., and it was equally notorious in Dundee that his agency ceased as from 1st September. I am clearly of opinion that the bank did not take such action as they ought to have done, and are therefore not entitled to recover the amount of their loss from the defenders.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The facts of this case have been so fully and accurately stated by Lord Shand that it is quite unnecessary to go over them again. I think the case may be decided upon a fair view of the evidence, without the necessity of deciding any new or delicate questions of law. The bills which are sued on by the pursuers were drawn by Dewar & Co., and were accepted by Heyde, per procuracion of Behn, Möller, & Co. The acceptance was certainly not honestly made, nor was it made in the service of Behn, Möller, & Co., but was really an acceptance given for the joint accommodation of Dewar & Co. and Heyde, and therefore, in a question with Dewar & Co. or Heyde and the defenders, there can be no doubt that these bills cannot be enforced. But they were discounted with the pursuers' banking establishment, and the question is whether they were justified in discounting them in reliance on the procuracion of Heyde for Behn, Möller, & Co. That the power of accepting bills, per procuracion of Behn, Möller, & Co., was at one time held by Heyde there can be no doubt. In January 1869 the defenders opened a branch of their business in Dundee, and they granted a very full power of attorney to Heyde as their agent, and, at the same time, they entered into an agreement specifying the conditions upon which he was to transact their business. The procuration or power of attorney was lodged with the Commercial Bank, and the whole of the legitimate business of the agency was transacted through that bank. In 1879 the agency came to an end, the precise date at which it expired being 1st September of that year, and it was quite well known that the agency was brought to an end, or was to be brought to an end, at that date, and, among others, it was quite well known to the pursuers. Any power of attorney containing this power to draw and accept bills, per procuration of the defenders, was granted exclusively in connection with the branch business or agency which the defenders had established, and, of course, the proper inference that anybody would draw was that when the agency came to an end the power to draw and accept bills per procuration of the defenders came to an end also, the object of granting that procuration having then terminated. If the matter stopped there the conclusion would be inevitable that the North of Scotland Banking Co. became aware that Heyde's representation of the defenders had come to an end, and that he was no longer entitled to act for them as their agent, and, that being so, they were clearly not justified in relying upon the procuration, which had been granted only for the purposes of that agency. But they say that, while Heyde informed them that the agency had come to an end, he told them at the same time that he would continue to accept bills per procuration of the defenders for the purpose of winding up transactions connected with the agency, and they chose to rely upon that representation. Were they justified in doing so? I think clearly not. There had been no business of this kind transacted with their banking establishment previously. The banking business of the defenders had been done with the Commercial Bank, in whose hands the power of attorney was lodged; and the very first bills that were negotiated at the pursuers' bank were the bills that are now sought to be enforced. It seems to me that, upon these facts, they were not entitled to rely upon the procuration, or to hold that the acceptance of Heyde would be binding upon the defenders after he had ceased to be their agent, and upon that single ground I think it is clear that they are not entitled to enforce payment of these bills against the defenders. The circumstances relied upon by the pursuers as creating a kind of specialty that this power of signing per procuration still existed have been sufficiently noticed by Lord Shand, and I do not think they are sufficient to remove the general impression created by the evidence, that the pursuers had no right to rely upon this procuration as an existing procuration. I therefore agree with your Lordships that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be adhered to.

Deposit—Locatio operarum—Deposit of goods for hire without stipulation as to duration of contract.—Where goods are warehoused for hire without a stipulation as to the duration of the contract, the depositary is not entitled to insist upon their being removed at his pleasure without shewing reasonable cause therefor.

Circumstances in which it was held that no such reasonable cause had been shewn.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

MILLAR & YOUNG, yarn merchants, Glasgow, got from Devaux Frères & Cie., manufacturers in Belgium, certain yarns, which, on arrival, were considered disconform to order, and were accordingly, upon 24th August 1880, stored by Millar & Young with James Whyte, storeman, Glasgow, in name of Devaux Frères & Cie. Millar & Young afterwards raised an action against Devaux Frères & Cie., and arrested the yarns in the hands of Whyte upon 25th and 31st August. Whyte, being desirous of getting the goods removed, and failing to get payment of the store rent, thereupon presented this petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against Millar & Young and Devaux Frères & Cie. and mandatories, for warrant to sell the yarn, amounting to 13,021 pounds, the proceeds (under deduction of warehouse rent, and other claims incurred in respect of the goods) to be consigned in the hands of the Clerk of Court.

Millar & Young stated that they would not object to the goods being removed to another store, there to lie in the pursuer's name, under orders of Court.

Devaux Frères & Cie. stated that they had no interest in the goods, which they had sold to Millar & Young, but had no objection to their being removed.

The pursuer pleaded ;—The defenders having refused to remove their goods from his premises, the pursuer is entitled to decree of sale.

Millar & Young pleaded ;—(1) The pursuer having knowingly received the yarn into store, he is not entitled now to force a sale thereof. (2) In the circumstances stated, the defenders Millar & Young are not liable for the costs of this petition.

Devaux Frères & Cie. pleaded ;—The defenders Devaux Frères & Cie., having no interest in the yarns in question, this application, so far as they are concerned, is unnecessary, and they cannot be prejudiced by it.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), on 3d December 1880, pronounced an interlocutor in which he found in fact as above, stating also that the inflammable nature of the goods in question and the consequent action of the insurers had given rise to the pursuer's action, and further found "on the whole case and in law that, in the circumstances, pursuer is not bound to retain the yarns, or to remove them at his expense and keep them in another store in his own name, and that he is entitled to warrant of sale as craved."

Millar & Young appealed to the Sheriff (Clark), who, on 18th December 1880, adhered.*

* "NOTE.—The question here is, is the pursuer bound to keep the goods for any time longer than he chooses to do so? I do not think he is. He has not undertaken to keep them for any specified period, and apparently for good reasons he now wishes to be relieved of their custody, and to be paid his claim for storage. With this view he has required the defenders to take away their goods. This they have refused to do—in point of fact, they refused to do any—

Millar & Young appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—The contract with the warehouseman was that he should keep the goods in safe custody so long as the rent was paid. He was not entitled to thrust the goods into the street as he proposed to do, and such a step had never hitherto been suggested in such a case. No. 80.

Whyte v. Millar & Young,

Argued for the pursuer ;—A contract of deposit without any stipulation as to time could be terminated at the pleasure of the party with whom the goods were deposited. There was no averment of usage to the contrary. Supposing the warehouseman was only a tenant and his lease came to an end, could it be said that he must provide storage nevertheless ?

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a very novel proceeding on the part of this warehouseman, who, having received certain goods for the purpose of safe deposit and custody, proposes, at his own hand and without any particular reason, to insist on the person who has deposited these goods removing them. If the law laid down by the Sheriff were sound, it would certainly be attended with very startling consequences. If a warehouseman may at any time, and without assigning any reason, insist on a depositary removing his goods, that would to a great extent put an end to the object and the usefulness of such warehouses. The goods were deposited in August last. They consisted of yarns, and though there is something in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor about the danger arising from the inflammable nature of such goods, there is nothing in the record to justify such a suggestion. It is a very common subject of deposit. In the month of October the warehouseman insisted that the defenders should remove the goods, and the question is, whether he is entitled to have that demand executed.

I do not think that the question is whether he is entitled to have the goods sold, because that question arises only when the defenders refuse to remove them ; and whether they are bound to do so or not depends on the nature of the contract between the parties. If the defenders were not bound to remove the goods, then any pretence that the warehouseman is entitled to sell them is at an end.

Now, it may be observed, in the first place, that this is not a pure contract of deposit, because that is a gratuitous contract, and this is one for hire. As Mr Erskine says (iii. 1, 26),—"Deposition is a gratuitous contract on the part of the depositary. If any consideration is to be given him for his pains in keeping it, the contract resolves into locatio operarum." This is the nature of the contract we are dealing with here. In the ordinary case there can be no doubt that it is for the interest of the warehouseman that the goods should lie in his warehouse as long as possible, that he may thereby get as large a rent as possible ; on the other hand, it is for the interest of the owner of the goods to turn over his goods as rapidly as possible, and to make his money out of them, and therefore to pay as little rent as he can. Accordingly, such a case as the present is very unlikely to arise.

But when a warehouseman has received goods for custody it must be obvious that very important legal consequences follow, bearing on the rights of third parties, and not merely of the parties to the contract. The goods by being de-thing. The pursuer has accordingly asked the Court to have the goods sold—the only alternative that remained to him. He seems fully entitled to this remedy . . . I do not see that the Sheriff-substitute could well have pronounced any other interlocutor than he has done."

posited become liable to certain diligences to which they are not open when they are in the hands of their owner. They may be the subject of sale without actual delivery. That contract may in such circumstances be made real by constructive delivery, which would not have been the case if the goods had continued in the possession of the owner. Now, to say that the warehouseman may thrust the goods out at once and without any reason, so as to defeat all the legal consequences which flow from the deposit, would be a very strong thing. I should be very slow to give any sanction to such a doctrine. In the present case the pursuer has been unable to shew any justification for the course he proposes to follow. There is no ground for it upon the record. In the cases suggested by Mr Lang I can very easily understand that the defenders may be entitled to be relieved of their contract. If their title to the warehouse come to an end, they may no longer be bound to perform the contract, because it has become impossible for them to do so. And there may be other cases in which there may be a reasonable and therefore a valid ground for the contract coming to an end, but there is no such case here. The goods are yarns. One sees their nature. They may be inflammable, and may create risks and dangers, but the pursuer knew that when he received them. There is nothing which he did not know then which he has since come to know. There was no reason in October for removing the goods which did not exist in August. I am very clear, therefore, that the view taken in the inferior Court is unsound, and that the Sheriff's interlocutor ought to be reversed.

LORD MURE.—The statements in this record are of the most meagre description. The ground on which the Sheriffs have given effect to this application is that the pursuer is not bound to keep the goods any longer than he pleases. I cannot say this is a good ground in law. I cannot say that the goods can be so removed unless there has been a stipulation as to time. Neither can I concur in the view of the law contended for by Mr Jameson—that the defender is bound to keep the goods as long as the owner pays the hire and thinks fit to leave them there.

Here diligence has been used upon the goods within a month of the time when they were deposited. I do not very well see how the pursuer is to get rid of them. The Sheriff-substitute proceeds on the ground, that they are of an inflammable nature. This is not averred on the record, but if it had been averred, and were distinctly proved, I am not prepared to say that it would not have affected my view of the case.

Reparation—Oral slander—Issues—Counter issue of Law of Foreign State.—In an action of damages for oral slander between two domiciled Scotchmen the slander was alleged to have been uttered in Penang. The defender proposed this counter issue, "whether, according to the law of Penang, no reparation is due for verbal slander unless special damage is proved." Counter issue disallowed.

Opinions that the case fell to be tried as if the slander had been uttered in Scotland.

On 28th June 1880 M'Larty, an engineer, then residing in Greenock, raised an action of damages for verbal slander against Steele, another engineer, and at that time also residing in Greenock. The verbal slander complained of was alleged to have been uttered in November and December 1879 and April 1880, on several occasions condescended on, in Penang and Singapore, and was averred to have consisted of statements that M'Larty had "done" and "cheated" Steele and others in connection with a partnership which had at one time subsisted amongst them in Penang. 2D DIVISION.
Ld. Curriehill.
I.

M'Larty had left Penang before the alleged slander had been uttered, but at the date of the action both M'Larty and Steele, who were Scotch by origin, were resident in Greenock. M'Larty averred that in consequence of the alleged slander his prospects of business from Penang and the Straits Settlements had been much injured.

Steele denied the slander, and added,—“Further averred, that the alleged statements, even though they had been made, would form no competent ground of action against the defender according to the laws of Penang and Singapore, the places where they are alleged to have been uttered, in respect that no special damage is alleged to have been sustained by or through said utterances. According to the law of Penang and Singapore, as according to the law of England, no reparation is due for verbal slander, unless where special damage is alleged and proved to have been sustained.”

He pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The action, being for alleged oral slander in Penang, is incompetent.

Steele then proposed the following counter issue :—“Whether, according to the laws of Penang and Singapore, no reparation is due for verbal slander unless special damage is proved to have been sustained through said verbal slander?”

On 14th January the Lord Ordinary disallowed Steele's counter issue, and approved of M'Larty's issues.

Steele reclaimed, and argued ;—No doubt, if a thing is wrong in the place where it is done, and also in the place where the action for reparation is raised, and the defender is subject to the jurisdiction of the Courts

* “NOTE.—This is an action of damages in respect of verbal slander alleged to have been uttered by the defender of and concerning the pursuer in Penang. Damages are claimed as solatium for injured feelings, and in respect of injury to the pursuer's character and reputation as a merchant, and to his business. The defence is that by the law of Penang verbal slander is not actionable, unless it is alleged and proved that it has caused special damage. The law of Penang is merely one of the facts in the case which must be proved at the trial, and it will then be soon enough to determine whether or not damages can competently be allowed for anything beyond the special damage which may be proved. The proper course seems to be at present simply to order issues to be adjusted.”

No. 81. there, then the action will lie. But it is not enough that the thing done shall be morally wrong; it must confer a legal remedy in the place where it is done. Here the words used were used lawfully at the place where they were used, and the person using them cannot be made liable for them in a different place where the use of them is unlawful, merely by the fact of an action being raised there. The counter issue should be allowed, as the law of Penang must be affirmed as a fact by the jury. This being a separate and distinct defence, is properly made the subject of a counter issue. This was a different case from the cases of injury, &c., as in all these cases a remedy of some sort existed, both in the lex loci and lex fori.¹

Jan. 22, 1881.
M'Larty v.
Steele.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—My opinion on the whole matter is that this proposed counter issue is entirely outside the case.

The verbal slander of the pursuer is said to have been uttered in Penang, after he had left that place, and this action is now brought against the defender, who uttered it, and who is now also resident in Scotland. The defender maintains that when he was in Penang he was under the law of England, according to which he avers that he was entitled to utter verbal slander without incurring any civil penalty, unless special damage is proved to have followed on the slander. It was assumed in the argument submitted to us that the law of England was that to utter verbal slander was not an offence unless special damage were averred and proved. It may be the case that by English law redress will not be given for verbal slander unless special damage be proved, but it is certainly not the case that therefore verbal slander is lawful. We have thus here an admitted wrong, which is a wrong both by the law of the place where it was committed and of the country where the action for redress is raised. I am clearly of opinion that a jury should have an opportunity of saying whether damage has been suffered from the wrong or not, and, if it has, to what extent.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and have really nothing to add except that I am not, as at present advised, prepared to hold that evidence as to what the law of Penang on the subject of verbal slander is, is at all pertinent to the case. I think if the facts be proved that verbal slander was uttered, and that the pursuer suffered patrimonial loss, it would not be pertinent to this case, raised and tried in Scotch Courts, to show that according to the law of Penang special damage must be proved to entitle him to damages. I think it necessary to say this, because the Lord Ordinary has indicated that that point would be open at the trial. I am inclined to say that such evidence would not be pertinent. The case must be tried according to the law of Scotland, and if there be sufficient evidence to entitle the pursuer to damages under the law of Scotland that is enough, and it would not be relevant to prove that something more is necessary according to the law of Penang.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion as both your Lordships. I think this case should be tried as if the slander had been uttered in Scotland.

Sale—Right of iron manufacturer to fulfil contract with iron not from his own works.—A firm of iron-merchants purchased a quantity of iron from a manufacturer, the quality being defined to be "Crown," to pass Lloyds' survey. The contract-note was written on paper of the manufacturer's, bearing a "crown" stamped on it, and "Brand, Moor," along with the manufacturer's name as manufacturer. Before all the iron was supplied the manufacturer closed his works owing to want of business. He then wrote to the buyers asking them to specify for the rest of the iron, and stating that he had arranged with another manufacturer to supply them. "In the case of strikes or combinations of workmen, or accidents causing the stoppage of the works, the supplies of iron now contracted for may be suspended during their continuance. This clause applies to buyers and sellers."

On 9th July a similar contract-note for 300 tons ship-plates was sent by Johnson & Reay, and confirmed on 19th July by Nicoll & Son. The

No. 82. delivery under this contract was stipulated to be over the next three or four months after the date of the contract in about equal monthly instalments.

Johnson &
Reay v. Nicoll
& Son.

Nicoll & Son failed to supply specifications for all the iron bought within the times stipulated in the contracts, but Johnson & Reay, though often asking for specifications, did not close the contracts, and allowed them to run on. In May 1879 the position of affairs was this, that of the plates under the contract of 13th and 19th June some 666 tons had been delivered, leaving about 84 tons still to be specified for, and under the contract of 9th and 19th July no specifications had ever been sent, and, consequently, no plates had been delivered.

On 21st May 1879 Johnson & Reay wrote to Nicoll & Son as follows:—
“We beg to inform you that in consequence of our inability to secure sufficient specifications to keep our works going we have been compelled to close them for the present, and have therefore made arrangements with some of our friends to manufacture for us the iron which we are under contract to deliver to you.

“In deference to your wishes from time to time, by reason of your being unable to accede to our repeated requests for specifications in accordance with the terms of your contracts with us, the delivery of the iron sold to you has been deferred, and it is now very considerably in arrear. Having regard, therefore, to the arrangements we have made with the firms who are manufacturing the iron for us, and to prevent complications with them, we must ask you to be good enough to let us have specifications for the quantity due, . . . without delay, and continue to specify in accordance with the terms of your contracts.”

Nicoll & Son having taken no notice of this letter Johnson & Reay instructed their solicitors to write them, requesting specifications under the contracts at once. This the solicitors did on 29th May. In reply to this letter Nicoll & Son wrote on 2d June to Johnson & Reay, as follows:—
“We enclose specifications of plates, which you will please be very particular in rolling exact to size, both in length, breadth, and thickness and quality, so that there be none rejected, each plate to be distinctly branded ‘Moor (Crown) J. & R.’ Please have all ready by end of the week, when we will advise you where to ship them. Also say approximate weight.”

On 4th June Johnson & Reay’s solicitors wrote Nicoll & Son in these terms:—
“In asking in our letter to you of the 29th ultimo for an immediate specification we requested such specification to be for the whole of the balance of your contracts of the 9th July and 13th June 1878. The specifications you have sent will not exhaust such balance, and do not therefore comply with our letter.

“The time for delivery during each of the four contracts you have with our clients has elapsed; and we need hardly remind you that our clients are therefore not bound to deliver against any specification that you may send. Your contracts are broken, and our clients are in a position to sue you at once upon them. They have no wish to do this, however, if you will undertake to complete all the contracts without any further delay. But you must not ask our clients to do what they are not bound to do, namely, to brand any iron they may deliver to you ‘Moor (Crown) J. & R.’ They are under no contract to manufacture the iron. They simply agree to sell it; and, as they informed you in their letter of 21st ultimo, they are getting the iron covered by their contracts made for them by other firms in the district, and the iron made by them will of course bear their brand and not our clients’. We may add that the firm who will manufacture your iron will be the West Stockton Iron Company, Limited, whose make you are now, we understand, taking delivery of under No. 82. contracts you have with them. Of course we need hardly add that the iron will in all respects comply with the conditions of our clients' contracts with you." Jan. 25, 1881

Reay v. Nicoll
& Son.

Nicoll & Son having refused to take delivery of any plates not manufactured by Johnson & Reay themselves, after some farther correspondence Johnson & Reay, on 17th November 1879, raised an action in the Court of Session against Nicoll & Son, in which they concluded for £104, 17s. 4d. as damage sustained by them owing to the differences between the contract prices and the market rates under the contract of June, and for £375, as the same under the contract of July.

They pleaded;—The defenders having wrongfully, and in breach of said contracts, failed to supply specifications, and having thus prevented the completion by the pursuers of the contracts, are liable in damages as concluded for, with expenses.

Pleaded for Nicoll & Son;—(2) There having been no undue delay on the part of the defenders in ordering the iron under the contracts of June and July 1878, and any delay that did take place having been caused through the pursuers' fault and breach of faith with the defenders, the latter are not responsible therefor. (3) The defenders being ready in June 1879 to take delivery of the whole iron under said two contracts, and being still ready and willing to do so, are entitled to absolvitor.

A proof was led, from which it appeared that the "Crown" brand of all manufacturers in the Cleveland district was much the same. Nicoll & Son endeavoured to prove that Johnson & Reay's "Crown" brand was better than that of other manufacturers, but they failed in establishing that as a fact. They, however, shewed that in August 1878, during the currency of the contracts, they had written to say that they were not inclined to take iron not of Johnson & Reay's manufacture, and intimating that they were especially unwilling to take the Stockton Company's iron.

On 12th November 1880 the Lord Ordinary ordained the defenders to pay £400, "being the damages caused to the pursuers by the defenders' breach of the contracts of 13th June and 9th July 1878."*

Johnson & Reay reclaimed against the Lord Ordinary's findings on another claim made in their action, which turned upon matters of fact.

Nicoll & Son took advantage of the reclaiming note to bring the above finding of the Lord Ordinary under review.

Argued for Nicoll & Son;—This case was easily distinguishable from the West Stockton case,¹ referred to by the Lord Ordinary. (1) The pursuers here were only manufacturers of iron, and not iron-merchants, and

* "NOTE.—1. The contracts of June and July 1878.—These contracts were open in May 1879. On the 21st of that month the pursuers intimated to the defenders that they had closed their works, and that they would supply the iron from other manufacturers. The defenders on 2d June insisted that the pursuers should deliver iron of their own manufacture, and refused to take any other. The question thus comes to be, which of the parties took the just view of the contracts.

"The decision of the Court in the case of the West Stockton Company, 7th July 1880, seems to the Lord Ordinary to rule the question. He cannot distinguish it from the present case, and he is therefore of opinion that the defenders are in the wrong.

"It seems to the Lord Ordinary that the damages should be settled by reference to the market prices which obtained at the date of the breach. On this footing they may, he thinks, be fairly estimated at £400."

"Moor" Crown brand was what was purchased, and nothing else; that was clear from the stamp on the pursuers' own paper on which the contract-note was written. It was iron of that trade-mark that was sold. (3) The buyers here had selected the pursuers to supply them; they had not merely, as in the West Stockton case, gone into the market for a cheap contract for Crown iron. That they had always taken this view was apparent from their letter in August saying that they did not wish other people's iron. Moreover, there was evidence here that the iron made by the pursuers was better than that made by others. In the Stockton case it had been matter of admission that the iron was all of the same quality.

Argued for Johnson & Reay;—All that was sold was a certain amount of iron "Crown quality"—a thing known to the trade,¹ and as long as that was sent they could not complain. This was, if anything, a stronger case of mere general quality than the West Stockton one.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK, LORD YOUNG, and LORD CRAIGHILL unanimously held that the case was ruled by the West Stockton case.

Poor—Birth Settlement—Settlement of child born in poorhouse of one parish situated in another parish.—The parish of A built a poorhouse in the parish of B. A child born of a pauper in that poorhouse afterwards became chargeable on its birth parish. Held that the parish of B and not that of A was liable.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
I.

IN 1870 the City Parish, Edinburgh, built a poorhouse on the estate of Craigmackhart, in the parish of Colinton, which was thereafter used as the only poorhouse of the City Parish. On 16th March 1872 a pauper named Margaret Cunningham, who was English by birth, and who had no residential settlement in Scotland, was confined of an illegitimate son, named John Cunningham, in the City Poorhouse situated in the parish of Colinton. John Cunningham became chargeable on several occasions in 1874 and 1875 in the City Parish, and liability was admitted by Colinton. Thereafter, in 1878, he again became chargeable in St Cuthbert's Parish, his mother being then dead. St Cuthbert's having claimed relief from Colinton, Colinton denied liability, and, on 10th July 1880, Russell, inspector of Colinton, raised an action against Greig, inspector of the City Parish, and Craig, inspector of St Cuthbert's, in which he concluded for declarator that the pauper child did not "possess a settlement by birth or otherwise in the parish of Colinton," and further that the settlement of the child was in the City Parish, Edinburgh. He also concluded for relief of the claims made against Colinton.

Colinton pleaded;—(1) The pauper having no settlement by birth or otherwise in the parish of Colinton, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons. (2) The birth settlement of the pauper being in the City Parish of Edinburgh, the pursuer should have decree of declarator to that effect.

City Parish pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having, as above set forth, formally admitted to the said defender that the settlement of the said John Cunningham is in the parish of Colinton, and that said parish is liable in his support, is not entitled to recall said admission and repudiate liability for the support of the said pauper. (2) The said pauper having his birth settlement in the parish of Colinton, this defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (3) The said pauper having no settlement in the City Parish of Edinburgh by birth or otherwise, that parish is not liable in repayment of the advances made by the pursuer.

Greig and
Craig.

St Cuthbert's pleaded;—(3) In respect the conclusions of the action cannot prejudice the rights of the defender as against the pursuer in regard to future cases of chargeability, and that they do not validly affect the present case, the action, so far as directed against this defender, ought to be dismissed, and this defender found entitled to expenses.

The Lord Ordinary, on 30th November 1880, found that the child's settlement was in Colinton, and assolized the defenders.*

Colinton reclaimed, and argued;—The parish of actual birth was not in all cases the parish which was necessarily liable.¹ That being so, this was a case where it was peculiarly desirable that the rule of the Act should not be unduly pressed. The poorhouse of a parish ought to be within the parish, and if without it, it should still be considered a part of the parish, at all events for its own parochial purposes, one of which was to fix birth settlements.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If the criteria introduced by the Poor-Law Amendment Act for fixing the settlements of paupers were founded on logical principle there might be something to say for the pursuer of this action, but they are purely arbitrary, and designed for the simplest and most reasonable adjustment of the questions which arise. That this child was born in the parish of Colinton there can be no doubt, and it is impossible for us to find that by construction it was born in the City Parish of Edinburgh. The Act says the birth parish shall be liable—and the child was born in Colinton.

The building in which it was born was no doubt erected in Colinton for the benefit and use of the City Parish, but that will not enable us to hold that it is not in the parish of Colinton.

* "NOTE.—1. The Lord Ordinary is not disposed to sustain the defence founded on the alleged admission of liability—first, because the claim is a new one, being made at the instance of the parish of St Cuthbert's; and, secondly, because at the time when the admission was made the mother of the pauper was alive, and therefore the admission should be regarded as relating to her settlement rather than to the settlement of the pauper.

"2. The pauper was born in the poorhouse belonging to the City Parish of Edinburgh, which is situated in the parish of Colinton. The question is whether he was born in the parish of Colinton or in the parish of Edinburgh. The pursuer says that in regard to questions of settlement the poorhouse must be held to be situated in the parish to which it belongs.

"The Lord Ordinary cannot adopt that view. It seems to him that the birth settlement of the pauper must be in the parish in which he was actually born. The theory of the pursuer, that the poorhouse is constructively in the parish of Edinburgh is not supported by any authority. If it were to be entertained at all, it would seem to follow that it should hold good for all parochial purposes; but the parish of Colinton does not extend it to the levying of poor-rates."

Russell v.
Greig and
Craig.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and I must confess no feeling of compassion for the parish of Colinton has been moved within me. I rather take it that a great poorhouse like this City Parish one will pay a much larger sum to the rates than any other property in the parish in proportion to the number of births that take place. There will not be so many births in it as in a small village which will pay much less to the rates. This I remark merely by the way, as it seems to me Colinton is crying out before it is hit.

I agree with your Lordship that we must apply the law as it exists. The birth settlement of every child born in Scotland is in the parish in which it is born. It is a mere question of fact. The geographical limits of every parish in Scotland are fixed. This child was born within the parish of Colinton, and its birth settlement accordingly is there.

If it be desirable to make an exception that a child born in the poorhouse of one parish situated in another parish shall have its settlement in the parish to which the poorhouse belongs, that is a matter for the Legislature and not for the Court.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion. The only rule by which a decision can be attained in this case is by ascertaining in what parish this child was born. In point of fact it was born not in the City Parish of Edinburgh but in Colinton Parish. Its settlement therefore is in Colinton.

The result of the City Parish poorhouse being in Colinton was that the mother of this child gave birth to it in Colinton. We can look to nothing but the provisions of the Act of 1845, and according to that Act the parish of birth is the parish of settlement.

CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—R. Johnstone—Keir.

Railway—Injury to Access—Compensation claimed in ordinary action—Stat. 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 19 (Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845), sec. 17—Stat. 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33 (Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845), sec. 6.—A person held a feu bounded on one side by a vacant piece of ground which the superior bound himself to form into a street, the feuar being bound to maintain it when made. Subsequently a railway company scheduled this piece of ground, and obtained by a private Act (which incorporated the Railways and Lands Clauses Acts) compulsory powers to acquire it. They acquired it by voluntary agreement with the proprietor (the superior).

The railway company having lowered the level of the ground, and injured the feuar's access, he raised an action of damages against them at common law, maintaining that, as he had not got the notice which sec. 17 of the Lands Clauses Act requires to be given to all the parties "interested" in lands prior to their purchase, the railway company were not entitled to found on the statutes.

Held that the pursuer had not such an interest in the ground as to entitle him to notice under sec. 17 of the Lands Clauses Act, and that his only remedy was a claim for compensation under sec. 6 of the Railway Clauses Act, on the ground that his feu had been injuriously affected.

2D DIVISION.

IN June 1870 John Cameron acquired, under a feu-contract from James Steel, a piece of ground on the west side of George Street, North Leith. This ground was defined as being bounded on the north by a new street about to be formed on a strip of vacant ground belonging to Steel, and lying between the subjects conveyed and the line of the Caledonian Railway Company. By the feu-contract Steel was taken bound to form this street, the feuar being bound to maintain it to the extent of his frontage. In May 1872 Thomas Lawson acquired from Cameron certain premises consisting of a shop and dwelling-houses, which were the corner tenement erected on this piece of ground. These subjects were bounded on the north by the vacant ground above referred to, which was to be converted into a street.

Lawson v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

In 1874 the Caledonian Railway Company applied for a special Act of Parliament to authorise them to execute certain extensions of their works at Leith and elsewhere, and in that Act they scheduled the houses and shops belonging to Lawson, as also the vacant piece of ground, and some other ground still the property of Steel. This Act was passed in 1875.

The company thereafter acquired the vacant piece of ground, and the other ground, Steel's property, from him by voluntary agreement. They did not, however, take any steps to acquire Lawson's property. In February 1879 they proceeded to cut up and excavate the vacant piece of ground, and to make certain temporary erections on it, and eventually they constructed a street or road over it.

Lawson, on 22d September 1880, raised an action against the company, in which he concluded for £1000 as damage suffered by his property in consequence of their operations. He stated that the company, in addition to putting up the above-mentioned erections, had lessened the breadth of the street as originally proposed, by several feet, to his loss, injury, and damage. That "the defenders had no authority of any kind to interfere with the pursuer's property, and with the street forming the access to it, as they did. They did not proceed according to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, or any other Act." He also complained that the street had been lowered two feet seven inches along the side of his property, and that the shop was inaccessible as a place of business.

The company defended the action, and stated that whatever they had done had been under their statutory powers.

Lawson pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss and damage through the unwarrantable, wrongful, and illegal operations of the defenders, they are liable to him in compensation. (2) The defenders not having observed the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act and the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, are not entitled to plead them to any effect.

The railway company pleaded;—(2) Even on the assumption that the pursuer's property has been injuriously affected by the operations of the defenders, these operations having been authorised by the Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1875, the action is incompetent, and the pursuer's only remedy is under the 6th section of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, which is incorporated with said special Act.

On 1st December 1880 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has not made any averments relevant or sufficient to support his second plea in law: Therefore repels the same: Finds that, in virtue of the powers conferred upon the defenders by 'The Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act, 1875,' the defenders were entitled to construct roads and approaches on the ground in question, which bounds the pursuer's property on the north: Therefore sustains the second plea in law for the defenders, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—The pursuer is proprietor of a tenement at the corner of George Street in Leith, which he acquired from John Cameron in May 1872, who again Lawson reclaimed, and argued;—He was here “interested” in the ground taken by the company in the sense of the statute (Lands Clauses had acquired the property from James Steel by a feu-disposition dated in 1870. The property was bounded on the north by a piece of vacant ground belonging to Steel, and lying between the said property and the then existing line of the Caledonian Railway. It was a narrow piece of ground intended for a street, and, by the feu-contract between Steel and Cameron, Steel became bound to form the carriageway of the street in so far as it bounded the pursuer's property, by levelling the same, putting in a water-channel and laying on a coat of broken stones blended with ashes. A tenement of houses was built on the pursuer's property, the access to which was partly by George Street and partly by the vacant ground in question, but, as was stated by the pursuer's counsel at the bar, no regular road or street was formed on the ground till 1875.

“In 1874 the Caledonian Railway Company applied for an Act of Parliament to extend their works, and, with reference to their bill, they scheduled a considerable quantity of ground in the neighbourhood, including, not only the house belonging to the pursuer, and three or four houses adjacent thereto in George Street, but also the piece of vacant ground in question, and the ground to the west thereof. The Parliamentary plans shew this ground quite distinctly. Under their Act, which was passed on 19th July 1875, the company obtained various additional powers. By section 4 they were authorised ‘to make and maintain in the lines and according to the levels shewn in the deposited plans and sections, the railways and roads hereinafter described, and all proper stations, sidings, approaches, and other works and conveniences in connection therewith respectively, and may enter upon, take, and use such of the lands delineated on the said plans, and described in the deposited books of reference, as may be required for these purposes.’ They apparently did not require to make and extend their lines in the parish of Leith, because the railways which they were authorised to make appear to have been only in the county of Lanark, and in the counties of Forfar and Perth. But by section 5 they were authorised ‘to enter upon, take, hold, and use, for the purposes of station, siding, and other accommodation, in connection with the existing undertaking, the lands hereinafter described, which are delineated on the deposited plans, and described in the deposited books of reference, or such parts thereof as they may find necessary.’ And in sub-section 4 of that section, the lands in the parish of North Leith and St Cuthbert's, burgh of Leith and county of Edinburgh, including the ground in question, are distinctly specified.

“It was stated by the pursuer's counsel at the bar, though not in the record, that during the time the defenders were in the course of obtaining these powers, but after the ground in question had been scheduled, the pursuer, who was not proprietor of the vacant ground, was called upon by the police authorities of Leith to form, and did form, a road upon the vacant ground, so that when the company actually obtained their Act there was a road in existence on the ground forming the north boundary of the pursuer's property. But, on the other hand, under their statutory powers, the defenders acquired that ground from Steel, who was the proprietor, and they proceeded with the execution of their works, and, amongst other accommodations for their existing undertaking, they constructed a road over this vacant ground along the north side of the pursuer's property. In doing so they altered the level, excavating it some two or three feet, and it is also said they narrowed it. Now, it is stated by the pursuer that they had no right whatever to alter the level or to diminish the width of this road. But I can see nothing in the Act of Parliament to support that contention. It is not stated on the record that the railway company were restricted to any particular level in regard to any accommodation road which they might form over this ground. Indeed, the plans and section shew nothing of the kind, and the company were entitled to make the road or approach in any way which they might find convenient for the purposes of their works.

“It is in these circumstances that the pursuer claims that he is entitled to damages at common law against the defenders, for having injured his property, Consolidation Act), sec. 17 (quoted p. 446), and was therefore entitled to notice from them in terms of section 25 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act. Being thus "interested" in the ground in question, in virtue both of his rights and obligations as owner of the adjoining house, he was entitled to consider the ground as part of his house in a question with the railway company scheduling it, and he was therefore entitled to be treated with as if his house were being taken. The question really was, what was the meaning of the expression "interested"? and he submitted that having a right to use the ground as a road, being bound to keep it up, and it being necessary for the enjoyment of his house, he was "interested" in it in the sense of the statute. The obligation of maintenance imposed on him imported an element of difference between his right and an ordinary servitude.¹ by lowering the level and diminishing the width of this road, because, as he avers in article 4, 'the defenders had no authority of any kind to interfere with the pursuer's property, and with the street forming the access to it, as they did. They did not proceed according to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, or any other Act.' Now, I confess I do not see in what way the defenders exceeded their powers. The pursuer says that they had no authority to interfere with his property, or with the street. But under the Act they are apparently entitled to interfere with the street, at all events with the ground on which the street had been formed, and the pursuer's statement of want of authority is far too vague and general to support his claim. It is certain they have not touched or interfered with the pursuer's property, or the site on which it stands, although, by lowering the road which served as an access they may have diminished its value. But, then, if I rightly read their Act of Parliament, they are thereby empowered to make approaches over that ground, and I desiderate any statement by the pursuer shewing in what respect these powers were exceeded. He says that the company did not proceed under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act. I do not quite know what he means by that statement, but from the argument at the bar I gathered that he means that the company acquired the ground from Steel by voluntary agreement, and not compulsorily. The fact, however, remains that it was under the statutory powers that they acquired the ground, although they settled the price by voluntary agreement with Steel. They might have compelled Steel to sell the property to them, but instead of doing so they took it, as they were authorised to do, by voluntary agreement. I am quite satisfied therefore, not only that the pursuer has failed to make any relevant averments in support of his second plea 'that the defenders not having observed the provisions of the Lands Clauses and Railway Clauses Consolidation Acts are not entitled to found upon that statute to any effect,' but also that the company had full statutory authority to perform the operations complained of.

"Such being the case, the next question is, whether the pursuer's claim for compensation, in respect of injury done to his property, may be vindicated by an action at common law? or whether such an action is not excluded by the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act. It is, in my opinion, very clear that it was for the purpose of meeting such claims as the present that section 6 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act was enacted. Its object was to prevent actions being raised in the ordinary Courts for damages done by a railway company in the execution of their statutory works, and to substitute therefor a reference to arbiters, or a trial before a Sheriff and jury.

"I think, therefore, that the action should be dismissed, with expenses."

Lawson v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

Argued for the railway company ;—The kind of rights referred to as minor rights in the statute were those of liferenters, leaseholders, &c., not collateral rights. The claimer's right here was nothing but a servitude of way, and the obligation to maintain was only what was imposed on the feuars in every street. If Lawson's property was "injuriously affected" he was entitled to reparation, but the damage must be assessed in the manner pointed out by the Act, and in that way alone.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am not sorry that we have had this elucidation of the points involved in this case. In the end, I am clearly of the opinion the Lord Ordinary has arrived at. I am glad to have been furnished with all the authority that is quotable on this matter, and which, merely on the words of the statute, is not without certain difficulties, as those English cases sufficiently shew. But the result, as I have indicated, which I have reached is, that there is no ground whatever why the pursuer should be indulged in an action at common law against the railway company for doing that which, I think it has been shewn, they were entitled to do under their statutes. The only reason why the pursuer says the railway company were not entitled to do as they have done under their statutes was that they had given no notice to him, and he says that he has an interest in this road in front of his house of the nature referred to in the 17th and 19th sections of the Lands Clauses Act, which says, sec. 17 :—"When the promoters of the undertaking shall require to purchase any of the lands which by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, they are authorised to purchase or take, they shall give notice thereof to all the parties interested in such lands, or to the parties enabled by this Act to sell and convey the same, or their rights and interest therein, or such of the said parties as shall, after diligent inquiry, be known to the promoters of the undertaking, and by such notice shall demand from such parties the particulars of their interest in such lands, and of the claims made by them in respect thereof ; and every such notice shall state the particulars of the lands so required, and that the promoters of the undertaking are willing to treat for the purchase thereof, and as to the compensation to be made to all parties for the damage that may be sustained by them by reason of the execution of the works."

Now, the real question we have to consider is whether that clause applies to interests of the nature of that set up by the pursuer, or whether the clause is not limited to these minor or restricted rights of property in land with which we are all familiar.

The cases that have been quoted are not very absolute. The case of a servitude, probably, is of a more definite kind. It is probably difficult to distinguish this right—of which I shall say a word immediately—from the right of servitude, but it may be called a case of servitude with some peculiar characteristics.

In regard to the English cases that were mentioned, it was said that the servitudes were servitudes of light—that they were not in the land at all, and could not have been entered upon in any reasonable sense. And that is quite true. Here, unquestionably, the railway company did enter upon the surface of this road, just as much as upon any other property, and the question is, whether there was an interest in the surface of the road requiring notice under the 17th section of the statute.

As I have said, it is difficult to distinguish this right from that of servitude.

At the same time, there are some matters that are bound up in it that create some amount of peculiarity. I am assuming for the present that this is a private street, and not one of the public thoroughfares of the burgh. On that matter, it is true, our information is very bare. But if it is one of the public thoroughfares of the burgh then the case is beyond even stating.

Lawson v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

If, on the other hand, there are private rights reserved to the feuars who are named under these obligations, that, I think, creates a different kind of case; and not only has the feuar right to use this road as an access, but he has the administration of the road absolutely under the provisions of his right, unless a public authority—the road trust, or the police committee of the town-council—have a higher right. How that stands we are not informed, but the conclusion I have come to is, that this is not an interest of such a nature as that referred to in the 17th clause of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. That the pursuer may be deeply injured by the operations of the railway company is perfectly possible, but that they will injure what is wholly and exclusively his is plainly not so. The road is not an access solely to his house. The street is an access to all the houses there, and that is quite enough to bring it under the category of cases depending on that view. There may be an injury done to him for which he is entitled to have compensation, because the company's operations injuriously affect that which beyond all question is his property, namely, his house, but that he is entitled to proceed for compensation at common law is what I fail to see.

On these grounds, very shortly stated, I am inclined to adhere.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I think the case is remarkably clear, and remarkably idle in this respect, that the pursuer has no interest in it whatever. The whole facts are capable of being stated in a sentence. The pursuer is proprietor of a corner house in this sense, that the front of it is to a street called George Street, whether a public or a private street I do not know,—that depends probably on its age. To the side of the house there is a bit of vacant ground, on which, according to his title, another street at right angles to George Street was to be formed and be extended. In that piece of ground he had no property whatever, any more than in George Street. But he had a right, in a question with his author, to have that street formed, he, on his part, undertaking that to the extent of the frontage or sideage of his house he would maintain it. The railway company scheduled this piece of ground, and took it under their Act of Parliament, and thereby,—that is to say, by their works thereon,—injuriously affected this access to the pursuer's property.

The railway company admit that if, by taking this ground, which was an access to the pursuer's property, they injuriously affected it, they must pay compensation, to be estimated under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. The pursuer says, "No, you must pay me compensation, to be estimated by a common law jury in a common law action." Why? Because this ground is not taken under the statute; but if it was not taken under the statute it was not taken at all, for a railway company cannot take ground except under their statute, and the remedy is to put them out, or rather their servants, who are in possession.

But I put it to Mr Campbell Smith at an early period—"What interest have you in asking that notice should have been given to you?" "Oh, this," he says, "that then they would have been obliged to take my property, and, regarding

No. 84.

Lawson v.
Caledonian

the ground as my property, then it is part of my house, and I should have said, taking part of my house, you must take the whole house, and so pay for it." But I think that argument falls at once—the argument that this is the party's house, and as his property the railway company must take the whole house; and it falls on the statement of it, for it is too heavy to stand on its legs. It will not bear its weight for an instant. Then, what is the ground for preferring a common law jury to any jury empanelled under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act? Surely a jury chosen or cited by authority of the Sheriff under the Lands Clauses Act is as good a jury as a common law jury in the Court of Session. Both would very probably be composed of the very same men. There is surely no interest in insisting on such a preference at all.

Again, if we should decide upon that matter, that he had an interest in this ground of a nature requiring that notice should be given to him, and that it should be taken by the railway company—that while the railway company have taken the land, and paid the proprietor, they have omitted to take this particular interest—I say if we decided that that was an omission, it was merely a formal omission; and the statute (sec. 117) provides that within six months of decisions establishing the right of the person having such interest the railway company shall purchase or pay compensation for the same. They shall not be put out of possession, but they shall pay compensation for what they have possessed at a valuation under the statute. There, again, the result of the most complete success that would be looked for is just what might have been seen from the beginning—the value of the interest in the ground; that is, the damage done to the pursuer by the destruction of that interest shall be determined by a valuation jury.

But the pursuer insists in having a common law jury. It is the most obstinate, wrong-headed perseverance in an erroneous course of procedure, simply without any interest in the world, that I ever experienced. It is according to the practice which we have known something about since the beginning of railways down to this year 1881 in Scotland, that such interests in the ground are not taken by railways or compensated for otherwise than the railway company offer to do here.

With respect to all analogous instances the course of dealing has been that which has been proposed, namely, that damage done by the destruction of any interest shall be settled by the valuation of the jury.

Now, we had a case very like this before us the other day.¹ I do not suppose anything turns upon the question whether the streets by which the proprietors there had a right of access to their property, and which were interrupted and interfered with by the railway company, were public or private streets. The distinction never was suggested for a moment. Indeed, it would make no difference. If I have a house in George Street or Princes Street, and if George Street or Princes Street is interfered with ex adverso of my premises, what does it signify that the street is public or private? The more public the street is, as in the case of Princes Street, the more valuable is the property by reason of its being upon that street; and interference with the street is interference with its most valuable adjunct. Princes Street might be private from one end to the other,—that is to say, the proprietors in Princes Street might have excluded the public, and the railway company would still have been liable, if they had taken the street, to compensate those injured by the street being so occupied. But the distinction between a public and private street imports nothing, except this, that in the former case a greater number of persons are entitled to use it. No. 84.

Lawson v.
Caledonian
Railway Co.

But, indeed, "public" or "private" are hardly very applicable to such matters as those which we are dealing with here. The history of all modern streets, which are made by parties feuing out their land for building, is that they are private streets to begin with, the proprietors being only too anxious that they shall be public as rapidly as possible; the value that they expect from their property being that the streets shall become great thoroughfares. That is the value they expect. The public take possession of such thoroughfares at their convenience, and after a season the public could not be stopped, but within a season they could be stopped, for those having the right, a limited right, it might be, might agree to stop them. But, as I have said, I do not think these considerations have any bearing here.

I quite agree with the Lord Ordinary, but I have thought it right to make these observations upon the idle character of this action, which is brought upon erroneous grounds, insisting that a jury should be selected in one manner in preference to a jury selected in another, while the fact is that in both cases the jury would be returned by the Sheriff to determine the amount of compensation which should be awarded.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In regard to the case we had before us the other day, the main plea of the railway company was that the streets were public streets. No doubt they were; but the answer was that the public had as good a right as the party claiming to compensation. I do not say whether the argument would have been the same if they had been private streets; but that was the ground, and the main ground, on which the judgment in that case was rested. I think it right to make that addition to what I said before.

Judicial Factor—Costs of unsuccessful litigation, liability for.—Held that the expenses in which a judicial factor was found liable to his opponent in a litigation properly entered upon and conducted by him, though unsuccessful in its result, were proper charges of administration, for which he was entitled to take credit, even though they exhausted the estate, before paying a creditor of the factory estate.

JAMES DRUMMOND, C.A., was, in 1877, appointed judicial factor on the 2^d Division. estate of Stewart Carse, painter in Musselburgh. The estate consisted almost entirely of certain house property in Fisherrow, which the factor took powers to sell, and which realised £1150. Ld. Curriehill.
I.

No. 85. Jan. 27, 1881. Drummond (Carse's Factor) v. Carse's Executors. An action of constitution and payment was, on 4th November 1878, raised against Mr Drummond, as judicial factor foresaid, by Richard and William Carse, as executors of Janet Carse. This action was unsuccessfully opposed by Mr Drummond, and on 29th January 1880 he was decreed and ordained, as judicial factor on the estate of the late Stewart Carse, to pay to the executors of Janet Carse the sum of £220, 19s. 0½d.; and by the same interlocutor the Court found "the said James Drummond liable in expenses, both in the Outer and Inner-House, but subject to a deduction of one-third from the audited expenses incurred by the pursuer." These expenses, amounting to £106, 1s. 11d., Mr Drummond paid without a charge, on the footing that he was personally liable to the pursuers of the action therefor, with right of relief against the factory estate. But the principal sum of £220, 19s. 0½d., contained in the decree, he refused to pay, on the ground that the estate was exhausted. Accordingly the decree was extracted and a charge given to Mr Drummond as judicial factor, but at the same time under pain of poinding and imprisonment, which he suspended, on the ground that he had no factory funds in his hands, and was not liable personally.

The way in which the factory funds were alleged to have been exhausted was as follows:—

After the Fisherrow property had been sold it was discovered that it had been adjudged by the trustees of the late Edward Carse more than ten years previously for a debt then said to amount to £450 due by Stewart Carse. These trustees had not obtained declarator of expiry of the legal, and they were willing to deal with their adjudication merely as a security and to retrocess Stewart Carse's representatives on receiving payment of the debt and interest, under deduction of the rents intromitted with by them as adjudging creditors.

Mr Drummond called a meeting of the whole children and representatives of the said deceased Stewart Carse, and consulted with them regarding this claim, and they all assured him that, although decree had been obtained in absence, constituting the said debt and adjudging for it, there was no debt really due, and that in the interests of the estate it was his duty to open up the said decree, and he thereupon, in 1877, instituted an action of reduction of the decree. The litigation in this reduction was long, keen, and expensive,—proof was led, and a remit made to an accountant,—a counter action was raised against the complainer by the defenders in the reduction, and the two actions were conjoined, with the result that by interlocutor of the Second Division, dated 29th January 1880,* the complainer was held to have failed to establish his reasons of reduction; but, on paying the amount of the original debt as contained in the decree of adjudication, and interest, under deduction of the rents intromitted with by Edward Carse's trustees, to be entitled to obtain from them a discharge of the decree of constitution and adjudication and writs following thereon. By the same interlocutor the Lords "find the said James Drummond liable in the expenses of both actions, and of the conjoined actions, both in the Outer and Inner-House, but subject to the deduction of one-fourth from the audited expenses incurred by the defenders in the conjoined actions in the Outer-House."

Mr Drummond redeemed the adjudication by paying the principal sum adjudged for, with interest, under deduction as aforesaid, and he also paid the expenses in which he was found liable by the interlocutor just recited, which amounted to £336, 5s. 1d. But he paid these expenses and the expenses of the action at the instance of Janet Carse's executors, No. 85. amounting, as before mentioned, to £106, 1s. 11d., in all £442, 7s., not out of his own pocket, but out of the trust-estate of Stewart Carse.

Mr Drummond admitted that if these expenses were not preferable charges on the trust-estate there were ample funds to pay the sum of £220, 19s. 0½d., for which the present charge was given.

Drummond
(Carse's Factor) v. Carse's
Executors.

The complainer, Mr Drummond, pleaded;—(1) The complainer being liable to pay the sum charged for only as judicial factor, and having no factory funds in his hands, the charge, in so far as directed against him personally, ought to be suspended. (2) The personal diligence threatened by the charge not being warranted by the interlocutor forming its alleged ground, the complainer is entitled to suspension as craved. (4) The complainer having litigated in bona fide is entitled to pay the expenses bona fide incurred by him out of the estate.

The respondents, Janet Carse's executors, pleaded;—(2) On a true and just accounting, there being sufficient funds belonging to the estate to meet the sums in the charge, this suspension should be refused. (3) The complainer is not entitled to diminish the funds of the factory estate by paying therefrom any sums in which he is personally liable.

The Lord Ordinary, on 30th November 1880, repelled the reasons of suspension, and found the letters and charge orderly proceeded.*

The complainer reclaimed.¹

LORD YOUNG.—The Lord Ordinary has rightly described the respondents as “holders of a decree of constitution against the complainer as judicial factor”

* “NOTE.— The complainer maintains that the whole sums which he has been found liable to pay, not only principal debts and interest, but also the expenses of process, are due by him only as judicial factor, and that none of these sums, not even the expenses, are payable by him as an individual. I confess I can see no ground in the present case for deviating from the general rule established in the case of Gibson, 11 Sh. 656, that a litigant in the position of the complainer must, if unsuccessful, pay out of his own pocket to his opponent the expenses in which he may be found liable, in so far as the trust-funds may be inadequate for that purpose. He cannot, therefore, plead, as against the respondents, who are creditors of the trust-estate, and who obtained decree for the amount of their debt on 29th January 1880, with expenses, on the same day that the complainer was found liable in expenses to Edward Carse's trustees, that the expenses in any of the actions are preferable to the respondents' debt. In short, he is not entitled, to the prejudice of the respondents, as holders of a decree of constitution against the complainer as judicial factor, to plead that the trust-funds are exhausted by paying expenses for which he is himself primarily liable as an unsuccessful litigant.

“The complainer says that, according to the sound construction of the interlocutors of the Court in all the actions, he was not found personally liable in the expenses. To me it is pretty clear that the Court meant the expenses to follow the ordinary rule, because, while the finding of liability for payment of the principal debt and interest is against ‘James Drummond, as judicial factor,’ the expenses are given against him solely as ‘James Drummond.’ If I had deemed the construction doubtful I would have reported the case without a judgment; but, in my humble opinion, the meaning of the judgment of the Court is without doubt that which I have now attached to it.”

on the estate of their deceased debtor. On that claim they have charged the complainer "as judicial factor" to pay, and he now asks us to suspend the charge, "at least in so far as the said charge threatens or may form a step in the process of doing personal diligence against the complainer, or diligence against his personal property." I think it right to say that I doubt the competency of diligence on such a decree of constitution against the person or property of a judicial factor, who is an officer of this Court, and wholly accountable in the factory process for his conduct and administration. I waive this doubt in deference to the desire of both parties, that the question in dispute between them should be determined in this process of suspension, which they were agreed presented it with all the materials which they could command, or desired, for its decision. It would certainly be inconvenient to convert this process into an accounting by the judicial factor for his administration, but the parties told us that the only question of interest to them was whether or not the complainer was entitled, with the factory funds, to pay certain expenses which he had been ordered to pay to the respondents and others in his litigations with them, and desired us to assume that the factory estate was insufficient or not, to meet the debt charged for, according as it should be held that he was or was not so entitled.

The Lord Ordinary has so taken the case, and, so taken, it is of course assumed that the complainer is not personally liable for the respondents' debt, the only question being whether or not he is bound to restore to the factory estate (which is the proper debtor) the amount of those expenses which he has, improperly as the respondents contend, paid out of it. This question obviously regards the proper acts and charges of administration which (always assuming their propriety) must, of course, be paid in the first instance. These are generally, and so far as possible ought to be, paid as they are incurred. I need hardly say that the factor is not the ultimate judge of their propriety, and that improper payments made, or credits taken, will be disallowed on the examination of his accounts. This examination we are now, at the desire of the parties, and for their convenience, anticipating with respect to the matter I have referred to.

The general rule of law and practice undoubtedly is that a judicial factor is entitled to be kept indemnitas, and also to suitable remuneration for trouble out of the factory estate, provided he has done his duty and has not misconducted himself in his office, and nobody fit to be appointed would accept of the office on any other footing.

But if the costs and charges of the factor are to be allowed or not, according as they were properly incurred or not, what ground is there for dealing exceptionally with the expense of litigation, which, like any other expense, may or may not be incurred properly? A judicial factor will not, of course, be allowed to expend the factory funds in improper litigation, and either in the suits themselves (if in this Court), or ultimately on the examination of his accounts, the estate will be protected and the cost thrown on himself personally, if his conduct shall appear to the Court to have been such as to require it, and I venture to say that the Court would not be slow to take account of any impropriety on the part of its own officers, and that in the suit in which or with reference to which the misconduct occurred.

With respect to the litigations referred to in this record, which were before this Court, it is not suggested that the Court censured the factor for pursuing the one or defending the other, or expressed any disapprobation of his conduct. This is not conclusive, and I accordingly put it to the counsel for the respondents whether misconduct, disentitling the complainer to the indemnity he would otherwise have been entitled to from the estate, was alleged and inquiry desired. The answer was in the negative, and that the respondents' case was rested entirely on the legal view on which the Lord Ordinary had proceeded, viz., that the factor was not entitled to payment or credit for the expenses decerned for against him to the effect of rendering the estate insufficient to meet their debt of £220, and that without reference to the propriety or impropriety of his conduct as factor.

No. 85.

Jan. 27, 1881.
Drummond
(Carse's Factor) v. Carse's
Executors.

I assume, for the purposes of this case, that a judicial factor is personally liable to his adversary in a lawsuit for expenses decerned for against him, though I desire to say that I express no opinion on the question. Assuming this, I perceive no distinction between this liability and any other incurred by a judicial factor in the course of the factory, with respect to his right of relief out of the factory estate. The general rule is that the factor is personally liable for every debt which he incurs in the course of his office, it being for him, and not for the party with whom he contracts, to see to the sufficiency of the factory funds to meet the liability. He is thus personally liable to every professional man and tradesman whom he employs, and for the price of all commodities he orders, however clearly he acted according to his duty in incurring the obligation. But his right to pay with the factory funds, or to be relieved out of the estate, depends precisely on whether or not he acted according to his duty, and the respondents' third plea in law, which the Lord Ordinary in effect sustains, is, in my opinion, untenable. If the factor's proper acts and charges reduce the estate so that it is insufficient to meet the liabilities, this is a misfortune, but affords no reason for disallowing them contrary to the rule, that the factor, if guilty of no misconduct, is entitled to be indemnified. I have already pointed out that there is here no question of misbehaviour disentitling the complainer to the indemnity which in the absence of misbehaviour is his legal right. The respondents, with respect to their debt charged for, are in no different position from any other creditor or claimant on the estate, and suffer no more than all others interested in it, i.e., having claims on it, from the fact that it is reduced in amount by the acts of unsuccessful litigation, though the circumstance may be more provoking to them than to others.

The case of a trustee in bankruptcy, who spends in litigation a dividend set aside under the Bankrupt Act to meet a contingent claim, is not in point, for reasons obvious enough, and which were expressed in the course of the argument. In that case the result would be the same in whatever way the dividend so set aside was spent instead of being reserved and made forthcoming, as under the statute it ought to be. The trustee spending would be personally liable to make it good to the party disappointed by his violation of his duty.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in the opinion which has just been delivered by your Lordship, and I would only add that the analogy of a trustee in a sequestration is manifestly inapplicable to a judicial factor. A trustee in a sequestration is the officer of the creditors and under their control. A judicial factor is an officer of Court appointed on an estate the administration of which the Court has assumed, and he is responsible to the Court. I therefore think there is a wide distinction between the positions of the two officials.

Bankruptcy—Duties of Trustee—Deliverance upon claims where no dividend is declared—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, secs. 126 and 127.—Held, upon a construction of the 126th and 127th sections of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, that a trustee in bankruptcy ought not to proceed, under the 126th section, to examine the oaths and grounds of debt, or to issue any deliverance regarding claims, until he is in a position to declare a dividend, and, therefore, that a deliverance admitting a claim where no dividend was declared was no bar to the trustee reconsidering the claim and rejecting it by a subsequent deliverance.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

D. L. M'ALLUM & Co., iron-merchants, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, lodged an affidavit and claim for £6307, 18s. 9d., dated 2d June 1874, with William Mackinnon, trustee upon the sequestrated estates of Messrs Hannay & Sons, iron-masters, Glasgow. The claim was admitted by deliverance dated 12th August following to the extent of £6303, 3s. 2d. A circular was, at the same time, sent to the creditors, in which the trustee intimated, inter alia,—" 2. That I have examined the claims of the several creditors who have lodged their oaths and grounds of debt on or before the 28th ult., and made up lists of those creditors entitled to be ranked on the funds of said estates, and also of those whose claims have been rejected in whole or in part. 3. That the commissioners have postponed the declaration of a dividend until the next statutory period.

"Of all which intimation is hereby given in terms of the statute."

No dividend was intimated or paid upon the estate.

D. L. M'Allum & Co. afterwards became bankrupt, and a trustee or assignee was appointed upon their estates.

The National Bank of Scotland subsequently claimed to be ranked for £4436, 1s. 5d. on Hannay & Sons' estate, and the trustee, on June 7, 1880, pronounced this deliverance on the claim for M'Allum & Co. :—" In respect that the claim by the National Bank of Scotland, amounting to £4436, 1s. 5d., for acceptances of D. L. M'Allum & Company to Hannay & Sons has not yet been withdrawn, the trustee rejects this claim to that extent, and ranks the claimant only for the balance of £1867, 1s. 9d., said acceptances being the true obligation of D. L. M'Allum & Company; and the same not yet having been retired by them, the same fall to be deducted from their claim as lodged." No. 86.

This was an appeal by the trustee upon D. L. M'Allum & Co's. estate against that deliverance. Jan. 28, 1881.
Monkhouse v. Mackinnon.

He pleaded, inter alia;—1. The trustee on the said sequestrated estate having admitted and duly ranked the appellant's claim to the extent of £6303, 3s. 2d., he is not now entitled to alter or modify his judgment, and the deliverance complained of ought to be recalled, with costs.

Hannay & Sons' trustee pleaded, inter alia;—5. No dividend having been declared or paid by respondent, he was entitled and bound to issue the deliverance appealed against, and the same being competent and well founded, the appeal should be dismissed, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute (Erskine Murray), upon 23d December 1880, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the respondent Mackinnon, trustee on the estate of Hannay & Son, pronounced, at the time required under the 126th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, a deliverance in terms of that section, admitting the present claim to a ranking: Finds (2) that the dividend was, however, postponed, and has been indeed postponed for several years, and when at last it has been announced, and the notification under the 127th section fell to be made, the respondent has notified a rejection, for grounds stated by him: Finds (3) that appellant has raised the plea of res judicata: Finds in law that on the whole that plea is not well founded: Therefore repels the same; allows to both parties a proof of their averments, and to appellant a conjunct probation," &c.

D. L. M'Allum & Co's. trustee appealed to the Court of Session.

It was stated at the hearing that Hannay & Sons' trustee was not even then in a position to declare a dividend, and that the Sheriff's interlocutor misstated that matter.

The 126th and 127th sections of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, and the 104th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1839, are quoted in the opinion of the Lord President.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The interlocutor now under review was pronounced upon an appeal from the deliverance of the trustee in the sequestration of Hannay & Sons. The claim disposed of by that deliverance was for £6307, 18s. 9d. on the part of a trustee or assignee in bankruptcy in England on the estate of D. L. M'Allum & Co. The deliverance appealed against bore that—"In respect that the claim by the National Bank of Scotland, amounting to £4436, 1s. 5d., for acceptances of D. L. M'Allum & Co. to Hannay & Sons has not yet been withdrawn, the trustee rejects this claim to that extent, and ranks the claimant only for the balance of £1867, 1s. 9d., said acceptances being the true obligation of D. L. M'Allum & Co.; and the same not yet having been retired by them, the same fall to be deducted from their claim as lodged."

The appellant in the Sheriff Court stated this as his first plea in law,—“The trustee on the said sequestrated estate having admitted and duly ranked the appellant's claim to the extent of £6303, 3s. 2d., he is not now entitled to alter or modify his judgment, and the deliverance complained of ought to be recalled, with costs.” That plea is, as the Sheriff-substitute represents it, substantially one of res judicata. The deliverance of the trustee, which is said to constitute the res judicata upon this claim, was issued upon 12th August 1874, and certainly bears to be a deliverance upon a claim of D. L. M'Allum & Co., and to admit the full claim of £6307, 18s. 9d., subject only to a deduction of a rebate of five per cent from the date of the sequestration. The question comes to be, whether upon a construction of the statute that deliverance finally disposed of the claim in so far as the first dividend is concerned, and whether the trustee is therefore precluded from reconsidering it?

The position of the sequestration at the time when the first deliverance was pronounced was this: Four months had expired since the date of the sequestration, and the commissioners had proceeded under the 125th section of the statute "to audit the trustee's accounts and settle the amount of his commission, and authorise him to take credit for such commission in his accounts with the estate." They had then proceeded to consider whether or not to declare a dividend, and their decision was to postpone it. In the words of the section they are authorised to "declare whether any and what part of the net produce of the estate, after making a reasonable deduction for future contingencies, shall be divided among the creditors." If they resolve that no dividend shall be declared, there are provisions in the 134th section in regard to the manner in which it is to be postponed. That was the conclusion to which the commissioners came, and apparently there was no reason whatever for the immediate disposal of the claims.

It rather seems that the policy of the Bankrupt Statutes generally is, that the trustee should not proceed to consider the claims of creditors with a view to ranking until it has been seen whether the estate is to yield a dividend. If there is to be no dividend, such a proceeding would be only expensive and unnecessary. And accordingly the Bankruptcy Statute of 1839 (2 and 3 Vict. c. 41), sec. 104 (the section corresponding to the 126th section of the later statute) enacts, "that if a dividend is to be made the trustee shall proceed to examine and admit or reject claims, and make up a list of creditors entitled to a dividend." The peculiarity of the 126th section of the later statute of 1856 is, that the words "if a dividend is to be made" are left out, and the section stands—"The trustee shall also, within the said fourteen days, examine the oaths and grounds of debt, and in writing reject or admit them or require further evidence in support thereof, for which purpose he may examine the bankrupt, creditor, or any other party on oath relative thereto; and in case he shall reject any claim, he shall in his deliverance state the grounds of such rejection, and he shall complete the list of the creditors entitled to draw a dividend, specifying the amount of their debts, with interest thereon to the date of the sequestration, and distinguishing whether they are ordinary creditors or preferable or contingent, and he shall make up a separate list of any creditors whose claims he has rejected in whole or in part."

It is contended by the appellant that the omission of "if a dividend is to be made" in the later statute clearly indicates that the Legislature intended that the trustee should proceed to perform the duty imposed by the 126th section whether a dividend was to be declared or not. The question therefore is, whether the trustee did validly and effectually proceed to examine and reject or admit claims, and make up a list of creditors entitled to payment of dividend, and whether accordingly the appellant's claim was then disposed of, so as to preclude the trustee from going back upon the decision he then pronounced, and coming to a different conclusion.

Reading the 126th section by itself, I am not surprised that the Sheriff-substitute experienced (as he says he did) a great deal of difficulty in coming to a determination. But when the 127th section is read along with it, that difficulty seems to me to disappear. When we look at it, we are led to the conclusion that there has been loose, and what I may call rather bungled, legislation upon the matter, but that nevertheless it is not intended that the trustee shall dispose of the claims of creditors until he is ready to declare a dividend. It must be observed that while the 126th section imposes upon the trustee the duty of making up a state of the claims, and provides for his making a deliverance thereupon, it does not contain any provision as to how the deliverance is to be given effect to. It is not provided that there is to be any intimation of it to the creditors. If the 126th section were to be literally followed, the trustee would retain in his own hand the state of claims, and the other materials upon which he has proceeded, and further, the deliverance he has pronounced upon them. If so, there would plainly be no opportunity for creditors to complain against an adverse decision. The only section which provides for an intimation of the deliverance and a right of appeal is the 127th. And when we come to look at it, it is quite impossible to hold that anything can be done under it until the dividend is declared. It provides that "the trustee shall, within eight days after the expiration of such fourteen days, give notice, in the Gazette published next after the expiration of such fourteen days, of the time and place of the payment of the dividend, and also notify the same by letters put into the post-office on or before the first lawful day after the said fourteen days, addressed to each creditor, in which he shall specify the amount of the claim and proposed dividend thereon, and when he has rejected any claim he shall notify the same to the claimant by letter as aforesaid, which letter shall also contain a copy of his deliverance and specify the amount of the claim; and a certificate by the trustee, or an execution by a messenger or sheriff-officer, that such letters have been put into the post-office shall be sufficient evidence thereof." Let us observe what under this section is the only mode in which a trustee is entitled to make his deliverance known to the creditors. It is by sending a post-letter addressed to each creditor, in which the amount of the claim, if it be admitted, and of the proposed dividend thereon, is to be specified; and if it be rejected, it is by sending a letter to that effect, along with a copy of the deliverance rejecting it. It is plainly impossible to comply with that provision till the dividend is declared, because the notice to the creditors is to be of a similar date with the notice in the Gazette, and it has, further, to contain the amount of the dividend to be allowed. So, without going further, section 127 proves conclusively that no deliverance can be intimated until a dividend has been declared. The 127th section therefore cannot come into operation until the declaration of the dividend, and so there is no occasion for the trustee to proceed under the 126th section until that period also. If he were to proceed, that course would be productive of nothing but a latent deliverance, which would be entirely useless.

And when we look further at section 127 the matter is still clearer. It continues—"And if any creditor be dissatisfied with the decision of the trustee, he may appeal by a short written note to the Lord Ordinary or to the Sheriff; but if no such note be lodged with and marked by the Bill-Chamber or Sheriff clerk (as the case may be) before the expiration of fifteen days from the date of the publication in the Gazette of the said notice, the decision of the trustee shall be final and conclusive so far as regards that dividend; and in case the claim have been rejected, such dividend shall be without prejudice to any new claim being afterwards made in reference to future dividends, but which new claim shall not disturb prior dividends." There again we have a form for and conditions of the appeal which the creditor is to have when his claim has been rejected. The appeal must be lodged within fifteen days after notice in the Gazette of the time and place of payment of the dividend—a period which can never occur in the present case, according to the appellant's construction of the statute, because there was no such Gazette notice published, and the right of appeal would therefore be taken away.

But in answer to that it is contended that the 169th section provides a right of appeal in every case. But that is only where there is no special provision, as there is in the present case, under the 127th section. It would not be an appeal under the 169th section if it complied with the terms of the 127th, and if it did not comply with the provisions of the 127th section it would not be admissible, because it must be taken within the fifteen days. It is therefore quite clear that until proceedings are taken under the 127th section the creditor has no intimation of the deliverance and no opportunity of appealing. Therefore any proceeding under the 126th section which is not followed out by proceedings under the 127th, and likewise the taking any proceedings under the 126th where no dividend has been declared, would be idle and inconsequent.

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriffs were right, and that their judgment should be adhered to.

LORD MURE—I am of the same opinion. We are dealing with a purely statutory matter, and what has been done can be final only if done in terms of the statute. At the time when this deliverance, which is founded upon by the appellant as a res judicata, was made, no dividend had been declared. What the trustee did therefore, in 1874, was not a statutory proceeding, and there has been no deliverance within the meaning of the statute, because no dividend was then declared; and as I read the statute it authorises a deliverance of this description only when a dividend is declared. The 123d section provides that the creditor shall produce his oath and grounds of debt two months before payment of the first dividend; and it appears to me that the whole matter of claims and their disposal is appointed to be regulated and determined with reference to a dividend to be declared. The 126th section, in particular, shews how creditors and their claims are to be dealt with by the trustee with a view to the declaration of a dividend; and the 127th makes the proceedings final only when a dividend has been declared. I therefore entirely concur in your Lordship's construction of the statute.

The present position of matters, as I understand the case, is this: Before any time had been fixed for payment of the first dividend the National Bank put in their claim and asked to be ranked on the estate, as they were quite entitled to do, under the 123d section, at any time within two months of the declaration of the first dividend. Now, I think it was within the power of the trustee to deal with that claim, and to give effect to it if well founded. Whether it is a good claim depends on the merits of the case, on which the Sheriff-substitute has allowed a proof.

LORD DEAS and LORD SHAND were absent.

LORD CURRIEHILL concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Refuse the appeal; adhere to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 23d December 1880, and decern; remit to the Sheriff-substitute to proceed with the cause as may seem just: Find the respondent entitled to the expenses of the appeal," &c.

Lease—House becoming uninhabitable—Right of tenant to leave—Rent where tenant's occupation interrupted for long period.—The tenant of a house, the lease of which expired at Whitsunday, removed from the house in the end of February preceding, in consequence of dangerous defects in the drainaga. The landlord had the drains put in order, but the operation took two months. In an action by the landlord for the half year's rent, held that the failure of the landlord for so considerable a period to supply a habitable house disentitled him to recover any part of the half year's rent.

Lease—Circumstances entitling tenant to resile from agreement to prolong lease.—On 6th February 1880 the tenant in possession of a dwelling-house agreed, by letter, to take the house for two years from Whitsunday following, when his lease expired. In the end of February he removed his family and furniture from the house, on account of its being uninhabitable by reason of defects in the drains.

Opinion, per cur., that, although the defects in the drains had been remedied by 20th April, the tenant was not bound to resume possession, and was entitled to resile from his agreement to prolong the lease.

In August 1880 an action was raised by the Scottish Heritable Security Company in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire against Dr John R. Granger, Glasgow, for payment of £40 as the half year's rent payable at Whitsunday 1880, of a house in Glasgow, in the following circumstances:—

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

In October 1876 Dr Granger entered into possession of the house, No. 1 Sutherland Terrace, Hillhead, Glasgow, under a lease granted by the then proprietors, Messrs Gilchrist & Gardner. This lease was to endure until Whitsunday 1882, with a break, in the option of the tenant, at Whitsunday 1880. The rent was £80 per annum. In September 1878 the Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited) became heritably vested in and were in possession of the house as heritable creditors.

On 23d January 1880 Dr Granger wrote to the manager of the Scottish Heritable Security Company:—"Dear Sir,—As I have already informed your factor here (Mr Archd. Stewart), I now inform you that it is in my option to break my lease at May first. We have been occupying at much too high a rental (£80), and, to induce us to remain, Mr Stewart has offered to reduce that to £67, 10s., but I still think further reduction necessary, and I hope, for the following reasons, you will see it your interest to recommend Mr S. to make further deduction.

"Our house is not, by any means, what it should be in regard to drainage, by which, in the past, we were put to so much trouble and you to expenses, for occasionally still we are like to be driven from the house by sewage smells.

"Then in two rooms we never can have fires, on account of smoke annoying both our neighbours and ourselves, and, let me add, these are both evils which cannot be cured and must be endured, or so, at least, says Mr Stewart.

"I think I have said quite enough to shew that I am, at least, entitled to a reduction of 20 per cent from our present rental.—Yours faithfully,

"JOHN R. GRANGER."

v. Granger.

On 31st January Dr Granger wrote to Mr Stewart, the company's factor, as follows:—"Dear Sir,—If you really cannot see your way to make any further reduction on our rental from £67, 10s., I agree to take the house, with the hope that you may do so next year, and on the distinct understanding that you will not make any attempt to add to it for, at least, the next four or five years. Waiting the favour of your reply, I am, yours faithfully,

JOHN R. GRANGER."

On 4th February Mr Stewart wrote to Dr Granger:—"I understood you took the house. If you did not mean that, let me know by return. It is now for you to say if you take the house for two years."

To this Dr Granger answered on 6th February:—"I am in receipt of yours, and become a yearly tenant at £67, 10s. for two years."

On 16th February 1880, Dr Granger wrote to Mr Stewart:—"Dear Sir,—I beg to withdraw my offer entirely for a lease of this house beyond the two years already stipulated for."

"My eldest girl is at present laid up with typhoid fever, and as soon as she is able to be removed, or if the worst should happen (for, in the meantime, we have to look the worst in the face), I will insist on the house being examined by an outside party, and any repairs on the drains thought necessary put into execution without delay.—Yours faithfully,

On 20th February Dr Granger removed his children from the house.

On the 21st his youngest child, an infant, died, and other children were ill with typhoid fever.

On 21st February Messrs J. & J. Boyd, writers, Glasgow, wrote to Mr Stewart:—"Sir,—Dr Granger, the tenant of the house, 1 Sutherland Terrace, informs us that, in consequence of his children being laid down with gastric fever, he has had the drains of the house lifted, and thoroughly examined, and the result is, that they are so thoroughly and radically deficient that he has been ordered by Drs Fergus and Finlayson at once to leave the house. He has already removed his children, and he will himself remove so soon as he can get accommodation elsewhere. We have advised Dr Granger, and now intimate to you, that he will not be responsible for rent after this date."

On 23d February Messrs Dick & Stevenson, writers, Glasgow, wrote in reply:—"Dear Sirs,—Mr Archibald Stewart has handed us your letter to him of the 21st inst.

"He was not aware, until the present complaint was made, that there was anything wrong with the drains, and he informs us that he called upon your client on Saturday, and satisfied him that, in the event of the drainage being defective, it would be at once put right, and he has ordered a competent person to make an inspection.

"Meantime, we write to say that we cannot admit that the illness of your client's children is due to any insufficiency of the house, and we deny all responsibility for damage which your client may sustain.

"As above stated, our clients are ready and willing to put the drains in order if they find anything wrong with them, and they will, of course, hold your client liable for the rent of the house until the expiry of his lease."

Soon after Dr Granger removed his furniture.

On 11th March Messrs Dick & Stevenson wrote to Dr Granger:—"Dear Sir,—We are informed by the factor that you have removed your furniture and plenishing from this house, and we beg to repeat what we have already said to your agents—that our clients do not recognise your right to remove, and will insist on your paying the rent in terms of your lease, and it is only out of courtesy to you that they meantime refrain from calling upon you to replenish the house."

The company's factor proceeded to have the house put in order, which was done by removing the existing drains and substituting one round the outside of the house. This operation occupied about two months, during which time Dr Granger and his family lived in another house. When the house was ready, about 20th April, the company called upon Dr Granger to resume his occupation, but this he refused to do.

Dr Granger defended the action, and pleaded the uninhabitable condition of the house, and intimated a claim for damages.

Pleaded for the company ;—(2) The pursuers not having made the contract with the defender, out of which his alleged loss and damage arises, they are in no way liable to him, even although damage could be established. (3) The defender having leased the said house from the pursuers' predecessors, Messrs Gilchrist & Gardner, and entered upon, and continued in the possession thereof for upwards of three years, while the same was, according to his allegations, during the whole of that period, in an insanitary and unhealthy condition, is not now entitled to rescind from his lease, or claim damages from the pursuers. (4) The defender's removal from and continued declinature to return to his said house was unnecessary and unwarranted, and if any loss or damage has arisen therefrom the pursuers are in no way responsible therefor. (5) Any loss or damage which the defender may have sustained having arisen through his own conduct and negligence, the pursuers are not responsible therefor.

Pleaded for Dr Granger ;—(1) The pursuers being the proprietors of the said house, or at least in possession thereof, and collecting the rents, were under an implied obligation of warrandice that the house was in a habitable condition. (2) The house occupied by the defender having been rendered dangerous to health and unfit to live in, the defender was justified in leaving the same. (3) The pursuers having failed in their implied warrandice that the house was habitable, the defender was entitled to terminate his contract of tenancy.

Dr Granger shortly afterwards raised an action of damages against the company, in which he concluded for £400 as damages and solatium. The company defended this action.

The two actions were conjoined, and a proof was led, from which the facts above stated and others mentioned in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor and note appeared.

On 30th November 1880 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor :—" Finds that the party Granger occupied the premises in question under a lease with Messrs Gilchrist & Gardner from October 1876 to February last : Finds that said lease contemplated endurance to Whitsunday 1882, with a break, however, in said lease at Whitsunday 1880 : Finds that in September 1878 the parties, the Scottish Heritable Security Company, entered into possession of the premises in question : Finds that the party Granger, taking advantage of the break in the lease, obtained, on 6th February last, a modification of the rent of the lease as from Whitsunday 1880 to Whitsunday 1882, the rent being reduced from £80 to £67, 10s. per annum : Finds that about said 6th February several members of the party Granger's family took ill, and it being suspected that the drains of the house were wrong an inspection was made, which resulted in serious defects being discovered in a drain which was situated under the lobby floor of the basement story : Finds that the party Granger removed himself and family from said house, in the first place, to a house in Ashton Terrace, and also entered into an agreement of lease, as from Whitsunday 1880, for a house in Albion Crescent, which he is now occupying : Finds that he repudiated, and repudiates, the lease of the premises in question : Finds that he made no demand on the landlords to put the drains in a proper state : Finds, however, since he left the premises extensive operations and repairs have been ordered and carried out in connection with the drainage of the house in question, which were completed on or about 20th April: Finds the Heritable Company offered to make a deduction of rent, prior to the raising of the present actions, for the period of non-occupation, but to this offer the party Granger refused to accede, unless the lease was to be considered at an end: Finds, under reference to note, that the party Granger has failed to prove that the sickness from which certain members of his family suffered was due to the state of the drains of the premises in question: Finds also, separatim, that he has failed to prove culpa against the Heritable Company, or those for whom they are responsible, for the state of said drains, even on the assumption that the illness in question, and the trouble and expense in connection therewith, were due to the state of the drains: Finds, under reference to note, that the party Granger was not entitled to repudiate the lease in question: Finds that the party Granger is entitled to a deduction from the half year's rent for non-occupation of the premises, in respect in the circumstances above set forth he was entitled to leave the premises in question until the drains of the house were put in a proper state: Finds that he is also entitled to a deduction for the expense he was put to in connection with such removing, and fixes said deduction at £25: except, however, as regards the said deduction hereby allowed, repels the whole claims for damage advanced by the said party Granger, and decerns against him in favour of the parties the Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited) for the sum of £15, with interest on said sum as craved," &c.*

* "NOTE.—I have to deal here with conjoined actions. The first of these actions is an action for the half year's rent of the premises occupied by the party Granger, concluding for £40. The other is an action at the instance of Mr Granger claiming £400 damages for illness caused in the pursuer's family,—the death of an infant,—the removal from the premises in question, and inconvenience and expense attaching thereto. . . . The factor seems always to have been ready, not only to listen to the complaints as to the drainage being wrong, but to order experienced tradesmen to do everything to put the premises right. However, as I have already said, the action for damages is not based on culpa. Apart, however, from this question, I do not think that it is possible to hold, upon the proof, that the illness in Dr Granger's household is proved to be due to the defective drainage. It is very likely that such was the case (and here I may say that I thoroughly agree with Dr Granger that it was right in the circumstances to remove his family, and this I will deal with later on), but it is one thing to see that a thing is probable and another thing to hold it proved; and here, I take it, the Heritable Company are entitled to say, if this illness is to be founded on as against us, it must be proved that it was due to defective drainage. Dr Granger says that he can conceive of no other cause, but every one knows that typhoid fever and illnesses of such description are caused in ways which are never discovered, and although the illness of the household may have been due to defective drainage I cannot hold that it has been proved that such was the cause.

"With his family ill, and examination having revealed that there was a hole in the drain pipe under the floor, and a bad smell coming from the stuff lying about this pipe (whether it was soap waste or excreta), I am clear that Dr. Granger was entitled to leave the house until, at least, matters were put right. The result of the investigation made by the Heritable Company was, that the conclusion was arrived at, that to make a thoroughly satisfactory job of the drains it was advisable that the drain in question should be removed to the outside, and the position of a w.-c. shifted, &c., and this has been done at a very considerable expense, between £40 and £50, I think. To get that work done seems to have taken about two months. For that period I think there is

Dr Granger appealed to the Court of Session, but only against the decerniture against him in the action at the instance of the Heritable Security Company for £15. No. 87.

Argued for Dr Granger;—The landlord having failed in his obligation to supply a tenantable house was not entitled to enforce the right which that alone would confer on him of demanding rent. The interruption of the tenant's occupation was of such duration as of itself to put an end to the current lease.¹ As regards the new lease, when the offer was made the tenant was in ignorance of the state of the house, and as nothing had followed on the offer he was entitled to resile.

Argued for the company;—Though it was admitted that a tenant in such circumstances as had been disclosed here might be entitled to leave the house until it was made habitable, still that would not entitle him to break the lease altogether. A deduction being allowed for the necessary interruption of occupation, he was still liable in the balance of the rent. On the question of the new lease the tenant having voluntarily entered into it in full knowledge of the discomforts of the house was bound by it.

LORD YOUNG.—Dr Granger, the appellant in this case, was the tenant of a house in Glasgow, under a written lease, from October 1876 until Whitsunday 1882, a period of six years, with a break at Whitsunday 1880, in the tenant's option. The action by the respondents is for payment of a half year's rent, amounting to £40, for the possession of the house under this lease from Martinmas 1879 to Whitsunday 1880. The Sheriff-substitute has explained in his no claim against Dr Granger for rent; but I do not think that Dr Granger was entitled to repudiate the lease. He knew, or ought to have known, just as much about the drains as the Heritable Company, and on the 6th of February, having a break in the existing lease at Whitsunday 1880, he agreed to take on the house for two years from that last-mentioned date; nay, more, just about this very time he wrote to the Heritable Company wanting a still further deduction from rent than that obtained from the factor, on the ground of the drainage not being what it ought to be. It is impossible, therefore, to hold that the state of the house was not present to his mind at the date of the renewal of the lease of 6th February, which lease he repudiated before the end of the month. The position which, I am of opinion, Dr Granger should have taken up was to call upon the landlords to put matters right. Probably it would have been better for him to have got the assistance of a skilled person as to what was necessary, and called upon the landlords to carry out the alterations suggested. If the landlords refused to do what was necessary, then, I think, Dr Granger would have been entitled to repudiate the lease, or he would have been entitled to have carried out the alterations at his own hands, and deducted the cost from the rent. It is, I think, necessary to determine in this case whether the lease is or is not binding, because unless Dr Granger had established (which I take it he has not done on the proof) that he could only get a house temporarily by taking it on to the Whitsunday term, then I think rent must run against him as from the period when the drains had been put in proper order, and the house was fit for occupation, which seems to have been about the 20th of April. For the inconvenience caused by removal, and the non-occupation of the premises in question for a couple of months, I think £25 a fair sum to award as a deduction from rent, and decree accordingly for £15 is pronounced in the action against the party Granger."

v. Granger.

No. 87. note, that the landlords—this Heritable Security Company—before raising the action, offered to make a deduction from the rent for the time when the tenant was not actually in occupation of the house, and we are now told that they acquiesce in the finding of the Sheriff, that the amount effeiring to that period is £25. The question is, therefore, now narrowed in this action for rent to whether Dr Granger is to pay £15 or no. That, at least, appears to be the subject of this litigation, but the Sheriff indicates in his judgment that there is a somewhat larger question between the parties. Dr Granger, it seems, refused to accept this reduction of £25 in his rent, unless the lease was to be held to be at an end,—that is to say, the parties desire under this record, which relates solely to a half year's rent, to try the question as to the effect of certain letters, whether they bind Dr Granger for a longer period or no. Counsel for the appellant accordingly stated at the bar that the questions raised involved not only the half year's rent mentioned in the action, but the whole rent for two years afterwards. In this action we can decide nothing except as to the half year's rent mentioned on record, although personally I am very willing to give my opinion upon the other matter, to aid the parties to settle all questions between them.

The facts as to the £15 are shortly as follows :—The drains in this house were, to say the least, not in a satisfactory state. It was not a sweet smelling house. At the request of the tenant some attention was paid to the drains in February 1879 ; thereafter, in the end of January 1880, Dr Granger, having regard to the option given him to terminate the lease at Whitsunday 1880, entered into negotiations with the factor for the landlord to take on the house for some time longer at a reduced rent. He was absolutely entitled to break off the old lease, and the proposals now were for a new lease. On 6th February the tenant wrote concluding a bargain for a new lease at a reduced rent. At this time some of his family had sickened, and this sickness spread until they became seriously ill, and by 16th February their condition was critical. Upon 21st February the youngest child—a baby—died, and the other children were prostrated by severe attacks of typhoid fever. This state of affairs induced Dr Granger to make inquiry as to the state of the drains, and the result was, that he was satisfied that the illness of his children, and the death of one, was due to the state of the drains in the house. The Sheriff-substitute seems to think he had reasonable grounds for this belief. I concur with the Sheriff in this view. Indeed, I think, this tenant was not only entitled, but bound, to remove his children from this house.

The landlord then proceeded to inspect the drains and put them in order. They were found to be in a very bad state, and it was two months before the house was in a condition for the return of the family. This brings us to the end of April. The landlord maintains that the tenant should have returned to the house then, and, as I have said, is prepared to make a deduction from the rent in respect of the two months' disturbance of possession while the drains were being repaired.

Upon this nice question, whether the father of a family who are alarmingly ill—one already dead—is justified in removing them from the house which is the cause of their illness, and is bound, when the cause of the illness is removed, to return to the house, though, for but a short time, the solution of this action, involving a sum of £15, depends. I am of opinion that a tenant so disturbed in his possession, with his family struck down by illness, is not bound to return to the house the moment the disturbing cause is removed, particularly if there is nothing to oblige him to remain in the house for more than a few weeks. I think that the failure—not necessarily through culpa—on the part of a landlord to fulfil his obligation to supply a habitable house disentitles him to ask for rent for the half year, and entitles the tenant to state the defence which we have here, and which I humbly recommend your Lordships to sustain. v. Granger.

Upon the ulterior question, which is plainly more interesting to the parties—that is, whether the tenant is bound to return to the house and to pay rent for two more years—I am of opinion that, although prima facie he would appear bound to return to the house, not under the old lease, but under a new one entered into under his letter of 6th February, still in consequence of the letters of 16th and 21st February I think he is no longer bound. Nothing having followed upon the letter of 6th February, in the circumstances, the serious and increasing sickness in the family, arising from the bad state of the house, entitled him to resile. If that be considered to be going too far I am then further of opinion that, in the circumstances, we would not be warranted in giving specific implement under the letter of 6th February. If the tenant be held to be bound the remedy of the landlord in such a case would be only a claim for damages, and nothing having taken place between 6th and 16th February, any damages awarded must necessarily be infinitesimal. I only indicate this as an opinion for the benefit of the parties, as the question I have last dealt with is not raised on record. On the true question raised, I think the appellant is entitled to have the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor recalled, and to be assoilzied.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the result arrived at by, and in the opinion of, Lord Young. The only question to be determined by us is whether the landlord is to have more than the £15 for which the Sheriff-substitute has decreed, or less. The condition on which a landlord is entitled to recover rent is that he fulfils the obligation of supplying a house safe to live in, and if time be necessary to put the house in a position to be inhabited is the landlord to be entitled to say,—“You had better withdraw till the house is put right, but there is to be no end put to the lease, and you must return the moment the house is habitable, and everything must be as if there had been no interruption?” The question, of course, turns, to a great measure, on the degree. In this case there can be no doubt that the tenant was entitled, nay, bound, to remove. It is hardly possible to conceive of anything more important in a house than the drains. There had been for a long period complaints of smells, and much discomfort followed thereon. I do not say that the landlord was remiss or indifferent, and when complaints were made to him he at once sent to have them put right. But all this only shews how very deep-seated the defects were, and by February 1880 matters had become intolerable. Not only were there offensive smells, but first one and then other members of the family sickened, and towards the end of the month the baby died. It followed that the tenant put the two things together, and attributed the illness and death to the state of the drains. The Sheriff-substitute thinks they were probably connected, and I concur in that view, also in the Sheriff's opinion that the tenant was right to remove his family from the house. If the drains could have been put right in a day or two perhaps the case might have been different, but it is not necessary to go into that, as it took two months to make this house habitable for this tenant or anyone else. The question then is, the tenant having left the house

No. 87. for good reason, and provided himself with another, is he bound to return to it when, after the lapse of two months, the house has been made habitable? I think there was sufficient failure on the part of the landlord to warrant the tenant in not returning to the house. His occupation, which was to be continuous, was interrupted for no less a period than two months. That is an interruption which the landlord had no right to insist that his tenant should agree to. That being so, it is not necessary for us to go beyond the lease, which terminated at Whitsunday 1880, because, if the tenant was not bound to return under it before its expiry then he could not be bound to return afterwards.

v. Granger.

It is said, however, that there was a new lease from Whitsunday 1880, and that the landlord is prepared to give a habitable house for the whole period of that lease. It is not usual to give an opinion upon a point which is not raised by the pleadings, such as this; but as it may be for the benefit of the parties here I concur in the course taken by Lord Young, and also in the view stated by his Lordship.

It appears to me that this offer for a new lease would never have been made if the appellant had known the true state of the house, and that he would have to remove before the term of commencement of the new lease.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in the opinions which have been delivered.

This is an important case, because the sanitary state of houses in large cities has attracted considerable attention. I am of opinion that it has been proved (1) that the state of the drains in this house was so defective as to be dangerous to health, and that as at 10th February 1880; (2) that the appellant's family suffered in health in consequence; (3) that the appellant was entitled to remove them whenever it was ascertained that the above was the state of affairs, and in consequence of this all being so, he was not bound to return when the drains were repaired. I am further of opinion, with Lord Young, that the appellant was, in the circumstances, entitled to resile from the alleged new lease.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—" (Firstly) in the action at the instance of The Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited) against the appellant, defender therein—Find that during the half year from Martinmas 1879 to Whitsunday 1880 the house referred to in the record was, from the bad state of the drainage thereof, in such a condition as not to be habitable with safety to human life, and that the appellant was in consequence compelled to remove, and did remove himself and family therefrom in the course of said term, viz., in the month of February 1880, and that he is not in law liable for the half year's rent sued for: Therefore sustain the appeal; recall the interlocutor appealed against; assoilzie the appellant from the conclusions of the summons, and decern. (Secondly) in the action at the instance of the appellant against the respondents, The Scottish Heritable Security Company (Limited)—Find that with respect thereto this appeal is not insisted in: Recall the interlocutor appealed against, in so far as it finds the respondents, defenders therein, entitled to expenses, and quoad ultra dismiss the appeal, and decern: And (thirdly), in the conjoined actions, find no expenses due to either parties in the Sheriff Court, and find the appellant entitled to the expenses of this appeal, and remit to the Auditor," &c.

Personal bar—Acceptance of composition—Mora.—Held that a creditor who had refused to accept a composition on his debt, but had neglected for ten months to return to his debtor a bill for the amount of the composition which was subsequently sent to him, was not barred thereby from insisting in an action for the payment of the whole amount of his debt.

WILLIAM THEW & Co., merchants, London, and John Roberts, S.S.C.,^{1st Division} their mandatary, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against Sinclair & Co., drysalters, Calton Street, Edinburgh, praying the Court to ordain the defenders to pay to the pursuers the sum of £35, 12s., with interest thereon from the date of citation till payment. ^{Sheriff of Midlothian.}

Cond. 3 was in the following terms :—"The pursuers have often desired and required the defenders to make payment of said sum, but they refuse or at least delay to do so, and have thus rendered the present action necessary. With reference to the counter statement, it is explained that the defenders offered a small composition, which the pursuers refused, but the pursuers offered to accept 10s. per £. This offer the defenders declined. The defenders sent a bill for the smaller composition in disregard of the pursuers' refusal to accept it, and the bill lay with the pursuers unnoticed for some time, until it was returned by pursuers' solicitor on or about 24th May 1880."

To this the defenders answered :—(Ans. 3) "Admitted that the defenders refused to pay the sum sued for. Explained that in 1879 the defenders found it necessary to compound with their creditors, and offered a composition which was accepted by them, including the pursuers of the present action. In payment of the said composition on the pursuers' debt, the defenders, through their agents, on 25th July 1879, sent the pursuers a promissory-note for £8, 15s. 6d., payable by three equal instalments at four, eight, and twelve months. The pursuers duly received and retained the said bill until 27th May 1880, when it was returned to the defenders by the pursuers' agents."

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia ;—2. The pursuers having declined to agree to the composition proposed, and not having accepted the bill referred to by the defender under said composition arrangement, nor received payment thereof, but returned the same, are entitled to decree.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—1. The pursuers having accepted of a composition on their debt, and the defenders having been all along quite willing to pay the said composition, the pursuers are not entitled to insist on payment of their original claim.

On 19th July 1880, the Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) issued the following interlocutor :—"The Sheriff-substitute having heard parties' procurators on the closed record, Finds that the defenders, having become embarrassed in their circumstances, proposed a composition contract to their creditors: Finds that having been applied to for consent of this transaction, the pursuers expressly declined the same: Finds that notwithstanding said refusal the defenders sent to the pursuers a composition bill for £8, 15s. 6d., payable in equal instalments: Finds that said bill was sent to the pursuers on 25th July 1879, and was retained by them till 27th May 1880: Finds that by such retention of the composition bill the pursuers are barred from insisting in their original claim: Sustains the defences to that effect: Dismisses the action, reserving to the pursuers their right to insist for the composition due on their debt."

Hew & Co. v. Sinclair & Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot say that this case is in a satisfactory state. The action is brought for payment of a bill for £39, 0s. 7d., and it is dismissed by the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff on the footing that the pursuers have accepted a composition upon the debt, and are consequently not entitled to sue for the whole. If that had been made out in point of fact the judgment would have been quite right, but as the case stands it is not so made out. We have nothing before us but the record, and no such admission is made. It is true that the defenders aver that the composition was accepted, and their statement is quite relevant. They say that “in 1879 the defenders found it necessary to compound with their creditors, and offered a composition, which was accepted by them, including the pursuers of the present action. In payment of the said composition on the pursuers’ debt, the defenders, through their agents, on 25th July 1879, sent the pursuers a promissory-note for £8, 15s. 6d., payable by three equal instalments at four, eight, and twelve months. The pursuers duly received and retained the said bill until 27th May 1880.” If that statement is true, the defenders are entitled to prevail. But what do the pursuers say? They explain that “the defenders offered a small composition, which the pursuers refused, but the pursuers offered to accept 10s. per £. This offer the defenders declined. The defenders sent a bill for the smaller composition, in disregard of the pursuers’ refusal to accept it, and the bill lay with the pursuers unnoticed for some time, until it was returned by pursuers’ solicitor on or about 24th May 1880.”

Now, as I understand the judgments of the Sheriffs, they proceed on these admissions as sufficient for the decision of the case. This is quite clear from the terms of the Sheriff-substitute’s interlocutor. It is in the last finding of that interlocutor that the fallacy or vice of the judgment is to be found. I cannot assent to the proposition that by the mere retention of the composition bill the pursuer is barred from insisting in his full claim. Such a doctrine would be followed by very serious and dangerous consequences. The creditors are asked, not in pursuance of any trust-deed granted by the insolvent, nor even of any writing, such as a minute of a meeting of creditors, but simply on the motion of the debtor himself, to accept a composition. The creditors declined, but offered to accept a larger composition. Then the defenders send them a bill for the composition they had offered, payable by instalments, which the pursuers neglect to return for nearly twelve months. Is that sufficient to bar the pursuers from insisting for the whole amount of their debt? I am certainly of opinion that it is not. Therefore, while the defence is relevant, I think that it is not proved, and what I should propose is that we should recall the interlocutors appealed against, and remit to the Sheriff to take a proof.

LORD MURE and LORD CURRIEHILL concurred.

LORD DEAS and LORD SHAND were absent.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutors appealed against, and remitted to the Sheriff to allow proof.

Simpson v. Selkirk.

Process—Debts Recovery (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict.), cap. 96—Addition of plea after case decided in inferior Court—Pars Judicis.—When, in an action under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, a person having sufficient means to enable him to employ an agent conducts his own cause he will not, in an appeal against the judgment, be entitled to state a new plea.

ON 14th June 1880 James L. Selkirk, executor-dative of the late Rev. George Selkirk Jack, raised an action under the Debts Recovery Act, 1867, in the Sheriff Court of Fife, against James Simpson, Thornton. The summons concluded for payment of the sum of £50, "being the restricted amount of an account."^{1st Division}

The account, which was incurred during the years 1872–73–74, included, besides board and washing, payments of college fees, tradesmen's accounts, and various small cash advances. The defender, without the assistance of an agent, conducted his own cause before the Sheriff-substitute (Lamond), and pleaded, "The account is paid."

On 8th July 1880 the Sheriff-substitute noted the pleas, in terms of the statute, and put out the case for hearing on 22d July.

On that day he granted "decree, with expenses, defender having failed to prove by competent evidence that the debt has been paid."

On 29th July 1880 the defender appealed, through his agent, to the Sheriff (Crichton), and at the hearing his procurator moved the Sheriff to allow a plea that the account sued on was prescribed to be added.

The Sheriff refused to admit the plea, and, on 25th October, dismissed the appeal.*

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is not very easy for a Judge sitting in this Court to place himself exactly in the position of a Sheriff sitting in the Small-Debt or Debts Recovery Courts, and I daresay one is inclined to think that the Sheriffs go too fast, and do not give sufficient indulgence to the parties, and I am very much inclined, when there is the least appearance of a litigant having been taken up too sharply, to restore him, if possible, to his rights. Certainly here, on the face of the proceedings, there is some appearance of haste, when we remember that it is a case of a man defending himself without legal advice. If it had appeared that the appellant was so poor a man as not to be able to afford legal advice it would have made the case much stronger. But there is no appearance of that. We must assume that this was a man of means, for he sent his son to a boarding school at a considerable cost, and must therefore have had means enough to employ an agent. But he did not choose to do so until after the case had been decided against him, so he can take no benefit from that consideration. The question then is, whether there has been such injustice done as to justify us in upsetting the Sheriffs' judgments? I am not inclined to think that there has.

If an account sued for in the Small Debt Court appears clearly on the face of it to be prescribed under the statute, I think that it is the duty of the Sheriff to give effect to the prescription, whether it is pleaded or not; for in that Court bankrupt's workshop, but not to include joiner's bench, grindstone, workmen's tools, trestles, planks, or wood not specially appropriated for the above purposes lying in the loft above the store, all of which the trustee reserves power to dispose of otherwise. The materials at the feu to include all wood and slates laid down to be used in the building, trestles excepted. It being agreed that Mr Campbell is to pay the stamps on both deeds above mentioned, instead of one-half each."

The memorandum of agreement was approved of at a meeting of the trustee and commissioners, and was engrossed in the sederunt-book of the sequestration. The Misses Campbell paid the £10 for the stones, as required by the second head of the agreement, and withdrew their claim to rank for £108, 4s. 4d., the unsecured balance of their debt, on the bankrupt estate.

Thereafter the Misses Campbell entered into possession of the subjects, completed the buildings, and drew the rents. It was stated that the expense of completing the buildings was about £500. The bankrupt was aware of these arrangements, and made two separate offers to buy the subjects from the agents of Misses Campbell on behalf of his sister. A draft disposition by the trustee in favour of the Misses Campbell was prepared, but was never executed. Douglas obtained his discharge without composition on 26th December 1862. A dividend of 1s. 6d. was paid by the trustee, who was discharged on 24th May 1866. On 28th January 1869 the Misses Campbell assigned the bond and disposition in security to their agent, Mr Maclachlan, for £400, and he thereafter drew the rents for his own behoof.

On 24th February 1879 Donald Douglas raised an action against Mr Maclachlan and the Misses Campbell, concluding for declarator that the bond and disposition in security was extinguished by the intromission of the defenders with the rents of the subjects, and that the subjects belonged to him, and also for an accounting.

On 5th June 1879 Mr Maclachlan raised a counter action against Dugald Campbell, the trustee in the sequestration, and the creditors, concluding for declarator that by the memorandum of agreement the trustee was bound to grant a disposition of the subjects to the Misses Campbell, and that the pursuer was now vested in their right, and had right of absolute property in the subjects, and that the defender Douglas should be ordained to execute a disposition of the subjects in the pursuer's favour, and failing his doing so, for adjudication in favour of the pursuer.

Douglas, the pursuer of the first action, pleaded ;—1. The pursuer is entitled to decree as concluded for, in respect (1) of his discharge and re-investiture, and of the said trustee having been discharged without disposing of the said lands and others ; (2) of the said debt being more than paid, and there being a balance of intromissions in the defender's hands ; and (3) of the defender having refused to produce an account of his intromissions as heritable creditor, and receive or pay any balance due to or by him.

Maclachlan, who alone defended the first action, pleaded ;—1. The pursuer has no title to sue. 2. The pursuer is barred, personali exceptione. 4. In virtue of the conveyance contained in the said bond and disposition in security, and assignation, and of the agreement set forth in the defender's statement of facts, the defender is absolute proprietor of the subjects in question, and he is therefore entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

The actions were conjoined.

The Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In the action at the instance of Donald Douglas against the said Dugald Maclachlan and Christina Campbell, sustains the first plea in law for the defender the said Dugald Maclachlan, and assoilzies him from the conclusions of the action: And in the said conjoined actions of declarator and adjudication in implement, finds and declares that by agreement entered into in or about October 1859 between Dugald Campbell, sometime trustee on the sequestrated estate of the said Donald Douglas, on behalf of and as duly authorised by the creditors of the said Donald Douglas, on the one hand, and the said Dugald Maclachlan for himself, and on behalf of and as duly authorised by the said Christina Campbell and the now deceased Margaret Campbell, on the other hand, it was agreed that, upon the conditions specified in the memorandum of agreement signed by the said Dugald Campbell and the said Dugald Maclachlan, the rights of the said Christina Campbell and Margaret Campbell in and to the heritable subjects mentioned in the conclusions of the actions, constituted by a bond and disposition in security, granted by the said Donald Douglas in favour of the said Christina Campbell and Margaret Campbell, dated 20th March, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines 1st April 1859, should become rights of absolute property, and should be freed and discharged of all right of property or reversion competent to the said trustee and creditors and the said Donald Douglas; and that the said trustee, on behalf of the said creditors, became bound to grant to the said Dugald Maclachlan or the said Christina Campbell and Margaret Campbell a conveyance to the said heritable subjects, or any rights of property or reversion which the said Donald Douglas might have therein: Finds and declares that the said agreement was acted upon and that the said Dugald Maclachlan is now, by virtue of assignation in his favour by the said Christina Campbell and Margaret Campbell, dated 28th January 1869, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines 26th February 1869, vested in the whole right, title, and interest of the said Christina Campbell and Margaret Campbell under the said bond and disposition in security, and also under the said agreement with the said Dugald Campbell, and has right to the heritable subjects before referred to: Quoad ultra assoilzies the said Donald Douglas from the conclusions of the conjoined actions, and decerns: Finds the said Dugald Maclachlan entitled to expenses, but subject to modification; allows an account thereof to be lodged, and remits." &c.*

Douglas v.
Maclachlan.

* "NOTE.—The said Donald Douglas was sequestrated on the 25th August 1859. Dugald Campbell, accountant in Greenock, was thereafter duly confirmed trustee on his sequestrated estates.

"The effect of the confirmation of the trustee was, under the 102d section of the Bankruptcy Act, to vest in him, for behoof of the creditors, absolutely and irredeemably, as at the date of the sequestration, the whole property of the debtor, Donald Douglas,—as regards the heritable estate, to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication in implement of sale, as well as a decree of adjudication for payment, and in security of debt, subject to no legal reversion, had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration. It appears, accordingly, that the pursuer Donald Douglas was thereby divested of all right of property in the heritable subjects which he now claims, and the same were vested in the trustee on his sequestrated estates.

"The pursuer was discharged, without payment of a composition, on 26th December 1862, and consequently was not retrocessed in his estates.

Douglas reclaimed, and argued ;—The fee of the property remained in the bankrupt. The trustee had never made up a title to the subjects, and they, therefore, did not vest in him.¹ The Misses Campbell's possession, and all the possession which followed, must be referred to the security title. No length of possession could convert a security right into a right of property without some other step.² The trustee must be held to have abandoned the subject. He had no power to alienate the heritable property of the bankrupt without the consent of the creditors, and of the Accountant in Bankruptcy, under sec. 115 of the Bankruptcy Act. The agreement was not of the nature of a compromise allowed by the 176th section of the Bankruptcy Act, but was a sale of the heritage.

Argued for the respondent ;—Douglas had no title to sue, as the whole of his property had been taken from him and vested in the trustee under the 102d section of the Bankruptcy Act. The actings of the trustee shewed that he had no intention of abandoning this part of the estate. On the contrary, he made it useful by transacting on the footing that it was a valuable asset. perty the bankrupt's radical right may revive to the effect of entitling him to sue therefor—Fleming v. Duncan, Nov. 16, 1876, 4 Ret. 112. But there is no such case here. What took place is this :—Two Misses Campbell held an heritable bond over the subjects for £400, and an assignation to certain building materials on the ground. They valued this security at £300, leaving an unsecured balance of principal and interest of £108, 4s. 4d., for which they claimed in the sequestration. Thereafter, in October 1859, they entered into an agreement with the trustee, by which it was, inter alia, agreed that, in consideration of the trustee allowing them to retain Arbuthnot's feu, and buildings thereon, the subjects in question, and the materials included in the assignation, they should withdraw the claim lodged by them in the sequestration, and have no ranking on the estate. It was further agreed that the trustee should grant the defender, Mr Maclachlan, or his clients (the Misses Campbell), as he might prefer, a conveyance to the feu, and any right of property or reversion the bankrupt might have therein, the title to be taken as it stood, and the trustee not to be bound to produce any of the titles except the act and warrant in his own favour. This agreement was submitted to the commissioners and creditors, and approved of by them, and recorded in the minute-book of the sequestration. It has been acted on by all concerned, and, in respect of it, the Misses Campbell, and the defender, who is now in their right, have been in possession of the subjects ever since. Had the defender obtained from the trustee the conveyance specified in the agreement the Lord Ordinary does not see what possible ground of claim to the subjects the pursuer could have had. Unfortunately, however, the defender neglected to do so. The proceedings in the sequestration were brought to an end, and the trustee discharged on 24th May 1866 without having granted a conveyance of the subjects. This may create some difficulty in the way of the defender now getting a title from the trustee ; but the Lord Ordinary does not see how it should revive any right to the subjects on the part of the pursuer, who was absolutely divested of them as at the date of the sequestration.

“The Lord Ordinary does not think he can give effect to the conclusion for adjudication against Douglas. He does not see that he is under any obligation to implement the obligation undertaken by the trustee ; and as the statutory effect of the act and warrant of confirmation of the trustee was to adjudge the subjects, to the same effect as if a decree of adjudication had been pronounced in favour of the trustee, and recorded at the date of the sequestration, he does not see that there was anything left in Douglas to be the subject of a second adjudication.”

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question in this case regards the right of property in certain subjects situated in Tarbert, in the county of Argyll, which formerly belonged to Donald Douglas, the reclaimer. He was sequestrated in August 1859, and these subjects, along with the rest of his estate, accrued to his trustee under the statutory title conferred by section 102 of the Bankruptcy Act. The bankrupt was discharged, not on a composition, but after payment of a dividend. His discharge is dated 26th December 1862.

His present object is to recover the subjects which fell under the adjudication of the 102d section of the Bankruptcy Act. He is opposed by Mr Maclachlan, who says that he has obtained right to the subjects from the trustee. The agreement by which this was said to be accomplished is dated 13th October 1859, within two months of the date of sequestration. The trustee was authorised to enter into that agreement by the commissioners on the estate, and he had a special direction to do so from a general meeting of the creditors. At that time the Misses Campbell, Mr Maclachlan's cedents, held a bond for £300 over these subjects, and it appears that an agreement was entered into for the purpose of making over the subjects to the Misses Campbell. The heads of the agreement were—"1st, In consideration of the trustee allowing Mr Maclachlan's clients to retain Arbutnot's feu and buildings thereon, and the materials included in the assignation by the bankrupt to Misses Campbell, they are to withdraw the claim lodged by them in the sequestration, and are to have no ranking on the estate." Then there is an arrangement as to certain stones. "3d, The trustee to grant Mr Maclachlan or his clients, as he may prefer, a conveyance to the feu or any right of property or reversion the bankrupt may have therein, the title to be taken as it at present stands, but the trustee not to be bound to produce any of the titles except the act and warrant in his own favour. The trustee to relieve Mr Maclachlan, or his clients the disponees, of all feu-duties, public and parochial burdens, due and exigible at and preceding Whitsunday last, which is to be the term of entry, the disponees relieving the trustee of feu-duties and burdens exigible after that term, and repaying to the trustee the proportion of feu-duty charged against the bankrupt by Mr Campbell of Stonefield up till Martinmas next. 4th, A mutual discharge to be granted by the parties. 5th, The said disposition to be drawn and extended, and the discharge revised by Mr Maclachlan at his clients' expense, and they to pay one-half of the stamp-duties of disposition and discharge, the trustee paying his own agent the revising fees of the disposition and drawing and extending fees of the discharge, and also the other half of the stamp-duties." Then there was a further provision as to what was to be held to be conveyed by the disposition. These proceedings appear to be regular and complete, and the trustee had full authority to enter into the agreement. The estate gained by the withdrawal of a claim of £108, 4s. 4d., which was asserted to be the unsecured balance of the debt due to the Misses Campbell. On the other hand the Misses Campbell obtained a right of property instead of the right of security which they formerly held.

MacLachlan.

If the trustee had granted the disposition which he was bound to grant, the title of the Misses Campbell and Mr MacLachlan, their successor, would have been undoubted. But that was not done, and the matter remains on the personal contract in the memorandum of agreement. Douglas now says that in consequence of the termination of the sequestration and his discharge the subjects revert to him, as when a trustee and creditors abandon a right or a subject falling under the sequestration the right reverts to the bankrupt. Now, as a general rule, that may be quite true. But I see no room here for the application of the rule. The trustee and creditors did not abandon the subject. On the contrary, they dealt with the subject as an asset, and entered into an onerous contract to transfer it to the Misses Campbell. It appears to me that the ground on which the reclamer relies entirely fails, and that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is sound. There may be some technical difficulty in completing the title, but I have no doubt in whom the substantial right is vested.

LORD SHAND.—I agree with your Lordship in holding that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is sound. The bankrupt was divested of his estate by the sequestration, and by force of the Bankruptcy Statute the property in question was transferred from him to his trustee, just as if adjudication in implement had been granted in favour of the trustee. I know of two ways, and only two, by which a bankrupt can recover the title to his heritable estate. The first of these is retrocession—and the second, clear abandonment by the creditors in his favour of their right to the property. Now, here there is no suggestion that any retrocession was made. The bankrupt got his discharge without composition, but he was not reinvested in any part of his estate, although the discharge, admittedly by mistake, bears that he was. The only question therefore is, whether the trustee and creditors abandoned this subject so as to give him right to take it up. I have seldom listened to an argument less convincing than that which was addressed to us in support of the contention that the trustee and creditors had abandoned this subject. What occurred was this. The Misses Campbell lodged a claim in the sequestration, which brought out an unsecured balance due to them of £108, 4s. 4d. A negotiation between the trustee on the one side and the heritable creditors on the other thereupon began, the result of which was that the heritable creditors agreed to withdraw their claim to a ranking on condition that the trustee and commissioners should transfer to them the absolute right to the property which they had previously held in security only. This was a sale of the property, and excludes all idea of abandonment. If, then, there has been no abandonment and no retrocession, there can be no title in the bankrupt to demand that the property shall be transferred to him.

Another argument was presented to us, founded on the circumstance that this property was sold by private bargain, but not as the statute requires in that case, with the consent of a majority in number and value of the creditors. If the creditors had raised this objection it might have been a formidable one; but has the bankrupt any title to plead it? He was discharged on composition after paying a dividend of 1s. 6d. in the £. If the estate had paid a considerable composition, he might possibly be entitled to object to a private sale, on the ground that a larger price might have been got by public roup, and so there might have been a reversion in his favour. But such a notion is excluded by the circumstances of the present case. I therefore think the bankrupt, having no possible interest in any reversion or recovery for the benefit of his estate, has No. 90.

no title to insist in this objection.

But there is another ground on which I think the bankrupt cannot succeed. Feb. 4, 1881.
Douglas v.
MacLachlan.
He was personally well aware twenty years before he raised the present action, that the trustee and commissioners were transacting with the heritable creditors with regard to his property. He made offer to buy the subjects from the creditors in two letters. That offer was not agreed to. The bankrupt then stood by, and allowed the heritable creditors to conclude an arrangement with the trustee and commissioners, and thereafter to lay out large sums of money on the property, and to act on the faith of the contract being binding. They have so acted for twenty years, and now the bankrupt wishes to overturn the contract, when, through the expenditure and an improved demand for such property, the subject is greatly increased in value. His contention cannot, in such circumstances, be sustained, and if it were necessary for the decision of the case I think this ground alone would be sufficient to justify the Court in holding that the bankrupt is not entitled to succeed.

LORD DEAS was absent at the advising, but the Lord President stated that he concurred.

Trust—Power to grant leases—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict.), c. 97, sec. 3.—Section 3 of the above Act empowers the Court to grant authority to trustees to grant long leases of the estate under their management "on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof." A trust-deed directed that after the death of the truster's widow (who was to have a liferent of the whole estate), the trustees were to enter into possession of the whole lands thereby disposed, and to divide and pay over the proceeds half-yearly among his children as an alimentary provision, and, upon the death of the last survivor of the said children, to sell and dispose of the whole lands so conveyed, and to divide the proceeds among his grandchildren then alive. The trustees, during the life of the truster's widow, presented a petition to the Court for leave to grant a lease of part of the said subjects for 999 years, the expediency of which course was beyond dispute. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Lee) held that the proposed lease was not contrary to the truster's intention as expressed in the trust-deed, and granted authority as craved. Feb. 5, 1881.

gow to Glasgow. The trust-deed directed that upon the death of the petitioner, Mrs Margaret Birkmyre, the wife of the truster, who was to have a liferent of the subjects, the trustees were "to enter upon the possession of the whole lands above disposed, and to divide and pay over the proceeds thereof" equally among the truster's children, "and that half-yearly." The deed then proceeded,—“And I declare the provisions hereby made in favour of my said children, born or to be born, to be

No. 91. strictly alimentary, and it shall not be in their power to assign the same, nor shall the same be arrestable or affectable for their or any of their debts or deeds of any kind, as they are intended for their own personal support and subsistence only.”

Feb. 5, 1881.
Birkmyre, &c.

The trust-deed, in the second place, directed the trustees, on the death of the longest liver of the truster's children, “to sell and dispose of the whole lands and others above conveyed, and, on realising the proceeds thereof, to divide the same after deducting any expenses which may have been incurred in the management of the said trust, and in the sale of the said lands and others, equally among the lawful children” of the truster's children, “and thereupon the trust shall be held to be at an end.”

In July 1878 the trustees, including the liferentrix Mrs Birkmyre, and all the beneficiaries under the trust-deed, presented a petition to the Court under the Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867, 30 and 31 Vict., c. 97, sec. 3,* praying the Court for leave to enter into a lease with the Corporation of Port-Glasgow, whereby certain of the trust-subjects, part of those situated near the City Road, were to be leased by that body for 999 years at a rent of £110 (with a duplication every twenty-first year). It was shewn in the petition that if the proposed long lease were allowed there would be an immediate increase of rent from the subjects to the extent of £31, 12s. 0d., and that the subjects were so situated that there was little likelihood of their ever becoming more valuable, so that the expediency of granting it was indisputable.

On 7th January 1881 the Lord Ordinary (Lord Lee) issued the following interlocutor:—“Having resumed consideration of the petition as amended, with the draft lease, No. 18 of process, the reports and supplementary reports of Messrs Graham and Smellie, and whole process, and having heard counsel thereon, finds that the proposed lease is inconsistent with the intention of the trusts referred to in the petition, and expressed in the trust-disposition and settlement, No. 7 of process: Therefore refuses the prayer of the petition, and decerns.”†

* By sec. 3 of 30 and 31 Vict., cap. 97, “Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867,” it is enacted that “it shall be competent to the Court of Session, on the petition of the trustees under any trust-deed, to grant authority to the trustees to do any of the following acts, on being satisfied that the same is expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof, and the Court shall determine all questions of expenses in relation to such application; and when it shall be of opinion that the expense of any such application should not be charged against the trust-estate, it shall so find in disposing of the application,” inter alia, “to grant feus or long leases of the heritable estate, or any part of it.”

† “NOTE.—The leading petitioners in this case are the trustees under the settlement of Mr William Birkmyre, merchant in Port-Glasgow, and they are also possessed of life interests in the subjects held in trust. They desire the authority of the Court to enter into a lease with the Corporation of Port-Glasgow, whereby the subjects described in the petition are to be held by that body for 999 years at a rent of £110 (with a duplication every twenty-first year) for the purposes of their gas-works. The Court has no power to grant such authority under the statute, unless it can be affirmed that the transaction is ‘expedient for the execution of the trust, and not inconsistent with the intention thereof.’ The terms of the trust-deed, as narrated in the petition, and fully set forth in the extract, No. 7 of process, appear to the Lord Ordinary to make it impossible to pronounce any such finding in this case.

“The trust-deed directs that after the death of the truster's widow (the petitioner Mrs Birkmyre, and who is to have a liferent of the subjects), the trustees are to enter upon the possession of the whole lands disposed by the settlement, to realise the profits, and to divide and pay over the proceeds ‘half-yearly’

No. 91.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case there can, I think, be no doubt of the expediency of the proposal of the petitioners. The subject in question yields about £30 per annum less than it would do if this long lease were entered into ; therefore there would be an immediate improvement of income if the proposal were granted, and there is no reason to suppose that the subject is of such a nature or so situated as to be likely to become of much greater value in future. The present advantage is not subject to any future possible disadvantage so far as we can see. That being so, the only question left for consideration is whether the course proposed is inconsistent with the intention of the truster,—that is to say, whether it is inconsistent with the main design and object of the trust-settlement. There is, fortunately, no difficulty in understanding what these were. They are fully and clearly stated in the deed itself. The testator evidently intended to give a liferent of the entire property to his wife, and after her death to divide the income among his children, until the death of the last survivor of them. The income, and the income alone, is given to the children. After the death of the last the entire property is to be sold, and the proceeds divided among the testator's grandchildren. It does not appear to me that this long lease will interfere in any way with the object of the testator ; it would enhance the present value of the subjects, and not interfere with the rights and interests of the liferenters or of the fiars. Everything would go on in the execution of the trust precisely as if the lease had not been granted, but with the additional benefit of a larger income. It is said that this is a sale, and that the only sale authorised is to take place after the death of the longest liver of the children, and that that implies a prohibition against any earlier sale. It is of importance to observe, however, that there is not in this case as in some of the cases cited to us, a direct prohibition against sale ; on the contrary, the estate is only to continue to exist in forma specifica till a certain event shall occur, and is then to be sold ; the intention was not to preserve the estate entire, but simply to keep among his children as an alimentary fund ; and, upon the death of the last survivor of the said children, they are to sell and dispose of the whole lands and others conveyed, and to divide the proceeds among their children then in life. The trust, therefore, is a trust to hold the subjects during the lifetime of the truster's children, and to sell, on the death of the last survivor, for behoof of the grandchildren of the truster then in life.

"It is always a delicate matter to authorise the anticipation of a period appointed for the sale of subjects in the neighbourhood of a place like Port-Glasgow ; and the truster may have had very good reasons for providing, as he did, that the subjects should be retained during the lifetime of his children (subject to a power of granting leases for nineteen years), and should be sold on the death of last survivor of them. The question is whether the granting at present of the proposed lease for 999 years would be consistent with the intention of the trust-deed, as regards the management and disposal of the property. And the Lord Ordinary feels bound to answer that question in the negative. The case seems to him to belong to the same class as that of Anderson, May 13, 1876, 3 R. 639.

"The concurrence of some of the grandchildren at present in existence does not appear to the Lord Ordinary to be sufficient to enable the Court to grant the petition. Those who are parties to the petition are in pupillarity or minority."

it as an income-yielding subject, and then, at the occurrence of a certain event, to sell and divide it among the grandchildren. We must observe, further, that the power of sale conferred by the deed cannot imply an intention to prohibit such a sale as is here proposed, for it is not of the nature of the sale that the trustees would have to make when the period for sale as directed in the settlement should arrive. Then the trustees would have to sell the estate in such a way as to get money to divide among the beneficiaries; they never could grant a long lease such as this. So the power asked in the petition is a different power to that given to the trustees in the future, and so is not, within the view of the testator, a power of sale at all. On the whole matter, I think we shall be aiding rather than frustrating the intention of the testator if we grant this petition.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD DEAS was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and granted the prayer of the petition.

Burgh of Partick v. Marshall.

Police—Assessment—Short tenancy—Stat. 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101 (General Police and Improvement Act, 1862), secs. 84 and 89—Stat. 17 and 18 Vict. cap. 91 (Valuation Act, 1854), secs. 4, 8, and 11.—Section 84 of the General Police Act enacts,—“Once in each year the commissioners . . . shall assess all occupiers of lands or premises within the burgh according to the valuation-roll made up and completed in terms of the Acts in force for the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland . . . in the sums necessary to be levied for the police purposes of this Act, . . . and shall fix a day on which the same shall be payable : . . . Provided always that such assessment shall be imposed as from the 15th day of May in one year to the 15th day of May in the following year, and shall not exceed a rate equal to”

Section 89 enacts,—“The assessments hereinbefore authorised to be imposed shall be levied from the occupiers of lands or premises, but deduction shall be allowed by the commissioners of the assessment for any period during which any lands or premises shall not be let or occupied for three months consecutively in any one year, and owners who shall let for rent or hire lands or premises for less than a year shall themselves, as well as the occupiers, be responsible for the said assessment applicable to any period less than a year, and the same may be recovered from such owners or from such occupiers as the commissioners shall judge expedient.”

On 8th September 1879 the commissioners of police in a burgh resolved to assess for the year from 15th May 1879 to 15th May 1880 according to the valuation-roll for that year (which was not then completed, in so far as appeals against it could not be finally disposed of prior to 30th September), at a certain rate per pound, and declared that the owners of premises let for periods less than a year should be responsible for the rates their tenants failed to pay.

The owner of houses let continuously for a year in successive short periods, sometimes to the same tenant, and sometimes to various tenants, objected to an assessment levied upon him as an owner responsible for his tenants (1) on the ground that the assessment was not valid, having been imposed at a time when the valuation-roll had not been finally completed, and (2) that section 89 only applied in cases where a house let for periods less than a year was vacant for some portion of the year.

Objections repelled.

ON 8th September 1879 the Commissioners of Police of the burgh of Partick, under the provisions of the 84th section * of the "General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862," resolved to assess the burgh at the rate of 1s. 6d. per pound of yearly value for the year from 15th May 1879 to 15th May 1880. They, at the same time, and as part of their resolution imposing the assessments, declared that the owners of all premises let for less than a year should themselves, as well as the occupiers, be responsible for these assessments and rates applicable to such premises, and that the same should be recovered from such owners in the event of the occupiers failing to pay the same within two months after they fall due.†

John Marshall was owner of certain premises within the burgh, all of which during the year ending 15th May 1880 from time to time were let for rent or hire on monthly or other tenancies for periods of less than a year. None of the premises stood unlet or unoccupied for three months consecutively during the year.

Notices of the amount of the assessment for each respective property were issued on 6th October and 2d December 1879, and in February 1880. A special notice was sent to Marshall on 24th September 1879 intimating the amount of the assessments on his property and the resolution of the commissioners to hold the owner of the premises responsible

* Stat. 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101, sec. 84.—"Once in each year the commissioners (being summoned in manner hereinbefore directed, by written or printed summonses, which shall state that the meeting is for the purpose of laying on an assessment), shall assess all occupiers of lands or premises within the burgh according to the valuation-roll made up and completed in terms of the Acts in force for the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland, subject to the exceptions herein-after provided, in the sums necessary to be levied for the police purposes of this Act, in so far as the same may have been adopted, and for the purposes to which the police assessment authorised by any Act in force in such burgh at the time of such adoption might have been applied, and shall fix a day on which the same shall be payable, and the rate of assessment, and the day so fixed by the commissioners shall be published by handbills posted in the burgh, and by advertisement in any newspaper circulating therein (if any be), or otherwise in some newspaper circulating in the county in which the burgh is situated: Provided always that such assessment shall be imposed as from the 15th day of May in one year to the 15th day of May in the following year, and shall not in any year exceed a rate equal to 2s. 6d. in the pound of the gross yearly value of such lands or premises when the enactments of this Act with respect to water have been adopted, or a rate equal to 1s. 6d. in the pound of the gross yearly value of such lands or premises where such enactments with respect to water have not been adopted; and such assessment shall for the purposes of this Act be called the police assessment: Provided further, when in any burgh under the provisions of any Police Act a higher rate of assessment is now and has been in use to be levied upon lands and tenements above a certain fixed rent than upon lower rented lands and tenements, it shall be in the power of the commissioners in laying on the assessment under this Act to continue the same relative rates of assessment if they think proper."

† Sec. 89.—"The assessments hereinbefore authorised to be imposed shall be levied from the occupiers of lands or premises, but deduction shall be allowed by the commissioners of the assessment for any period during which any lands or premises shall not be let or occupied for three months consecutively in any one year, and owners who shall let for rent or hire lands or premises for less than a year shall themselves, as well as the occupiers, be responsible for the said assessment applicable to any period less than a year, and the same may be recovered from such owners or from such occupiers as the commissioners shall judge expedient."

Burgh of Partick v. Marshall.

Marshall denied liability for the assessments.

Gavin Paisley, the collector and treasurer of the burgh, on 20th July 1880, raised an action against Marshall, concluding for the amount of the assessments.

Marshall defended the action, and explained "that the great proportion of the defender's tenants occupied their houses for the whole year in question consecutively, although holding under contracts of tenancy for periods short of a year. Explained further, that at the date of laying on the assessments sued for none of the premises had been vacant for a period of three months or upwards during the year to which the assessments applied."

He also added,—“Explained that by the 84th section of the General Police Act the assessments in question fall to be imposed ‘according to the valuation-roll made up and completed in terms of the Acts in force for the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland,’ and that the valuation-roll of Lanarkshire for the year from Whitsunday 1879 to Whitsunday 1880 was not and could not have been completed at the date of the laying on of the said assessments. Reference is made to the Valuation Act, 17 and 18 Victoria, chapter 91, and, in particular, to sections 4, 5, 8, 11, and 12 thereof.*

The pursuer pleaded;—The defender, being an owner who let for rent or hire the premises in question on monthly and other tenancies for less than a year, is responsible for payment of the assessments now sued for.

Pleaded for Marshall;—(2) Upon a sound construction of the statute libelled, the commissioners have no power to assess the defender for the occupier's rates due by his tenants. (3) There not being, in the case of any of the defender's tenants, any assessment leviable, applicable to any period less than a year, the section of the statute libelled does not apply. (4) The assessment sued for has not been duly imposed, in respect that it was imposed before the valuation-roll of the year was made up and completed. (5) In any view the commissioners were bound to make their election between the owners and occupiers, and were not entitled to assess both, in the manner libelled.

On 2d November 1880 the Lord Ordinary decerned against Marshall in terms of the conclusions of the summons.†

* By section 4 of this Act the valuation-roll is directed to be made up annually on or before 15th August in each year; by section 11 it is provided that from and after 8th September the assessor shall give up the roll for public inspection; and by section 8 all appeals against valuations are to be heard before 30th September in each year.

† “NOTE.—This action has been raised by the collector and treasurer of the burgh of Partick for the purpose of having an authoritative judgment of this Court as to the true meaning of the 89th section of ‘The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862.’ The form of the action is that of an ordinary petitory action in which the pursuer asks decree against the defender as owner of certain houses and premises within the burgh, for payment of certain police and other assessments imposed on these subjects by the commissioners of the burgh for the year from Whitsunday 1879 to Whitsunday 1880, for the purposes of and under the powers conferred by said statute. The liability of the defender depends upon the applicability of the 89th section of the statute to his case.

“The statute provides, by section 84, that once in each year the commissioners shall, for the year then current, i.e., from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, ‘assess all occupiers of lands or premises within the burgh, according to the valuation-roll made up and completed in terms of the Acts in force for the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland, subject to the exceptions herein-after provided, in the sums necessary to be levied for the police purposes of this Act.

"A question, which I shall afterwards advert to, is raised as to whether the assessments sued for were properly imposed according to the valuation-roll for 1878-79. But the main question is whether the defender, as 'owner' of the subjects in question, is liable for these assessments which the Act (section 84) directs to be 'imposed' upon 'occupiers.'

"Now, the statute (section 89) directs the tax so 'imposed' upon 'occupiers' to be also 'levied' from them; but it contains an exception from the general rule in cases where the premises are let for less than a year. The words are,— 'The assessments hereinbefore authorised to be imposed shall be levied from the occupiers of lands or premises, but deduction shall be allowed by the commissioners of the assessment for any period during which any lands or premises shall not be let or occupied for three months consecutively in any one year, and owners who shall let for rent or hire lands or premises for less than a year shall themselves, as well as the occupiers, be responsible for the said assessment applicable to any period less than a year, and the same may be recovered from such owners or from such occupiers as the commissioners shall judge expedient.'

"It is admitted that none of the premises belonging to the defender are let for a whole year. They are all let to tenants on contracts of tenancy for periods short of a year, although in some—perhaps in many—cases these contracts are from time to time renewed, so that, in point of fact, the same tenant may, and does, occupy his house for an entire year. None of the houses were unlet or unoccupied for three months consecutively, so that the present question turns upon the construction of the latter part of the 89th section.

"The defender maintains that, as the premises were de facto let for the whole year 1879-80, he does not come within the scope of the 89th section at all, while the pursuer maintains that he does, and points out that a decision in favour of the defender would in very many cases lead to the result that the assessments could not be recovered except to a very limited extent. A tenant under a monthly contract might often find it difficult, and would almost certainly refuse, to pay a whole year's assessment, especially as he has no means of recovering any part of it from his landlord or from succeeding tenants.

"It must be admitted that the enactment is not very well expressed, and that the meaning of the words used is by no means clear; but, after hearing and considering a very able argument from both sides of the bar, my opinion is in favour of the pursuer's view. I think that, as the defender's houses are admittedly let for periods less than a year, the defender as well as his tenants are responsible for the assessments applicable to the several periods less than a year for which they are respectively let to the tenants. Thus, let it be supposed that one of the defender's houses is let for a month to A, then for a month to B, and so on to other ten tenants each for a month. In such a case it could not be maintained with success that within the meaning of the statute the defender has not let his house for rent or hire for several distinct periods each less than a year. If so, it follows not only that the 'occupiers' would be responsible each for, at least, one month's assessment, but that the defender would also be responsible for each and all of the assessments, i.e., for the whole year's assessments, and that these would be recoverable from him if the commissioners of the burgh should choose to exercise their option of proceeding against him. Now, does it, or can it, make any difference that, instead of having twelve tenants each for one month, the defender lets his house to one tenant twelve times during the year for one month at a time? I think not, and I am therefore of opinion that the defender is responsible for the whole year's assessment. And I fail to premises belonging to the defender for the period between Whitsunday 1879 and Whitsunday 1880. The defender is not the occupier of the premises ; and it therefore becomes necessary to advert to the particular grounds on which the pursuer says he has become liable for payment of a tax which is primarily an occupier's tax. The pursuer says—(Cond. 2) "The premises of which the defender is owner are situated at Nos. 152, 142, 138, 130 Castlebank Street, 13 Graham Street, 61, 65, and 62 Merkland Street, 2 Marshall Place, and 52 Merkland Street, all within the bounds of the burgh of Partick. These premises were all, during the year ending 15th May 1880, from time to time let by the defender as owner for rent or hire, on monthly or other tenancies, for periods of less than one year. All the said premises were occupied during the said year by monthly tenants, or other tenants for periods less than a year ; and none of the said premises stood unlet or unoccupied for three months consecutively during the said year. The rents for the said premises are each £4 and upwards per annum, conform to statement herewith produced, shewing the rents and occupiers of all the said premises as appearing on the valuation-roll for the said year." And in another part of the record (Cond. 8) it is stated,—“All the occupiers, according to the said valuation-roll of the premises of which defender is owner as aforesaid, received special notices of the amount of their respective rates for the said police and public health assessments, of the time for appeals, payment, and other matters. A first see any force in the defender's argument that the pursuer is not entitled to assess both him and his tenants. He may not recover the assessment from both, for that would be taking payment twice over ; but he is surely entitled, if not bound, to intimate the assessment both to the defender and to his tenants, in order that all parties may know the amount of their responsibility, and that the defender, as owner, may, in letting his premises, be able to arrange matters so that the rates are taken into account in fixing the rent.

“But, then, the assessment must be duly imposed in terms of the statute, and the defender says that instead of imposing it according to the valuation-roll for 1879-80, ‘made up and completed,’ the commissioners imposed it on 8th September 1879, whereas the roll was not completed till after that date. I do not, however, think the objection well founded. It is not said that an excessive assessment has been imposed upon the burgh collectively, or that the defender's houses are assessed upon values higher or other than that which appears in the roll for the year current at the date of the resolution of the commissioners to assess. By the 8th September annually the new roll must be made up by the county assessor and lodged with the town-clerk, if there be one, or with the Sheriff of the county if there be no clerk. It is, no doubt, subject to revision on appeal, and until that is concluded the roll is not ‘completed in terms of the Valuation Acts.’ But when the roll leaves the assessor's hands and passes into public custody on 8th September it is sufficiently accurate to enable the commissioners of the burgh to estimate what sum will be required for public purposes. It is always necessary to allow a margin in laying on such assessments ; perfect accuracy is unattainable. There may be in the course of the year irrecoverable arrears, or houses, &c., unlet, or exemptions which, unless a moderate margin is allowed, would leave a deficiency to be met either by a supplementary assessment or by an increased assessment in the following year. Unless, therefore, it can be said (and it is not here pretended) that the commissioners of this burgh have assessed for an unreasonably large aggregate sum, I am of opinion that they have followed the directions of the 84th section of the statute, seeing that the assessments for 1879-80 imposed in respect of the defender's houses, and now sued for, are imposed according to the annual value thereof appearing in the valuation-roll made up and completed for that year.

notice was issued to the occupants of defender's premises on or about 6th October 1879, a second on or about 2d December 1879, and a third and final notice in or about the month of February 1880, all in the terms set forth in the printed forms herewith produced. Notwithstanding these notices, and of the simultaneous notices to the defender aftermentioned, these occupiers of the said premises have all failed to pay the said police and public health assessments, which amount together to the sum of £30, 13s. 6d. now sued for, conform to the said statement herewith produced, wherein the said assessments are separately set forth in detail for each of the said premises." These statements are practically admitted by the defender, and the question comes to be, whether in these circumstances the defender is liable in payment of these assessments under section 89 of the General Police Act of 1862? In construing that section it is necessary to go back to a previous section which authorises the imposition of the assessment, and it is very necessary to keep in view the distinction between the imposition and the levying of the tax.

The 84th section is concerned entirely with the imposition, and it authorises the Commissioners of Police in each year to "assess all occupiers of lands or premises within the burgh, according to the valuation-roll made up and completed in terms of the Acts in force for the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland, subject to the exceptions hereinafter provided, in the sums necessary to be levied for the police purposes of this Act, in so far as the same may have been adopted;" and when they come to this resolution they are to publish the resolution by handbills in the burgh and by advertisements in the newspapers; and it further provides that such assessments shall be imposed as from 15th day of May in any one year to 15th day of May in the following year, and shall not in any year exceed the rate of 2s. 6d. in the pound of the gross yearly value of such lands or premises. Now, what the Commissioners of Police are to do under this section is to pass a resolution, and publish it, and all that the resolution is required to contain is that a certain sum is to be imposed upon the burgh at a certain rate per pound. That is the resolution, and that is the notification required under this section. The levying of the assessment is a totally different matter, and there is nothing in the statute about the matter of levying until we come to section 89, except section 87, which provides that "the commissioners shall assess the owners in place of the occupiers of all lands or premises let at a rent under £4, and levy such assessment from such owners; but the commissioners shall allow to such owners a deduction from such assessment equal to one-fourth of the amount thereof; and such assessments shall be recoverable from such owners, along with any penalty which may have become exigible thereon, in the same way as herein provided with respect to the recovery thereof from occupiers." That is an exceptional provision, and does not interfere with the continuity of the statutory provisions. Therefore we see that, while section 84 of the statute provides for the mode of imposing the assessments, section 89 provides for the mode of levying the assessment. Now, the 89th section plainly consists of two parts. The first directs (and for the first and only time directs) how the tax is to be levied, and from whom. The words are these—"The assessments hereinbefore authorised to be imposed shall be levied from the occupiers of lands or premises." That is the general and leading enactment, and applies universally, with the exceptions after mentioned. The assessments are to be levied from the occupiers; "but deduction shall be allowed by the commissioners of the assessment for any period during which any lands or premises shall not be let or occupied for three months consecutively in any one year." That is not a well-expressed clause, but it plainly means this, I think, that if any premises are unoccupied for a part of a year not less than three months, then deduction corresponding to the period that the premises are unoccupied may be made from the assessments; and it is to be observed that that is not in the least degree confined in its action to the case where premises are let for shorter periods than a year, but would apply where any premises are not only unoccupied de facto, but where no rent is paid for them. Such a state of matters might occur from various circumstances. A man may take a house for a year, occupy it for six months, and then abscond without paying any rent; that would fall under this clause of the statute very plainly, and no doubt other cases will fall under it also. Cases where the premises are let for a shorter period than a year, and the owner fails to find a tenant for the remaining part of the year, would also fall under the clause. The first part of the section applies to all assessments imposed, and provides that they are to be paid by the occupiers, and allows deductions for premises unoccupied during a certain part of the year. Then comes the second portion of the section—"Owners who shall let for rent or hire lands or premises for a period less than a year, shall themselves, as well as the occupiers, be responsible for the assessments applicable to any period less than a year, and these assessments may be recovered from such owners or from such occupiers as the commissioners shall judge expedient." Now, there is one class of cases, admittedly, upon the face of this statute, which appears to fall under this provision—if the owner lets his premises for a part of the year, and they are not let at all for the remainder of the year, the case plainly falls within the clause, and the owner may be made answerable. But the pursuer contends that it is of no consequence whether the premises are occupied only for a part of the year or occupied for the whole year, provided they are occupied upon contracts for a less period than the whole year, and I think it very plain that the words of the clause are quite sufficient to cover that case, which is the case now before us. The premises with which we are dealing here were fully occupied during the year from May 1879 to May 1880, and they were occupied upon contracts of tenancy for periods of less than a year. The words of the Act are very clear in describing "such owners who shall let for rent or hire lands or premises for less than a year." Such owners are the subject of the proposition which we have to construe, and what is it that is predicated of them? They "shall themselves, as well as the occupiers, be responsible for the said assessment applicable to any period less than a year." Now, the argument is that these words are applicable to any period less than a year, and limit the liability of the owner to the assessment applicable only to fractions of a year for which the premises are let, and that he cannot be made answerable for the assessments for the whole year. That depends, it appears to me, on the circumstances of the case. If he is representing only a tenant who occupied for a fraction of a year, then he will be liable to pay an assessment applicable to that fraction of the year that that occupant was in occupation. But suppose that there are several occupants or consecutive occupations producing an occupation uninterruptedly during the entire year, is there anything in these words to exclude liability for the whole year in such a case? Plainly not; and for this reason, that the statute says the owner shall be responsible for the said assessment applicable to "any period less than a year," which must apply to "period or periods less than a year." That is the plain intention and motive of the language, because if a man as a tenant occupies for one period of the year, and that tenant is succeeded by another who occupies for the rest of the year, the plain intention of the enactment leads one to the conclusion that the landlord is to be equally answerable, along with the tenant, for the assessment applicable to that period, the object being to give the commissioners readier means of levying the assessments than they otherwise could have. Tenants of this description are not generally to be found in the valuation-roll. There may be a great deal of difficulty in finding them out, and still greater difficulty in inducing them to pay the assessment, because they are generally, of course, of a very poor class, and therefore it is that this statute, when premises are let in this way, makes the owner equally with the occupier liable in the assessments. We have had a very ingenious and subtle argument upon this section from the defender's counsel, but I confess there is no foundation for it upon the words, or upon the plain meaning, of the Act of Parliament. I am therefore of opinion that the defender is liable for these assessments under section 89, if these assessments have been properly imposed.

But it is said there was an imperfection in the manner in which the assessment was imposed, and that question depends on other considerations than those to which I have already adverted. Section 84 of the statute, as we have seen, provides that the assessment is to be imposed "according to the valuation-roll made up and completed in terms of the Acts in force for the valuation of lands and heritages in Scotland;" and it is said that the assessment here was not imposed in terms of the valuation-roll, because it was imposed on 8th September 1879, and the valuation-roll was not, in the words of the Act, "made up and completed" till the 30th of that month. It appears to me that, looking to the language of this 84th section of the statute, there is no force in this objection at all. All that the commissioners have to do is to pass a resolution to the effect that they require a certain sum of money, and in order to raise that amount of money they will assess, and do thereby assess, the community at so much per pound on their rentals. That is all that is required to be done in following out the provisions of the 84th section of the statute. It is not a thing that is to be completed at once, so that the assessment may be collected the next day after the resolution is passed. It is only a resolution that the thing is to be done—that is to say, that such an assessment is to be levied; and, in the meantime, the assessment is imposed—that is to say, the resolution is made that what is to be hereafter levied is to be levied at a certain rate per pound upon the rental. The resolution which the commissioners passed upon 8th September appears to me to be quite regular, and within the meaning of this clause of the Act of Parliament. They resolved to assess upon the valuation-roll; and if the Commissioners had added to their minute, which they might quite well have done, "according to the valuation-roll when it is made up and completed for the year," I think the defender could not have had a word to say against the validity of the resolution. In short, the date of making the resolution appears to me to be of no consequence at all if, in point of fact, it is carried out, and ultimately the tax is levied according to the valuation-roll. The defender does not, I understand, say—and if he had done so he would have had to say explicitly—that he has been charged more in name of police assessments than is justified by the valuation-roll as made up and completed on 30th September; and, that being so, it appears to me that this objection fails altogether, because, in the first place, the resolution to impose the assessment may, in my opinion, be made at any time, provided it be carried out

LORD MURE.—There are here two distinct questions before us, first, whether the circumstances of this case are such as to admit of the application of the provisions of the 89th section of the General Police Act of 1862, by which authority is given to police commissioners to recover assessments from the owners instead of the occupiers of the premises assessed; and, secondly, whether, upon the assumption that the case does come within the operation of that section of the statute the pursuer has complied with the statutory conditions as to the manner in which the assessment is to be imposed and levied or recovered.

On both questions I concur with your Lordship, and have little to add.

(1) It is very clear that sec. 89 deals with two different matters, viz., the case of property not let continuously throughout the year, but remaining unlet or unoccupied for three months consecutively, for which a deduction is to be allowed. That is the first part of it, and then it deals with the case of owners who have let their premises for less than a year, and provides that they, as well as the occupiers "are to be responsible for the assessment applicable to any period less than a year, and the same may be recovered from such owner, or from such occupiers, as the commissioners shall judge expedient." The defender, as I understood the argument, maintained that the latter part of the section did not apply, except in the case where the premises had also been unoccupied for three months continuously. I do not think that is a sound contention. That provision of the section was, I think, introduced for the purpose of enabling the authorities to levy the assessments from the owners in all cases where the premises were let for periods less than a year, even if the premises should in that way continue to be let for such short periods from time to time during most of the year. That, in the view I take of it, is the plain meaning and the plain policy of the section. The public authorities have not the same opportunity of recovering assessments in such cases from the occupiers as they have from the owners, as the occupiers as a class move about and are not, as a rule, people of much substance. But they are known, of course, to the owners, and where an owner has property of a description which requires to be so let, he must just make such arrangements with his tenants in adjusting their rents as will reimburse him in the sums he may be called on to pay for assessments on his property.

(2) On the second question, the provisions of secs. 84 and 91 appear to me on fair construction to amount to this, that the assessment is to be levied according to the valuation-roll as completed for the year. If that is done, and I understand it is admitted to have been done in the present instance, the assessment is, in my opinion, not open to objection. I therefore concur in the result at which your Lordship and the Lord Ordinary have arrived.

LORD SHAND concurred.

There had been a previous course of dealing between the parties, on which a balance arose in favour of the auctioneers. The owner having become bankrupt, held (diss. Lord Craighill) that the auctioneers were entitled to a lien over the horses in their stables for the general balance due to them on all their transactions with him.

ALFRED ARTHUR MILLER, accountant in Glasgow, as trustee on the 2^d Division. estates of George Neilleay, horse-dealer, Beith, in the county of Ayr, Ld. Craighill. which were sequestrated on 20th June 1879, raised an action in the Court of Session against Messrs Hutcheson & Dixon, auctioneers in Glasgow, concluding for payment of £42, 3s., being the price, under deduction of livery and other expenses, of two geldings which had belonged to the bankrupt, and which had been sold by the defenders at one of their auction sales on 22d June 1879. I.

The pursuer averred that these geldings were consigned to the defenders by the bankrupt within sixty days of his sequestration, he being then insolvent; and that, the defenders being in the knowledge of the fact, they were bound to pay over to the pursuer the price realised for them.

The defenders, in their answers, admitted that the geldings had been consigned to them on 22d May for the purpose of being sold, and that they kept them at livery in their stables until the date of sale. They further averred that "in May and June 1879, prior to Mr Neilleay's sequestration, the defenders had various dealings with Mr Neilleay in the ordinary course of their said business. They received from him various lots of horses from time to time, including the geldings libelled. Some of these they sold, and some they returned to Mr Neilleay. On the horses in their hands the defenders made several advances to Mr Neilleay, and he incurred accounts to them for livery, on the mutual understanding that the defenders should have the security of the horses at any time in their hands for the sums due to them from time to time. On the fore-said dealings there remained, at the date when the geldings libelled were sold, a balance in the defenders' favour on the season's transactions, all conform to an account thereof produced. As shewn in that account, the nett proceeds of the geldings was exceeded in amount by the fore-said balance on the various transactions."

On these statements and admissions the pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—
(1) The bankrupt, whose estate is vested in the pursuer as trustee, having consigned to the defenders for sale the geldings in question subsequent to the date of his sequestration, or at all events within sixty days of the same, and when he was insolvent, and the insolvency was known to the defenders, the defenders are bound to account for and pay to the pursuer the proceeds of the sale, less expenses incurred, being the sum sued for.
(2) The said two geldings being at the date of the sequestration the property of the bankrupt, and undisposed of by the defenders, the same belonged to his sequestrated estate, and the defenders are now bound to pay over to the pursuer, as trustee fore-said, the price realised therefor. (4)
In any event, the defenders are excluded from a preference upon the free proceeds of the sale of the geldings to the prejudice of the bankrupt's other creditors.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The defenders having in the ordinary course of their employment by the bankrupt in their business as keepers of livery stables and sellers of horses, received from him in bona fide the geldings libelled to be sold for the bankrupt, and kept at livery until sold, were entitled to a general lien over the said geldings for the balance due to the defenders by the bankrupt on the season's transactions. (4) The defenders having made advances and incurred livery accounts in respect of, inter alia, the geldings libelled, they are entitled to retain the same for repayment of said advances.

Proof was allowed in the action, and from the evidence it appeared that the defenders kept horses consigned to them at livery until they were sold, but that they did not in other respects carry on the trade of livery stable keepers, and that for many years the bankrupt had dealt with the defenders. From the evidence of one of the partners in the defender's firm it appeared that in their dealings with Neilleay they had been accustomed to make advances to him against horses consigned to them by him for sale, and that when he took away one horse and left another in its place the arrangement was that they were to retain possession of the horse left in their hands until the money they had advanced on the first horse was repaid to them. He also stated that at their stables no horse was allowed to go out of the stables without the consent of one of the firm. In proof of the course of dealing carried on between them and Neilleay the defenders produced, inter alia, two advance-notes by him in their favour. The first was in the following terms:—"19th May 1879.—Hutcheson & Dixon have this day advanced me the sum of £20. Horses and gig placed in their hands for positive sale." The second was dated 5th June 1879,—“Hutcheson & Dixon have this day paid me the sum of £20, advance on two horses to sell.” The horses referred to in the second advance-note were the two geldings specially referred to in this case.

On 8th December 1880 the Lord Ordinary (Lord Craighill) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary having heard parties' procurators on the closed record, productions, and proof, and having considered the debate and whole process—Finds, as matter of fact (1) that the horses, the price of which is sued for in the present action, were the property of Neilleay, the bankrupt, and were sold by the defenders at the price of £56, 5s. on the 22d July 1879, two days after the sequestration of his estates under 'The Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856;' (2) that these horses were placed in the stables connected with the business premises of the defenders on 22d May last, not for the purpose of positive sale, but that, in case they should not be sold by Neilleay himself, they should, upon instructions to this effect from him, be sold either by public roup or private bargain, by the defenders, who in the latter case were to receive commission upon the price, as well as the cost of the horses' keep, and in the former case were to receive only the cost of their keep; (3) that parties are agreed that the charges connected with the sale and the cost of keep from 22d May to 22d July 1879 amount to the sum of £24, 19s.; (4) that on the 5th June 1879, while said horses remained in the stables of the defenders, they advanced upon the security of these horses the sum of £20; (5) that it has not been proved that there was any course of dealing between the said bankrupt or the defenders, or that there is any general practice of trade entitling the defenders to bring against the price of said horses any general balance, or any other item of counter claim other than the said sum of £24, 19s. and the said sum of £20; and (6) that the said sums of £24, 19s. and £20, amounting together to £44, 19s., being deducted from £56, 5s., the price of the said horses, there remains a balance of £11, 6s. of the price of said horses still in the hands of the defenders : Finds as matter of law, the facts being, as above set forth (1) that the defenders are not entitled to retain from the price of said horses other sums than the said sum of £24, 19s. and £20 ; and (2) that the pursuer is entitled to recover from the defenders the said balance of £11, 6s., with interest at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the 23d July 1879 until payment, as concluded for in the summons, and decerns : Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, subject, however, to some modification ; allows an account of these expenses to be given in, and remits that account, when lodged, to the Auditor for his taxation and report.”

Miller v.
Hutchison &
Dixon.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—They were entitled to a lien over these horses for their general account, the relation between them and the bankrupt being that of commission-agents or factors and principal. They were not livery stablers, who only had a special lien.¹ The defenders traded on the footing that they were to have a general lien over the stock belonging to the bankrupt.

Argued for the pursuer ;—The defenders were not entitled to a preference over the other creditors. They were not factors, but simply livery stablers, and as such only had a special lien.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is only with hesitation that I differ from the Lord Ordinary in this case, but after the full and able argument which we have had on this matter, which is not without some commercial importance, the conclusion I have reached is at variance with that of his Lordship. The real question is, whether these stable keepers have a lien for a general balance due to them over the horses consigned to them for sale ? Over moveables, putting aside hypothec, no security can be constituted without possession. But possession there was here beyond question. Again, a security may be constituted with possession by contract over the goods of a person who is a party to the contract. Thirdly, lien is presumed in certain commercial relations without any express contract. In my apprehension the question for decision here is, whether these stable-keepers are within any of the categories known to law in which a lien can be constituted in their favour ? and I think that they are, because they are in the position of a factor selling the goods of a principal for him, and claiming a lien for a general balance, and a factor is entitled to retain goods coming in ordinary course of dealing into his hands until a general balance due to him be paid. If, then, the defenders here are ordinary commercial agents, there is no doubt. But it is said that they are only auctioneers, and also that at all events they are only livery stable keepers, and that in either case they are not general commercial agents, and therefore not entitled to any general lien. Now, as to the first point, I do not know what an auctioneer is if he be not a commercial agent. Goods are sent to him that he may turn them into money by public sale, and he may, if he chooses, advance money on the goods consigned to him. These defenders made advances on the horses consigned to them, sold the horses, and retained so much as would pay the balance due them, or when they had other horses in hand they said, “ We have a lien on these horses until the balance due us is discharged.” I do not see how they were in any different position from commercial agents in this sense. I do not see how this conclusion can be, as has been contended, any extension of the law of lien, and in my humble opinion these defenders are just in the position of factors having a general lien. So much, then, for the first ground.

But then, in the second place, it was said that the defenders are livery stable keepers, and that the public and the bankrupt Neilleay dealt with them as persons keeping horses for hire.

But I am satisfied that that is not a proper description of the calling which the defenders really follow. Mr Scott, a partner in the defenders' firm, says the stables are not livery stables, but simply saleyard stables, and there is no evidence that the defenders ever received any horses for any other purpose than that of sale. No doubt they allowed the bankrupt to take his horses out of the stables from time to time to be shewn to intending purchasers. Any man who sends goods to an auctioneer to be sold by him may still deal with any purchaser who is willing to buy them before the sale comes on. Here it is not disputed that when the horses were consigned they were consigned for sale and nothing else, and that according to the course of dealing followed by the parties, as the bankrupt explains it in his evidence, he was not entitled, without permission of the defenders, or some responsible person in their service, to take away horses belonging to him which were standing in their stables.

I am therefore of opinion that the defenders were commercial agents, and entitled to retain for a general balance horses consigned to them.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. This summons concludes for a decree against the defenders for £42. I confess I always see with some pain an action in this Court for a sum so small. The expenses on each side will doubtless be as great. In this case the Lord Ordinary by his judgment has reduced the sum claimed to £11, and the pursuer seems to be satisfied with his success to that extent, for he has not said a word against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. But it was explained that there is a large principle in this case, in which the defenders as auctioneers are much interested. I have endeavoured during the argument to point out that there is no question here of general interest, everybody being at liberty to make what contracts he pleases, and it is with reference to that point only that I propose to make any observations, for I concur with your Lordships as to the law to be applied to this particular case.

Lien is just a contract of pledge collateral to another contract of which it is an incident. If the principal contract be about a horse—that it is to be fed and kept by one man for another,—to that contract there is the incident called lien—that is, an agreement that the person to whom the possession of the horse is committed shall have right to retain the possession till his claim for the food and attention given to the horse shall be satisfied. That is a special lien, and it stands like general lien, on which I shall say a word presently, upon contract, express or implied. The law always, in the absence of evidence of an agreement to the contrary, assumes that the owner of the horse shall not reclaim possession till he has satisfied the claim of the other party for what he has done under the contract.

There is also general lien, which is this, that a factor possessing goods, having that possession as a lawful contract, may retain that possession until the general balance due to him by the owner of the goods is satisfied. Such a lien may in any case be constituted by contract. It stands on contract. That contract may be expressed, or it may be implied from the course of dealing of the parties, or from the usage of trade. Mr Smith spoke as if it were a dangerous thing to hold that such liens may be constituted by contract. But it is only the common law of freedom applying to all who are sui juris. If there be no fraud or force, or any such ground for setting aside what a free man has done, a contract to give a general lien will hold good. The law of general lien, which does not differ in England and Scotland to any material degree, is most accurately stated by Mr Bell (Com. ii., p. 87 of M'Laren's ed.),—"General retention or lien is a right to withhold or detain the property of another in respect of any debt which happens to be due by the proprietor to the person who has the custody, or for a general balance of accounting arising on a particular term of employment. These rights are either founded on express agreement, or are raised by implication of law, which again may be from the understood and accustomed construction of particular contracts and connections, or from the usage of trade, or from the course of dealing between the parties."

No. 93.

Feb. 16, 1881.
Miller v.
Hutcheson &
Dixon.

The late Mr Smith also (Mercantile Law, 561), after defining lien at common law, says,—“Whenever one of any other kind is sought to be established, the claim to it is not deduced from principles of common law, but founded on the agreement of parties, either expressed or to be inferred from usage, and will fail if some such contract be not shewn to have existed.” And, again, he says that the question whether a lien by express agreement has or has not been created “depends on the terms of each individual contract. Where the intention of the parties to create one is plain, there can be no doubt of their legal right to carry it into effect.” And again he says,—“As to liens resulting from usage, these depend on implied, as those last mentioned upon express, contract.”

I make these observations, because, for my part, I will not have this question about £11 magnified into a question of importance. People can contract as to liens as they please, and these stable keepers can refuse to take in horses except on such terms as they choose, and can, as shippers do, contract that there shall be a general lien over the goods entrusted to them for the balance owing to them at the time. The law of general lien for bygone freight stands on that.

In this case I am of opinion that the proof shews that while reasonable advances were to be made by the auctioneers the horses which might be in the stables were not to be removed by Neilleay without leave from the auctioneers. I therefore agree that there was a general lien, and concur in the judgment your Lordship has proposed.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I adhere to the findings, both in fact and in law, which I pronounced when the case was before me in the Outer-House, though it cannot be expected that I should do so without hesitation after hearing the views expressed by your Lordships. The facts of the case are—(his Lordship here narrated the facts above set forth). The defenders do not dispute that the horses were the property of the bankrupt, but they have claimed right of lien for (1) an advance of £20 made on the two horses referred to in this case, (2) for the keep of those horses, and (3) for a general balance due to them, which they said is secured by the possession of the horses. Only as to the last question has there been any controversy in the Inner-House.

It appears to me that, as was said by Mr Jameson at an early stage of the argument, this is a controversy more of fact than of law, and therefore while I am not to be held as adopting all the views of the law which your Lordships have expressed, I think we may not very greatly differ upon the legal questions

No. 93. involved. The defenders have maintained their right to a general lien on three grounds.

Feb. 16, 1881.
Miller v.
Hutcheson &
Dixon.

They have argued,—(1) That in reference to the transactions referred to in the case they were the factors of the bankrupt; that his goods came into their possession as factors, and that therefore they were entitled to factor's lien. (2) Their next ground was that of general usage of trade. (3) Lastly, they said the course of dealing between the parties was that there should be a right of retention of any horse or horses for the general balance which might be due at the time.

As to the first ground, I am still of opinion that the facts of the case do not warrant the view that the horses came into the defenders' possession, as factors, for sale. They have stables, and keep horses. They call themselves in one of their pleas not only auctioneers but livery stable keepers. If the horses were held by them in that capacity they are not factors. The second finding of this interlocutor is, that the horses were put into the defenders' stables to be kept there till it should be seen whether they should be sold by Neilleay, or whether Neilleay should give positive instructions that they be sold by the defenders. I think that is the result of the evidence. I know what Scott, the partner of the defenders' firm who was examined, and Neilleay, say on this matter, but the documents seem to me to shew that some horses were for positive and some for possible sale. That distinction appears on the face of these documents. The horses were sold by the defenders only if sales were not accomplished in the interim by Neilleay. On 22d May five horses, including those in question, were put into the defenders' stables. Three were sold by them, not by Neilleay, and two stood unsold for weeks. What does that signify? Weekly and bi-weekly sales come and go, and these horses are not sold, because Neilleay had not made up his mind to give instructions for their positive sale, and until he did so the horses were kept at livery. If that be so, we do not require to consider whether an auctioneer is a factor or not. For my part, I would not commit myself to the opinion that an auctioneer is in all circumstances a factor, any more than I would say that in no circumstances can an auctioneer be called a factor. I am not sorry that it is unnecessary to give a definite opinion on that point. It is enough, I think, to hold that the defenders did not receive or hold the goods for sale in the sense that they must sell them.

On the second point it was hardly even contended that the usage of trade gives any such general lien as is claimed, and so there only remains the question, third, Whether, by the course of dealing between those parties, there was conferred on the defenders a general right of retention?

Now, that which influences me in setting aside the account which Scott and Neilleay give of the course of dealing is that their depositions appear to me to be inconsistent with the documentary evidence in this case. That evidence, I think, discountenances the idea of such a course of dealing as is contended for. Sometimes a document recognises that a sum has been received by Neilleay on the security of a particular horse, and at another time it is not so at all. The fact of such special arrangements shews me that it could not be part of the contract of the parties that not only might an advance on a particular horse be matter of claim, but that any general balance should also be claimable. And so I think that the third ground of the defenders' contention is also untenable.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and assolizied the defenders.

M'Bey, &c.

Reparation—Damages—Road—Duty of driver to keep at a distance from carriage in front.—Two omnibuses were being driven along a narrow road at a moderate speed, and a number of children were running after the first omnibus. One of the children, a boy of six years of age, having fallen, the driver of the second omnibus was so near that he could not pull up his horses in time, and the wheel of his omnibus went over the boy and killed him. In an action of damages by the father of the boy, held that it was the duty of the driver of the second omnibus to keep a sufficient distance between his own omnibus and the one in front to allow him to draw up if one of the children fell, and having failed to do so, that the proprietor of the omnibus and the driver were liable in damages.

JOHN AULD, labourer, Newburgh, raised an action in the Sheriff Court ^{1st DIVISION.} of Aberdeen against Mr M'Bey, omnibus proprietor, and George Drum- ^{Sheriff of}mond, a driver in his employment, for damages on account of his son, who ^{Aberdeen-}was six years of age, having been run over and killed by the defender's ^{shire.} omnibus. C.

The circumstances, as disclosed in a proof, were :—Two omnibuses were in the habit of starting from Aberdeen for Newburgh daily at the same hour, the one belonging to the defender M'Bey, and the other to a man called Tough. On 26th September 1880 both omnibuses stopped at an inn on the road. Tough's omnibus started first to go along a narrow part of the road towards Newburgh. A number of children ran after it, and some got on the omnibus and climbed to the top; the others ran behind or got on to the step. M'Bey's omnibus, driven by Drummond, started, and was making up to the other 'bus, when the pursuer's son, who was one of the children who were running after the first omnibus, fell, and before Drummond could pull up his horses, the wheel of the 'bus passed over the boy, killing him on the spot. The witnesses differed as to the distance between the omnibuses at the time, some witnesses saying there were twenty yards and some only three. It was not proved that Drummond was driving at an excessive rate of speed.

The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) found that "the pursuer has failed to prove that the injury complained of was caused through the negligence of the defender's servant, and therefore assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action."

The Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on appeal, pronounced this interlocutor :—
"Recalls the said interlocutor: Finds it proved that on or about the 26th September 1878, on the public road at Bridgefoot, near Newburgh, the pursuer's son, Thomas Auld, aged six years, was run over and killed by a 'bus driven by the one defender and belonging to the other, through the fault of the defenders, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer; assesses the damage at £60, for which decerns."*

* "NOTE.— . . . The Sheriff is of opinion that there was contributory negligence on the part of the boy. Allowance must of course be made for children who are necessarily left to run about the streets of a village giving way to their natural instincts: but in hanging on to the 'bus they were certainly engaged in a practice which ought not to be permitted, and if anything had happened to them without the intervention of a third party, they would have had themselves to blame. The question is, were the defenders to blame? and, as regards

No. 94.

Auld v.
M'Boy, &c.

The defenders appealed, and argued;—The question of law was, whether the driver of the second omnibus was bound to keep at such a distance that if one of the boys fell off he could draw up in time. Such a duty would be very oppressive. The boy was doing wrong in going on the first omnibus, and exposed himself to risk. The driver should not be made responsible for the fault of the boy. The driver was not shewn to be in fault. He was driving at a moderate rate of speed.¹

The pursuer argued;—The defenders were bound to shew that no fault lay on the driver. They had failed to do so.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case, like every other of the same class, is attended with some difficulty, because of the variety in the evidence given, arising in a great measure from the points of view from which the different witnesses saw the occurrence, and from the accuracy of observation of some witnesses as compared with the inaccuracy of others. I have found that when the question is as to what happened on a particular occasion the best witnesses are boys and girls. Their eyes are generally open, and they are not thinking of other things, and they are not talking to their neighbours. Every one who has had experience in the criminal Courts must know that when the question is as to what occurred at a particular place and time the best evidence is often given by boys and girls. Now, I think that here the evidence of the boys is quite reliable, and amounts to this, that Thomas Auld was not on the omnibus, but was on the road running after it in order to get on it if he could. The question which that state of facts presents is this, What was the duty of the driver of the second omnibus in these circumstances? It is extremely vexatious and provoking for drivers of all kinds that children should get in their way. But I am afraid that it is part of the disposition of boys and girls to get in the way of carriages, and that is a fact in the natural history of young people which must be taken into account in dealing with the duty of drivers. Drivers must take account of this disposition as an incident inseparable from their occupation. The question is, whether this driver followed his duty in respect of these children, or whether he failed in his duty? Now, my opinion is that he failed in his duty. The result of the whole evidence is that he was too near the other omnibus. If he had been twenty or thirty yards further back this their responsibility, these are the rules as enunciated in the Court of last resort, which fall to be applied:—

"1. The plaintiff in an action for negligence cannot succeed if it is found by the jury that he himself has been guilty of any negligence or want of ordinary care, which contributed to cause the accident.

"2. But there is another proposition equally well established, and it is a qualification on the first, namely, that though the plaintiff may have been guilty of negligence, and although that negligence may in fact have contributed to the accident, yet if the defender could in the result, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the mischief which happened, the plaintiff's negligence will not excuse him—Radley v. L. and N.-W. Railway Co., House of Lords, Dec. 1, 1876, L. R. 1 App. Cases, 754."

accident would not or might not have happened. If it had happened, it would have happened in a different way. The boy is said to have stumbled over a stone, and fallen. However that may be, he did fall, and it was impossible for the driver to pull up the horses, even with the assistance of the passengers beside him, before the wheels passed over the boy. That proves that he was too near. I do not think that the accident would have happened unless he had been too near.

This is the simple view I take of the case, and I do not adopt the views of the Sheriff as to contributory negligence, for I do not think the case involves a question of contributory negligence at all.

Prescription—Deduction of years of minority—Verus dominus—Road—Right of way.—An estate was conveyed to a father in liferent for his liferent use only, and to the heirs of his body in fee. The father died during the minority of his two daughters, who succeeded as heirs-portioners. In an action raised at their instance to have it declared that a certain road which passed through the estate had not been used as a public road during the forty years necessary to found prescriptive use, held that in reckoning the years of prescription they were entitled to a deduction of that part of their minority which occurred subsequent to their father's death, and not of that part which preceded it, on the ground that prior to their father's death the pursuers had no vested right.

AN action of declarator was raised in the Court of Session by Miss Jessie Black, Heatheryknowe House, Lanarkshire, and Mrs Agnes Black or Scott, heritable proprietors of the lands of Heatheryknowe, situated in Old Monkland parish, county of Lanark, against Alexander Mason, farmer, heritable proprietor of the lands of Commonhead, to have it found and declared that there existed no public road for foot-passengers, carts, carriages, or cattle, leading from the parish road on the north of the farm-steading of Heatheryknowe, and thence eastwards to the parish road between Auchinloney and Cuilhill.

Issues were adjusted, and the evidence was led before a jury on 27th December 1880 and two following days.

The first issue, which was alone insisted in, was in these terms :—" 1. Mason.

The pursuers in the action were thus defenders in the issues, and the defender in the action pursuer in the issue.

In the evidence it was proved, inter alia, that the pursuer Miss Jessie Black was born on 19th May 1844, and that the pursuer Mrs Agnes Black or Scott was born on 13th August 1846; and that the said pursuers were the only children and the heirs of the body of Alexander Black, who died on 16th May 1856. It was also proved that Alexander Waddell of Stonefield, the pursuers' author in their said lands of Heatheryknowe, who died in 1830, by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to dispose his whole lands and heritable estate in the parish of Old Monkland (being the said lands of Heatheryknowe and others) to the said Alexander Black, father of the pursuers, in liferent, for his liferent use only, and to the heirs of the body of the said Alexander Black in fee; whom failing, to Gavin Black, &c. The trustees of the said Alexander Waddell, after being infest, in accordance with the directions contained in the said settlement, disposed the said lands of Heatheryknowe and others to the said Alexander Black in liferent, for his liferent use only, and to the heirs of the body of the said Alexander Black in fee; whom failing, to the said Gavin Black, &c. The said Alexander Black was, under the precept of sasine contained in the said disposition, infest in the said lands, in liferent, for his liferent use only, by instrument of sasine in his favour dated 23d June, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines 9th July 1832. On the death of their father, the said Alexander Black, the pursuers made up their title to the said lands, by general service dated 7th October 1856, and instrument of sasine following upon the open precept of sasine in the said disposition of 1832 in favour of the pursuers, as the fiars in the said lands and others, recorded in the New General Register of Sasines 20th October 1856.

In his charge to the jury the presiding Judge (Lord Lee) directed the jury that the minority of the pursuers (defenders in the issues) could not be deducted in considering the issue, save in so far as it was subsequent to the death of their father in 1856. Whereupon the counsel for the pursuers (defenders in the issues) excepted to the direction, and moved his Lordship in lieu thereof to direct the jury as follows:—"That the period of the minority of Miss Jessie Black from 19th May 1844 to 19th May 1865 is not to be counted in reckoning the forty years' prescription required under the issues. Further, that the period of the minority of Mrs Agnes Black or Scott from 13th August 1846 to 13th August 1867 is not to be counted in reckoning the forty years' prescription required under the issues." This direction his Lordship refused to give, and the pursuers' counsel thereupon lodged the present bill of exceptions.

The jury having retired, delivered the following verdict:—"At Edinburgh, the 27th, 28th, and 29th days of December 1880, before the Honourable Lord Lee—Compeared the said pursuers and defender by their respective counsel and agents; and a jury having been empanelled and sworn to try the issues between the parties, say upon their oath, in respect of the matters proved before them on the first issue, they, by a majority, find for the defender that for forty years and upwards prior to 16th October 1880, whether there be discounted the whole period of the pursuers' or either of their minority, or only that subsequent to the death of their father on 16th May 1856, there has existed a public road for foot-passengers, carts, carriages, and cattle leading in, or nearly in, the direction of the red line on the plan No. 7 of process from the parish road on the north of the farm-steading of Heatheryknowe, in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark, and thence eastwards to the parish road between Auchinloney and Cuilhill."

When the case came before the First Division the Court, after hearing counsel for the pursuers on a motion for a new trial in respect the verdict was against the evidence, granted a rule. Counsel were then heard on the rule and on the bill of exceptions together.

Mason.

Argued for pursuers (defenders in the issues) on the bill of exceptions;—In considering the issue the whole minority of the pursuers, whether prior or subsequent to the death of their father, fell to be omitted in reckoning the years of prescription. The pursuers were during the whole of that period the real proprietors of the lands, their father holding them in liferent only; but the title was in the trustees, and therefore the pursuers could plead a suspension of prescription.¹

Argued for defender (pursuer in the issues);—The only period of minority that could fairly be taken into account was that from the death of the pursuers' father till the minority ceased. Before his death the position of the pursuers was not one of verus dominus, as, if either of them had predeceased him, or if a son had been born, they would have had no interest in the property.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuers of this action are Miss Jessie Black, and her sister Mrs Agnes Black or Scott, who are joint proprietors of the estate of Heatheryknowe and others. The object of the action is to put down a claim of right of way through their estate advanced by the defender, Mr Mason, and these ladies stand, of course, as defenders in the issue sent to the jury for the trial of the question. The issue is in the ordinary form—"Whether for forty years prior to 16th October 1880, or for time immemorial, there existed a public road for foot-passengers, carts, carriages, and cattle, or any and which of said purposes, leading in, or nearly in, the direction of the red line on the plan, from the parish road on the north of the farm-steading of Heatheryknowe, in the parish of Old Monkland and county of Lanark, and thence eastwards to the parish road between Auchinloney and Cuilhill?" The first question which arises for consideration in this action is this, To what period is it necessary for the pursuer in the issue (the defender in the action) to go back in proving the existence of this right of way? It appears that Miss Jessie Black was born in 1844, and consequently she came of age in 1865. Mrs Agnes Black or Scott, again, was born in 1846, and she came of age in 1867. These ladies contended that the whole period of their minority must be deducted from the years of prescription, or, in other words, that the pursuer must go back in his proof, not for forty years only, but for forty years plus the whole period of their minority. On the other hand, it is contended that if the minority is to be deducted the deduction must be confined to the period since the death of the father of the ladies, Mr Alexander Black. The way in which this question arises depends upon the effect of the deed of settlement under which these ladies inherit this estate. The deed was made by Mr Waddell of Stonefield in 1830. He conveyed the estate to trustees, and he directed them to convey it to Alexander Black, father of the pursuers, and the nephew of the testator, "in liferent for his liferent use only, and to the heirs of the body of the said Alexander Black

No. 95. in fee." Now, it is contended by the pursuers that as soon as they came into existence they became fiars of the estate, and consequently were in the position contemplated by the statute of prescription, and also by the common law of prescription in regard to the matter, and consequently that the whole period of their minority must be deducted. But it appears to me that this proceeds on an erroneous construction of the deed of settlement. The two ladies during their father's lifetime could not possibly be fiars of the estate, whether as directly interested in the estate or as holding the fee qua beneficiaries under the trust, because during their father's lifetime it was impossible to tell who would be entitled to succeed as the "heirs of his body," or as heirs of his body. No man can have an heir until he is dead, and it can never be ascertained who is to be a man's heir until he dies. That obvious rule was given effect to lately by the Court in the case of Ferguson, March 19, 1875, 2 R. 627. Therefore these ladies had no vested interest in this estate until their father's death.

Now, it is quite settled, I think, that the party whose minority is to be deducted in a question of prescription must be the verus dominus of the estate, not necessarily feudally vested, but holding the fee of the estate either directly or as a beneficiary under a trust. But these ladies had no vested interest at all. It was not at all certain that they or either of them would succeed to the estate, and it never could be certain until the death of their father. I am therefore of opinion that the direction which the learned Judge gave at the trial to the jury as to this matter was sound, and that the period of minority which falls to be deducted must begin only upon the death of Alexander Black, the father. The consequence of that is that the pursuer in the issues must go back in his evidence, not for forty years only, but for eleven years more—that is to say, he must go back to 1829—and shew that from that period the road now in question had been possessed by the public. If it had been necessary for him to go back for the longer period of sixty-three years—that is, back to a period anterior to 1820—the case would have presented certainly a very different aspect, and I do not propose to give any opinion as to what view I would then have taken of the evidence. But looking at the evidence, beginning at 1829 and downwards, I am not able to come to the conclusion that there is no evidence to go to the jury in favour of the claim of the pursuer in the issue. The case is undoubtedly a very narrow one, and if I had been on the jury I should have been in favour of giving a verdict for the defender in the issue. But I do not feel that I am at liberty to set aside the verdict, there being evidence both on the one side and the other.

I am therefore for disallowing the bill of exceptions, and discharging the rule.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD LEE.—Of the two issues laid before the jury the defender ultimately gave up the claim of servitude, and elected to stand upon the allegation of a public right.

Against this allegation evidence was adduced to shew that the road in question was made by the proprietor of the lands through which it runs after the two properties came into the same hands, about the years 1819–20; and it was contended that any use which had been taken of the road was either ascribable to tolerance or was interrupted. It was further contended that the pursuers (defenders in the issue), being one or other of them in minority from the birth of the elder in 1844 (19th May) to the date when the younger attained the age of twenty-one (13th August 1867), it was incumbent on the defender to prove public use for forty years irrespective of that period, i.e., to shew use of the road as a public road from 16th October 1817. Being of opinion that the minority of the pursuers ought not to be deducted save in so far as it was subsequent to the date when the succession opened to them by the death of their father in 1856, I so directed the jury. But, at the same time, I asked them, if they should find the issue established in that view, to answer it also on the assumption that the whole minority ought to be discounted, so that in the event of my direction being found erroneous, and of a different verdict being returnable upon a deduction of the whole period, the Court might have the means of applying the verdict according to the legal rights of parties.

Black v.
Mason.

The jury by their verdict have affirmed the existence of the road as a public road, in either view, for the forty years. But, if my direction was right, it was only necessary, in disposing of the rule, to consider whether the verdict is contrary to evidence with reference to the period from 16th May 1828 to 16th October 1880.

Had it been necessary for the defender to prove the existence of the road from 16th October 1817, I should have thought it very difficult to support the verdict, for, in my opinion, the pursuers have shewn weighty grounds for holding that they have established the history of the road. . . .

I think that it ought to be determined first of all what is the period to which the issue properly applies. And upon that point I remain of opinion that the forty years ought to be counted without deduction of the period during which the pursuers' father held the estate as proprietor in liferent. During that period I think that the pursuers had no right to the estate. Until their father's death it could not be known who would succeed as heir of his body. The pursuers, had they been of full age, could not have granted the right of road; nor could they, in my opinion, have prevented the acquisition of a prescriptive right. If adverse possession upon an infetment had been pleadable, I do not see how, upon the authorities, they would have excluded the operation of the statute 1617 by deducting their minority while not in right of the estate. The cases of prescription running against substitute heirs of entail upon whom the right of succession has not devolved—such as Gordon v. Gordon, M. 10,968, and 3 Ross' L. C. 471—appear to me to be against such a claim. In the present case the prescription is not upon an infetment, but upon the exercise of a public right. And I am of opinion that the private interests of the estate, as against the public, were fully represented by the pursuers' father. He was infet as liferent proprietor. The case of Hardie v. The Magistrates of Port-Glasgow, 2 Macph. 746, was founded on as shewing that the father had no title to resist encroachment. But the title in that case was not that of a proprietor in liferent. It was a mere personal right of occupancy, and was rejected on that ground, and not on the general ground that a liferent proprietor has no title to defend the estate against encroachments by the public. And with regard to the cases of prescription where the estate is held in trust, I think that it is only where the trust is for behoof of a particular person that the prescription is interrupted by the minority of the person for whose behoof the trust exists. This was the ground of decision in the case of Baillie v. Menzies, 1756, 5 Brown's Suppt. 847, and I am not aware that it has ever been gone back upon. . . .

(After dealing with the evidence his Lordship concluded)—On the whole,

therefore, while I cannot help thinking that the present claim is not so much in vindication of the public right as in pursuance of a private dispute, I am of opinion that the question was fairly before the jury, and that while the evidence would have supported, perhaps more satisfactorily to my mind, a different verdict, there is no sufficient ground for setting aside the verdict as contrary to evidence.

LORD DEAS was absent.

Lucas' Trustees v. The Trustees and Patrons of "The Lucas Trust."

Succession—Payment, acceleration of—Widow's repudiation of settlement.—

A testator directed his trustees, in the event of his leaving no issue, to pay to his widow a free yearly annuity of £200, and give her the liferent use of a house, "and whatever further interest and annual income my said estates shall yield . . . shall be accumulated during the lifetime of my said wife by my said trustees, and form part of my estates." The estate yielded a clear return of more than £300 a-year, after paying the widow's annuity, which, in the event, which happened, of the truster leaving no issue, was the only provision to be paid or provided for during her life. On her death the trustees were to pay to the children of J M "surviving at said period the sum of £100 each," and an annuity of £100 a-year to the brother of the truster's widow, "provided he return to this country and reside here, and provided my said trustees consider that he requires the same." The residue was to form a fund to be vested in certain persons ex officio for the establishment of a charitable foundation, to be styled after the truster "The Lucas Trust."

Held, on the widow's repudiation of the settlement, that the trustees and patrons of "The Lucas Trust" were entitled to an immediate conveyance of the residue, subject to existing and contingent interests.

2D DIVISION.
M.

JOHN LUCAS, farmer, Corntown, Bridge of Allan, died on 4th April 1878, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed his whole estate, which consisted of heritable property to the estimated value of about £6000, and moveable estate to the value of about £8000, to James M'Laren and others, as trustees, for the purposes therein mentioned.

By the fifth and sixth purposes the truster provided that in the event of his leaving children his widow was to have a liferent of the whole free residue of his estate, under burden of the obligation of maintaining the children.

The ninth purpose was:—"On the death of my said wife, if she survive me, or at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas happening six months after my decease, if I be the survivor, I direct my said trustees to pay to the children of the said James M'Laren, surviving at said period, the sum of £100 each."

By the tenth purpose the truster directed the residue of his estate, "after paying and satisfying the purposes and provisions hereinbefore contained," to be divided among his children.

The eleventh purpose was:—"Failing children being procreated of my body, or surviving me, then I direct my said trustees, on my decease, should my said wife survive me, in place of the provisions conceived in her favour by the fifth trust-purpose foresaid, to pay and allow her a free yearly annuity of £200 sterling during all the days of her life: . . . No. 96.

 And also to dispose, assign, and convey to my said wife in liferent, for her liferent use only, all and whole Napier House, Bridge of Allan, and pertinents, as particularly described in the title-deeds thereof: . . . Feb. 18, 1881.
 And whatever further interest and annual income my said estates shall yield, after paying and satisfying the foresaid provisions and expense of the trust, shall be accumulated, during the lifetime of my said wife, by my said trustees, and form part of my estates." Lucas' Trustees v. The Trustees and Patrons of "The Lucas Trust."

The twelfth purpose was:—"Failing children as aforesaid, and on the death of my said wife, I direct my said trustees to pay to my wife's brother, Robert Donaldson, presently residing in New Zealand, or elsewhere abroad, provided he return to this country and reside here, and also provided my said trustees consider that he requires the same, and of which they shall be the sole judges, a free yearly annuity of £100 sterling during all the days of his life."

By the thirteenth purpose the truster, "failing children as aforesaid, or, if born, failing their surviving my said wife without issue, on the death of my said wife, if she survive me, or at the period of two years after my decease, if I be the survivor," directed his trustees, "after paying and providing for the other purposes of this trust, to pay, assign, and dispose" the residue of his estate to certain persons, as trustees ex officio, for the establishment of a fund for charitable purposes connected with Bridge of Allan and the neighbouring parishes, to be called "The Lucas Trust."

Mrs Janet Donaldson or Lucas, the truster's widow, repudiated the provisions in her favour under her husband's settlement, and claimed her terce and jus relictæ.

In consequence of the failure of issue, and the repudiation of the settlement by the widow, the purposes of the trust, with the exception of the legacies and annuity directed to be paid on the widow's death, by the ninth and twelfth purposes, and the foundation of "The Lucas Trust" by the thirteenth, became inoperative.

In these circumstances, the trustees and patrons of "The Lucas Trust" demanded from Mr Lucas' trustees an immediate conveyance of the estate, subject to the burden of the widow's terce, and of the burden of paying and providing for the legacies and annuity under the ninth and twelfth purposes when they became due. This was resisted by Mr Lucas' trustees, and a special case was presented to the Court on the following questions:—" (1) Are the first parties (Mr Lucas' trustees) bound to retain the said residue and accumulate the balance of income accruing thereon until the death of the said Mrs Lucas? or (2) are the second parties (the trustees and patrons of 'The Lucas Trust'), subject to the said existing and contingent interests, entitled to an immediate conveyance of the said residue?" The second parties maintained that the only object of the truster in postponing the conveyance to them was to secure the widow's interest. The annuity to Robert Donaldson was postponed till the widow's death, but when that occurred the subsistence of the annuity was not to prevent a conveyance to them for the purposes of the charitable foundation. The conveyance was necessarily to be subject to that annuity. And there was no reason why it should not be made now, subject to the contingent burden of that annuity. The same might be said of the legacies to M'Laren's children. There was no reason why the conveyance to them should not be subject to the contingent burden of their legacies also. But there was another consideration—the widow's repudiation was held in questions of this kind as equivalent to her natural death, and it was open to the parties in right thereof to claim immediate payment, both of the legacies and annuity above referred to. In these circumstances matters were in pari casu as if Mrs Lucas were now dead, and they were therefore entitled to an immediate conveyance, that the truster's charitable object might be carried out without delay.¹

Mr Lucas' testamentary trustees maintained that they were bound to hold and accumulate the residue till the widow's death. The case was not parallel to those relied upon by the second parties. In those cases it could reasonably be inferred that postponement of the ulterior purposes was solely for the purpose of providing for the widow's security. But here the widow had, in the circumstances which had emerged, only an annuity of £200 a-year out of an estate which might be calculated to yield over £500 a-year, and the balance was directed to be accumulated during the widow's lifetime, and the accumulation to form part of the residue which was to form the fund for the foundation of "The Lucas Trust." The truster had directed such accumulation, and to make immediate payment would be to defeat, not to carry out, his intention. Moreover, accumulation would specially further his purpose in the circumstances which had occurred by helping to replace the capital lost to "The Lucas Trust" by the widow claiming her legal rights. As to the contingent annuity to Robert Donaldson, it could easily have been paid had the testator intended it during the widow's life, as well as the widow's annuity, without materially affecting the security of the latter. So could the legacies to M'Laren's children. But they were all postponed till the widow's death, because accumulation of the balance was preferred. To sustain the contention of "the Lucas trustees" would be to go against the plain intention of the truster, and hold that he had no meaning when he directed accumulation. As a farther argument against the view presented by them, the terms of the bequest to M'Laren's children must be considered. The trustees were directed to pay £100 each to such of his children as might be surviving at the date of the widow's death. Yet it was proposed to pay to those alive now, though some of them might die and others be born before that event.²

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find, in answer to the first question, that the first parties are not bound to retain the residue of the trust-estate and accumulate the balance of income accruing thereon until the death of Mrs Lucas, and, in answer to the second question, that the second parties are entitled to an immediate conveyance of the said residue, subject to existing and contingent interests, and subject to the provisions with reference to the annuity bequeathed to Robert Donaldson, that the first parties shall give intimation to the second parties if, in their opinion, the conditions under which the annuity is by the trust-deed bestowed on him have not been fulfilled."

Gillies v. Gillies' Trustees.

Succession—Approbate and Reprobate—Causa improvisa—Clause of forfeiture—Repudiation by liferenter to exclusion of own issue.—A truster directed the residue of his estate to be held and retained by his trustees, who were to pay therefrom annual allowances to his children during their lives, and after their death to pay the capital, and any accumulations, to the lawful issue of his children, and, failing lawful issue of any of his children, then to the lawful issue of the survivors or survivor, equally among them per stirpes. He farther declared that any child repudiating the above provisions should forfeit for him or herself, and his or her issue, all right and interest under the settlement; and that the provisions made for the child or children so repudiating, and their issue, should pass to and be held for the child or children abiding by the settlement, and their issue.

The truster's only surviving child who attained majority, a daughter, while still unmarried, repudiated the settlement. Held (1) that, having done so, she was not entitled to found on the declaration as to the forfeiture of the right and interest of her possible issue, to the effect of throwing the dead's part into intestacy, and herself taking as heir ab intestato; and (2) that as the clause of forfeiture was in favour of children who did not repudiate, and their issue, and as no such persons existed, the clause did not take effect, and that the residue must be retained by the trustees for behoof of any issue that might be born to the daughter.

disposition and settlement, dated 26th January of the same year, by which he conveyed his estate to James Reid and others as trustees. M.

After bequeathing an annuity to his widow, Mrs Sarah Gillespie or Gillies, and certain pecuniary legacies, the truster, in the fourth place, directed and appointed his trustees to hold and retain the whole residue and remainder of his means and estate, "as in reference to my only son, Thomas James Gillies, and my only daughter, Mary Margaret Gillies, and any other children I may hereafter have, in equal shares, in manner after-mentioned," and proceeded, "and I direct and appoint my said trustees to hold, pay, and apply such a sum as they may think proper, not exceeding during the lifetime of my said wife the sum of £160 yearly, and after the death of my said wife such a sum as they shall think proper, not exceeding the sum of £260 sterling yearly, out of the income or annual produce from the shares of said residue so held as in reference to my said children respectively, for the support, maintenance, upbringing, and subsistence of my said children respectively during their lives, and that at such times and in such way and manner as my said trustees may think fit; and after the death of my said children respectively I direct and appoint my said trustees to hold and retain the income or annual produce of the respective shares or portions of said residue so set apart or held as in reference to my children respectively, together with such accumulations, if any, as may have arisen thereon, and to pay and apply the said income or annual produce to and for behoof of the lawful issue of my said children respectively, equally among them per stirpes; and failing lawful issue of any of my said children, to and for behoof of the lawful issue of the survivors or survivor until the said issue shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, when the capital or fee of their respective shares shall be paid and conveyed to the said lawful issue of my said children respectively, and of the survivors or survivor of them as aforesaid, equally amongst them per stirpes."

These provisions to the truster's widow and children were declared to be in full of their legal rights.

Gillies v.
Gillies' Trustees.

Toward the end of the deed there was added this declaration:—"And I declare that if any of my said children shall repudiate the provisions hereby made for and left to them, the child or children so repudiating the same, and the issue of such child or children, shall forfeit and lose all right and interest whatever under these presents, and in the estates hereby conveyed; and the said provisions hereby made for and left to the said child or children so repudiating, and his, her, or their issue, shall pass entirely to, and be held exclusively for, my other child or children abiding by or not repudiating these presents, and their issue, in the same manner and to the same effect as if the said provisions also had been made for and left to the said child or children abiding by or not repudiating these presents, and their issue alone."

The truster was survived by his widow, and by the two children mentioned in the deed, both of whom were in minority. The son, Thomas James Gillies, died a month after his father, without attaining majority. The daughter, Mary Margaret Gillies, attained majority in 1880.

There having been no antenuptial marriage-contract between Mr and Mrs Gillies, Mrs Gillies and Miss Mary Margaret Gillies (on her majority) repudiated the settlement, and betook themselves to their legal rights. Owing to the peculiar nature of the settlement questions arose between Mrs and Miss Gillies and the trustees as to the rights of the former, and a special case was submitted to the Court on the following questions:—" (1) Are the parties of the first part (Mrs and Miss Gillies) entitled to have now paid over to them the whole remaining residue of the estate of the deceased Robertson Gillies? (2) Are the parties of the second part (the trustees) entitled or bound to retain the whole or any part of the residue of the said estate for behoof of any issue that may be born to the said Mary Margaret Gillies? and, if a part, what part?"

Mrs and Miss Gillies having agreed between themselves in what proportion they should divide the estate, which was entirely moveable, claimed the whole residue, on these grounds:—That Mrs Gillies was entitled, in virtue of her jus relictæ, to one-third of the estate. That Miss Gillies was entitled, as legitim, to one-half of one-third. That Thomas James Gillies having died in minority, and without adopting the settlement, Mrs and Miss Gillies, as his representatives, were entitled to repudiate it, and to claim legitim on his behalf,¹ and were therefore entitled between them to another one-half of one-third. That as to the remaining one-third or dead's part, so far as not disposed of by the pecuniary legacies above-mentioned, there was resulting intestacy, in respect that whereas, by the fourth purpose of the trust-deed, in the circumstances which had emerged, the capital was to be held by the trustees for the issue of Miss Gillies, as the survivor of the truster's children, yet by the declaration at the end of the deed Miss Gillies' repudiation of the provisions in her favour forfeited all interest, not only of herself, but of her issue, under the settlement, and, therefore, left the residue, after paying the legacies, undisposed of; and that this undisposed-of residue of the dead's part fell to Miss Gillies in her own right, and to Mrs and Miss Gillies as in right of Thomas James Gillies, as heirs ab intestato at the truster's death.

The trustees maintained that though they might be bound to pay over to Mrs and Miss Gillies two-thirds of the estate they were bound to retain the residue of the remaining third for behoof of the issue of Miss Gillies, should she have any, in respect (1) that she could not repudiate the deed and at the same time found upon a particular provision of it to enforce a forfeiture for her own benefit, without at once reprobating and approbat-

Gillies v.
Gillies' Trustees.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The difficulty, which on the face of this deed seems formidable enough, is, I think, merely an apparent difficulty. Construing the instructions by the testator to his trustees as a whole, the result at which I have arrived is that the contention for the daughter is not sound.

Taken shortly, the case is this: The widow and daughter, who is the only surviving child, having for themselves, and as representing the deceased son, claimed their legal rights, the testator's settlement affects only the dead's part or one-third of his estate. The trustees have certain duties imposed on them by the trust-deed under which they hold the dead's part, and the question is how they are to dispose of that portion of the estate. They find that there are no beneficiaries in existence at present. The mother and daughter have repudiated the settlement for themselves and the deceased son. The provisions in their favour are therefore as if they had never been written. There is only one other class of possible beneficiaries, viz., the future and possible, but, as yet, non-existent issue of the daughter. There is no other possible interest for which the trustees can hold. The daughter herself is out of the deed altogether. She stands as if she had never been written into the deed. But then the daughter, who is thus written out of the deed by her own act, comes forward and says—"If you look at the deed you will find that my issue never can have any right. My repudiation of the deed has forfeited their eventual right. That forfeiture throws the fund into intestacy, and I, and my deceased brother, whom I represent, take as heirs ab intestato."

But it is clear to my mind that the daughter is not entitled to open her lips on the subject of the deed and its provisions. She can make no claim under that deed, and she can found no claim upon any application of the provisions of the deed to the circumstances which have emerged. That, I think, is a sufficient answer to her claim. I decline to consider what, with reference to the provisions of the deed, is the result of the daughter's repudiation. If she could say that there was no beneficiary at all, either existing or possible under the deed, her claim might be good. But that is quite a different thing from claiming under this clause of forfeiture.

But even if the clause of forfeiture were to be looked at, what is its effect? If you read the words of forfeiture alone, it is true that the repudiation of the child would appear to forfeit the interest of his or her issue. But, then, look at the object of the forfeiture as disclosed in the words which follow and dispose of the forfeited provisions. The forfeiture is to benefit the children and their issue who do not repudiate. Therefore, if there is no one to be benefited by the forfeiture, I hold that circumstances have not emerged and cannot emerge which would lead to such forfeiture. On this point the case of Wilson v. Gibson, 2 D. 1236, is a most apposite authority. I think the circumstances which have emerged are outwith the plain and obvious object of the clause of forfeiture,

No. 97. and my opinion is that it has become inoperative. There is no legitimate interest under the deed in favour of which it is to operate or which it is to protect. I am therefore of opinion that the trustees must continue to hold the dead's part for the possible issue of the daughter, in terms of the fourth purpose of the settlement.

Gillies' Trustees.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The will before us is perhaps as irrational and improvident a settlement as was ever executed, and I can only account for its terms by supposing that the testator had some eccentric views of his own to which he insisted upon effect being given. On the question with which we are more immediately concerned the case really comes to a short and clear point.

There are only three classes of beneficiaries under the will—the widow, the children, and the possible grandchildren. The first two have put themselves out of the will by repudiating the settlement. The widow and daughter certainly have, and I agree that the son, having died in nonage, and therefore without having adopted the settlement, his mother and sister, as in his right, are now entitled to repudiate for him and claim his legal right. The two first classes of beneficiaries are therefore out of the case. They can take nothing under the will. They take between them two-thirds of the estate under their legal rights, and the third set of beneficiaries alone remain to take under the will. Whatever the will carries must be held by the trustees for their behoof. They are to have the income during minority, and to receive their shares of capital on majority. There is nothing to interfere with this disposition of the dead's part except it be the clause of forfeiture, and the only question is whether the daughter repudiating the will is entitled to found upon the clause of forfeiture to the exclusion of her own issue. I think not. The provision in favour of the grandchildren is undoubtedly efficacious but for the clause of forfeiture. And I do not think that circumstances have emerged which bring the clause of forfeiture into operation. The circumstances which have occurred are a casus improvisus. And if the provision is good and effectual except with reference to a clause of forfeiture, which has no reference to the circumstances, then the provision is good and effectual in the circumstances which have emerged.

I am, indeed, of opinion that the daughter is not entitled to plead her own repudiation of the will for her own benefit and the disappointment of her issue. But I am of opinion also that the meaning and purpose of the clause of forfeiture was to give what a repudiating child forfeits for itself and its issue to another child who does not repudiate and its issue, and that if there is no child or issue in right of a child not repudiating who can take benefit by the forfeiture then the forfeiture does not come into operation. It was not intended to produce intestacy. The provision in favour of the grandchildren must therefore have effect in the circumstances which have occurred. The clause of forfeiture is not pleadable by the daughter, and even if it were it would not have the application for which she contends.

I am therefore for answering the second question in the affirmative, so far as regards the dead's part. But I would add that circumstances may emerge hereafter to which our judgment must not be held to apply. In the event of this lady not having issue within the statutory period from her father's death in 1871, then the Thellusson Act will come in and stop farther accumulations, and the subsequently accruing income will fall into intestacy.

This was an action by (1) the trustees of Captain Andrew Gildart Reid; and (2) the trustees of John Ross Duncan, proprietor each of a pro indiviso half of the estate of Shandwick, against the Duchess of Sutherland and Countess of Cromartie, and the Duke of Sutherland, K.G., as her administrator-in-law, for repayment and relief of the stipend localled upon these lands for the years 1876, 1877, 1878, and 1879, being in all the sum of £155, 8s. 4d.

Various augmentations had been imposed subsequently to the date of the disposition, and previously to 1877 (being crop and year 1876) the defender and her predecessors had relieved the proprietors of Shandwick from payment of stipend, but in that year she claimed to be allowed to redeem the obligation in terms of the clause above quoted, and tendered a sum equal to the annual value of victual, calculated at the rate of £1200 Scots per chalder. The pursuers refused the offer, and this action was brought.

The pursuers pleaded;—1. The defender, as the representative and successor of the late Sir George Mackenzie, Earl of Cromartie, being bound to implement the obligation in the disposition of the three-quarter lands of Drumgillie to relieve the said lands of the stipend localled thereon, the pursuers are entitled to decree for the amount thereof which has been paid by them. 2. The defender, on a sound construction of the said disposition, not being entitled to redeem the said obligation, et separatim, not being entitled to redeem on the terms proposed by her, the tender alleged is no bar to the pursuers' claim, and they are entitled to decree. LORD PRESIDENT.—I entirely agree with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and I do not think that the disposition on which the question turns will bear any other construction than that which his Lordship has given to it.

The lands disposed were conveyed "together with the teinds sheaves and parsonage teyndes of the saids three-quarter lands, crofts, and pertinents thereof included, with the stock, and not to be separate therfrae in all time coming;" the meaning and effect of this clause of course being, not that Sir George Mackenzie could give a right to the teinds cum decimis inclusis, or anything equivalent to that, but only to show that the lands and teinds were given out to the vassal together, and that the duty was a cumulo duty for the lands and teinds. Now, undoubtedly it was the intention of parties that the superior should relieve the vassal not only of all past burdens, but as regards certain other burdens in all time coming. This is very clearly expressed in the disposition. The superior is to relieve the vassal "yearly and tearmly in all time coming of all teynd duty, minister's stipends, and annuity of teyndes, allenarly." With regard to these and the burdens preceding the term of entry, the superior is taken bound "to make the acquitances and discharges thereof furthcoming to them at all occasions necessar when necessarlie they shall have to do therwith, wherein if the sd. Sir George Mackenzie and his forsds. faillzie, and that the said Andrew Ross and his forsds. be distressed for and forced to pay any of the sds. dutys throw the want of the saids discharges, then and in that case he binds and obliges him to reimburse the said Andrew, his said spouse, their sd. son, and his forsds. therein, cum omni damna."

Now, nothing can be clearer and more complete than the obligation thus undertaken by the superior. That it is an unfair arrangement is nothing to the point. Indeed, I may say that it is one of the most foolish undertakings that a man can enter upon, because by it he binds himself and his successors to make indefinite payments, the amount of which he cannot foresee. But such undertakings have been given effect to in previous cases, and I see no reason for denying effect to such an obligation as the present. Nor do I understand that the Duchess of Sutherland disputes this. But she says that though the burden has been laid upon her effectually, and has been discharged by her and her predecessors ever since the execution of the disposition, she has the power of redeeming it under a subsequent clause of the disposition upon payment of a certain sum. If that is so, then this is a right which she is now entitled to exercise, although during the intervening period she has not taken advantage of it. I do not think that the circumstance that she continued to pay burdens under the clause of relief would deprive her of the right or power of redemption if it has been conferred. It is res meræ facultatis. No prescription takes it away. It is in the power of parties to exercise it quandocunque. The sole question therefore is, whether there is such a power of redemption in the present case?

* "NOTE.— . . . The defender admits the validity and subsistence of the obligation, but maintains that by its terms she is entitled to redeem the obligation by paying the pursuers at the rate of £1200 Scots for each chaldar evicted or burdened with stipend. The defender maintains that the option of redemption is vested in her. The pursuers maintain that the obligation of relief is twofold—(1) A general obligation to relieve the purchaser of all stipend; (2) an obligation, in the event of and immediately after eviction of teinds or land or imposition of stipend, to repay a corresponding portion of the price at the rate specified in the clause of relief. It appears to me that according to the sound construction of the deed, the option lay with the purchaser and his successors, and not with the seller. The deed has been so interpreted by all concerned ever since the teinds began to be burdened with augmentation in 1720,—although during the greater part of that time it would have been greatly to the advantage of the defender and her predecessors to have asserted and vindicated their alleged option. On the whole, I have little difficulty in adopting the pursuers' construction of the deed."

It is to be found, if anywhere, in that clause of the disposition which begins with the words "And in effect that the teynd sheaves and the parsonage teynds of the sds. three-quarters land, with the pertinents, were disposed, alswell as the stock, to the sd. Andrew and his forsd., to make up to them the rent of fourty-two bolls victuall, and that by and attour the forsd. yearly feu-duty sua payable to his Majesty and the sd. Sir George Mackenzie in manner above expresst, and that the sum of £1200 Scots money was payd be the said Andrew to the said Sir George Mackenzie alswell for ilk chalder teynd as stock." Now, on that narrative the clause proceeds, and it is remarkable, and certainly very important, that the clause consists entirely of an obligation. And on whom is this obligation laid? It is laid on the superior, and on nobody else. No right is conferred on anyone except on the person in whose favour the obligation is conceived, and it would certainly be very peculiar if we could spell out of the clause of obligation a right or power in favour of the person who is taken bound, unless such a right is expressly conferred. The operative part of the clause is in these terms—"Therfor the said Sir George Mackenzie binds and obliges him and his forsd. to the said Andrew Ross, his spouse, and their sd. son, and his forsd., that in case the teynd sheaves of the sd. lands, with the crofts and pertinents yrof., or any part or portion of the sds. teynds, be evicted fra them be whatsoever person or persons, or yt. the samen lands and teynd be burdened and affected wt. any minister stipend in time comeing, whether present or supervenient, then and in that case, and immediately after the sd. eviction or burdening of the said lands and teynd as sd. is, to content and pay to the said Andrew Ross and his forsd. in liferent and fee revixe the sum of £1200 money forsd. for ilk chalder that shall be sua evicted, whither of stock or teind, wt. the @rent of the sds. sumes yearly and tearmly dureing the not-payment thereof after the said eviction."

As I said before, that is a clause of obligation merely, and the only obligation imposed is an obligation on the superior, Sir George Mackenzie. Of course no one supposes in the event of an augmentation of stipend becoming a burden on the estate that the vassal is entitled to insist on being relieved by the superior, and on the superior's at the same time paying the stipulated equivalent for each chalder. That is out of the question. The simplest rules of construction make that impossible. Therefore in one sense the two clauses of relief here are alternative. If the vassal is content to take relief by reimbursement, then the other clause cannot be enforced—he cannot insist on an annual payment. It is in the option of the vassal to take relief in the one way or the other. But as far as the superior is concerned, where is there anything to imply that he is entitled to this option? The argument amounts to this, that this second clause imports an option, and that it resolves itself into a right of redemption of the annual burden at the rate specified in the clause. But I am very clear that it is a right of option, not a right of redemption, and that the right of option is in favour of the vassal only. The superior has no such right. The only obligation imposed on the vassal is that found in the end of the clause, which requires that when any action is brought against him for evicting him from the lands or teinds he shall make intimation to the superior before litiscontestation, that the superior may appear and defend.

LORD DEAR.—One observation has been made in which I entirely agree, namely, as to the hardship which attaches to the construction of the various clauses which are to be found importing an obligation for all futurity, when no one can tell what that future may bring forth. But I am afraid that it matters not what these hardships may be where the meaning of the words themselves is clear. We must take them according to their terms, and nothing else. Looking at this case in that light I cannot read this clause as a clause of redemption, either on the one side or the other. It was quite plain that in the natural course of things there would be augmentations, and the agreement is that wherever there are augmentations there is to be a corresponding relief. Now, the difficulty I have had is, this being a mutual contract, how far this is not an alternative in the option of the seller, and how far it is not part of the bargain between both parties, that if the seller does not choose to do the one thing he shall be entitled to do the other.

But though I have more difficulty in getting to the result at which your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary have arrived I have no such clear opinion as to entitle me to differ.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is sound. I would willingly read the clause as conferring a right of redemption upon the seller. For as the deed bears that “£1200 Scots money was paid by the said Andrew to the said Sir George Mackenzie aswell for ilk chaldre teynd as stock,” it would have been most reasonable that the liability of the seller should be limited, and therefore that the future liability should be redeemed at the rate of £1200 Scots for each chaldre. Probably a provision to that effect was not inserted because it was not contemplated that this rate would ever be exceeded. This is no solitary case of the kind. We have had cases in which the burdens came in the end to exceed the amount payable to the superior by the vassal. The last is the case of Dunbar's Trustees v. The British Fisheries Society, in the House of Lords, 5 Rettie, 221.

But while I would gladly give to the deed the meaning which the reclamer asks, I find myself unable to do so. I cannot read the clause as giving a power of redemption. In the first place, it is not only absolute, but it contains an obligation upon the superior to relieve the vassal of certain duties yearly and termly in “all time coming.” If the deed had stopped there, there would have been no room for the argument submitted. In its very terms (to look no further) it is an obligation upon the seller. It is not a right with an option which is conferred upon the seller. In the subsequent part of the deed the seller binds himself that, when the burdens reach a certain amount, he shall pay a capital sum in lieu of them in place of an annual amount as he had provided in the earlier part. The result is that he incurs an additional obligation, and gives the purchaser an additional right. The seller binds himself to pay the annual burdens year by year, and to redeem them at the rate of £1200 Scots per chaldar if demanded. I read this as a second obligation, which the person in whose favour it is granted may treat alternatively.

In order to give room for the argument which has been maintained, something very express would have been required. There is not enough to create a right of option on the part of the seller, and so I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment is sound.

Servitude—Thirlage—Act 39 George III. cap. 55, secs. 1 and 4—Registration of abbreviate of decree of commutation.—Held (1) that the provisions of the first section of the Act 39 George III. cap. 55, dealing with registration of the abbreviate of a decree of commutation of thirlage is merely directory, and that there is no implied nullity where it has not been recorded within sixty days after the verdict of the jury; and (2) that the words of the fourth section protect against challenge any verdict that may be recorded, although after the lapse of sixty days.

1st Division.
Ld. Curriehill
M.

The predecessors of the Duchess of Sutherland, under the Act 39 George III. cap. 55, obtained in the year 1804 a decree or verdict commuting certain thirlage services, to which certain lands called Drumgillie, belonging to John Cockburn Ross of Shandwick, were subject, to a payment of a fixed annual amount of victual. The verdict was registered in the Register of Sasines, but not till after the lapse of sixty days from its date. The multures, as commuted under that decree, were paid annually up to 1877, but in that year, and subsequently, no payment was made. This was an action by the Duchess of Sutherland calling upon the owners of the lands of Drumgillie for payment of £80, 14s. 3d., the equivalent in money value of the alleged obligations according to the fiars prices.

The defence, inter alia, was that the decree of commutation was ineffectual, as the provisions of the Act 33 George III. cap. 55, had not been complied with, in respect (1) that the abbreviate of the decree prepared in terms of the statute had not been recorded within sixty days of the decree, as required under sec. 1 of the statute; and (2) that John Cockburn Ross, upon whom the petition for commutation was served, was not the true owner of the estate of Shandwick, his wife being at that time heiress of entail.

The pursuer admitted that the abbreviate had not been recorded within sixty days of the decree.*

* The following were the sections of the statute founded on (Act 39 George III. cap. 55):—

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The abbreviate founded on not having been recorded in terms of the statute 39 George III., cap. 55, is ineffectual to instruct the pursuer's claim. (2) The proceedings founded on by the pursuers, as ascertaining the amount of commuted multures, not having been carried out in terms of the said statute, et separatim, not having been directed against the proprietor of the lands mentioned, are insufficient to instruct the present claim against the defenders.

tained by the verdict of a jury an abbreviate of the decree or verdict "shall be registered by any of the parties in the General Register of Sasines at Edinburgh, or the Particular Register for the said county or stewartry, within sixty days after the pronouncing of such verdict or determination."

Sec. 4 provided that "After the expiry of three years from the registration of the verdict of the jury the said verdict and the proceedings had relative thereto shall not be reduced, set aside, reviewed, altered, or amended by the Court of Session, or any other judicatory, for any neglect of the provisions herein contained, or for any informality or error, or for any other reason or pretext whatever."

Sec. 5 provided that "The servitude and thirlage, and all services, prestations, and restrictions pertaining or any way incident thereto, so valued by the said jury, shall cease to be exigible from or binding upon either or any of the parties; but in lieu thereof the said proprietor or proprietors, occupier or occupiers, of the thirled lands or tenement shall be bound and obliged to pay, and the proprietor of the mill to which the said lands or tenements are thirled shall be bound and obliged to receive annually at the mill where the multures under the former servitude of thirlage were in use to be paid, or at some other convenient place to be fixed by the jury, such quantity or amount of corn or grain of such kind or sort, kinds or sorts, as the said jury shall in manner aforesaid determine to be a just compensation, or equivalent for such right of thirlage."

* "NOTE.— . . . Now, reading all these clauses together, I think it is clear the decree or verdict was to take effect, and was to operate as a commutation of the thirlage and services from its date, irrespective altogether of the registration of the abbreviate. But unless and until the abbreviate was recorded, the decree was to remain open to challenge or review on any competent ground. The object of the Legislature in prescribing the registration of an abbreviate, and in directing the registration to take place within sixty days, was not only to provide for the publication of the commutation in the public records of the country, but to induce the parties to make the publication without delay, and thereby secure the finality of the decree at the earliest possible period, i.e., after the lapse of three years from the registration. Until the registration was made, the decree, whether acted upon by the parties or not, might be challenged, in a reduction or otherwise, not only on the merits, but on the grounds of failure to comply with the statutory forms, and the right of challenge would probably subsist until extinguished by prescription or barred by homologation. But so soon as the abbreviate is recorded the statutory period of limitation (three years) begins to run, and on its expiration the decree is to become absolutely unchallengeable on any pretext whatever.

"In these circumstances, the direction to record the abbreviate within sixty days appears to me to be not imperative, not only because there is no penalty attached to failure to comply with that provision, but because the provision is just one of those statutory provisions failure to comply with which is expressly declared to be ineffectual as a ground of challenge after three years from the date of registration. It is important to observe that, in the case of sasines and inhibitions, where registration within sixty days and forty days respectively is by statute made matter of express enactment, the penalty of nullity is attached to failure to comply with the direction; whereas, in the case of adjudication,

Sutherland v.
Reid's Trustees.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is an action for the recovery of a sum of £80, 14s. 3d., which is the equivalent for four years of certain quantities of grain payable from the estate of Shandwick to the Duchess of Sutherland in respect of a decree of commutation obtained by a predecessor of the Duchess in 1804. The first objection taken to this decree of commutation is, that it was not recorded in terms of the statute within sixty days from its date, and I understand that this objection is pleaded to two effects. It is in the first place said that the failure to record within the sixty days makes the decree null to all effects; and secondly, even supposing that its effect does not go so far as this, it is said that it, at all events, deprives the party holding the decree from obtaining the benefit of the 4th section of the Act.

Now, the first question is, what is the effect of failure to record the decree within sixty days? Is the direction imperative, and with an implied sanction of nullity, for no such sanction is expressed? It is important, I think, that this is in the highest sense a remedial statute. It is intended to put an end to a highly disadvantageous relation between the owners of a barony mill and of the lands thirled to it. We are therefore bound to give it a liberal interpretation in favour of the object proposed to be obtained by the statute. The words of the statute are, that an abbreviate of the decree or verdict "shall be registered by any of the parties in the General Register of Sasines at Edinburgh, or the Particular Register for the said county or stewartry, within sixty days after the pronouncing of such verdict or determination;" and there the provision stops. It is not said that the verdict shall be so recorded under pain of nullity, nor are there any equivalent expressions. In these circumstances, I am not prepared to hold that the provision is imperative; I think it is merely directory. In such a statute, I think that unless a sanction of nullity be expressed, it will not be assumed to have been intended. This impression is confirmed by the other clauses referred to by the Lord Ordinary, to which I need not refer in detail.

But the defenders contend further, that if the party fails to record the decree within sixty days he cannot avail himself of the provisions of the 4th section of the statute. I am not prepared to affirm that view either, because I think the words of the fourth section are inconsistent with it. That section provides that, "after the expiry of three years from the registration of the verdict of the jury, the said verdict and the proceedings had relative thereto shall not where an abbreviate is by statute directed to be recorded within sixty days, failure to comply with that direction does not create a nullity, but has merely the effect of postponing the adjudication of which an abbreviate is not timeously recorded to an adjudication which, although subsequent in date, has been timeously recorded.

"In conclusion, on this branch of the case I have only further to observe that this is a highly remedial statute, and is to be interpreted liberally, and not in the judaical manner contended for by the defender. It was passed not for the purpose of imposing a burden upon lands, but of substituting a moderate fixed annual payment for a burden uncertain in amount, and oppressive in the mode of exaction; and I think it would be absurd to hold that it was intended that the whole benefit of the lengthened and laborious inquiry directed by the statute was to be entirely lost, if the parties, from any cause, however innocent, should allow even one hour more than the sixty days to elapse without recording the abbreviate."

 any informality or error, or for any other reason or pretext whatever." Now, Duchess of Sutherland v. Reid's Trustees.
 the condition upon which the verdict and proceedings are protected against all subsequent challenge, is, that three years shall have expired from the registration of the verdict. It is not said that the three years are to be counted from registration sixty days after the date of the verdict. It is not even said after the verdict "has been recorded as aforesaid," referring to the preceding requirement regarding the sixty days. The words are a great deal more general—"after the expiry of three years from registration of the verdict of the jury." Now, if I am right in holding that a verdict may be recorded after the lapse of the sixty days, and be a good registration, then these words are sufficient to cover any verdict that may be recorded, although after the lapse of the sixty days. So that upon this first ground on which the defender relies I have no hesitation in agreeing with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The other objection is that the party who was called, and who appeared as owner of the estate, was not in fact the owner of the estate. But this is denied by the pursuer, and if any effect is to be given to the argument, it can only be after an inquiry into the fact whether in 1804 John Cockburn Ross was or was not owner of the estate of Shandwick—that is, heir of entail in possession of the estate. Now, in regard to this, I am very clearly of opinion that it is not a matter which can competently be tried in this action. It is quite out of the question that a party should be allowed to maintain such a plea, ope exceptionis, in an action for payment of the commutation. It can only be raised in a reduction of the decree of commutation, because that decree must first be taken out of the way. It was a decree obtained, not in absence, but after a defender had been called and had appeared, in a petition under the statute.

Suppose that such a reduction is raised, then I think that the reasons of reduction must be very carefully libelled to set aside a decree after the lapse of so many years since 1804. And there would arise, on behalf of the defender in such an action, very formidable pleas of which no notice has been given at present—which indeed could hardly be competently referred to in this action. I need not go further than to mention the plea of the negative prescription. In short, the question whether the true owner was called or not is not before us for determination. We have no materials at present to determine either on the one side or on the other, and, therefore, I think the second objection is quite inadmissible.

LORD DEAS, LORD MURE, and LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor of 25th November 1880, "and, in respect the defenders did not insist in their third plea" (which related to a claim of relief), "repelled the other defences, and decerned," &c.

Insurance, Marine—Construction—Total loss—Notice of abandonment—Date of action—From which does liability of underwriters date—Ship.—The “Krishna” was stranded on the west coast of India on 23d May 1879, about a fortnight before the usual commencement of the south-west monsoon. Every possible effort was made by the captain and crew before the breaking of the monsoon to get her off, but without success. The south-west monsoon usually prevails from June till October, and during its continuance any farther effort to relieve the vessel was admittedly impracticable. The owner being advised that the vessel would break up during the monsoon, gave notice, on 7th June 1879, of abandonment, as for a constructive total loss, to the underwriters, with whom she was insured, for full value. This notice they refused to accept. The owner raised an action on the policy on 1st October 1879. The underwriters having subsequently succeeded in salving the vessel, pleaded in defence that there was no constructive total loss either at the date when notice was given, or when the action was raised; and alternatively that in determining the question of constructive total loss the point of time to be looked to was the raising of the action, at which date there was no constructive total loss, whatever view might be taken of the state of matters at the date when notice of abandonment was given.

Held (1) that though the total loss of the “Krishna” might, at 7th June 1879, be probable, still, in the circumstances, and looking to the possibilities, a prudent uninsured owner would not at that date have dealt with her as a total loss, but would have waited, and that therefore the notice of abandonment given was premature; (2) that still less was there a constructive total loss at the date of raising the action; and (3) that the underwriters had not, by sending out to save the ship, by implication accepted the notice of abandonment.

Question whether the date of notice of abandonment or of raising action is the point of time at which the question of constructive total loss is to be determined, and the rights and liabilities of parties hinc inde fixed.

ON 23d September 1878 a policy of insurance for one year from that date was effected through Messrs William Ewing & Co., insurance brokers, Glasgow, on the steamer “Krishna,” belonging to the pursuer, Joseph Augustus Shepherd, of Austin Friars, London. The policy was for £8000, and was underwritten for various sums by about fifty Glasgow underwriters, of whom the defender, John Henderson, was one.

The “Krishna” was of 198 tons register, and was one of a fleet of small steamers belonging to the pursuer plying from Bombay along the west coast of India. On 23d May 1879, while on the return voyage from Panjim, the port for Goa, to Bombay, with passengers, having little or no cargo on board, she was overtaken by a violent storm, in which she nearly foundered. To save life the captain was obliged to run her ashore, and succeeded in beaching her on a tract of sandy shore near Fort Redi, ten miles from Vingorla, and about 200 miles south of Bombay. The storm which the “Krishna” encountered occurred shortly before the setting in of the south-west monsoon, which usually commences about the beginning or middle of June, and continues till October. During that period navigation along this part of the coast ceases. For about a fortnight after the stranding of the “Krishna” the captain (Powell) made every effort to haul off the vessel, by means of his steam power and the ship’s anchors and hawsers. Another of the pursuer’s vessels, the “Gunga,” was sent to his assistance, but the surf was running so high that she could not approach within a mile of the shore, where she lay.

* Interlocutor signed March 15, 1881.

Having exhausted all his appliances, and the regular monsoon having set in, the captain, on 5th June 1879, wrote to the pursuer's representative in Bombay :—" I have to inform you that I tried to get this vessel off the shore by the aid of steam and a bower anchor, carried well out into the surf, and during the whole of yesterday's tide, though a high one, I was not successful. There appears to be a sand-bank formed outside of her, which increases each time the tide makes up. I tried again with the night's tide, with the like result, the cable having parted. At low-water I had all hands out, relaid the cable, and tried again. This morning the ship was bumping so heavily and causing the engines and boiler to work so much that I did not consider it safe to keep steam on, so blew down the boiler. However, she was tumbling about so heavily that the cable parted again, the vessel driving much higher up the beach, the sand-bank still forming up outside her. The whole of her cables are so much damaged by the very heavy strain—links broken, started, and studs gone, that now it is only fit to be condemned. Under all these circumstances I have wired you to-day that every effort having failed I am compelled to give her up as lost. In the same telegram I have asked for instructions regarding the disposition of the ship's stores, &c. Though I have virtually given up the ship as lost, I think the crew had better remain until I hear from you about the stores. In the meanwhile I have given the engineers orders to carefully coat with white lead and tallow all bright portions of machinery, and cover the cylinders over with the remnants of old awnings. The funnel will also be covered over to protect the tubes from rain water. All portable gear about the decks, such as binnacle tops, lamps, boats, oars, masts, sails, buckets, cooking-houses, doors, &c., will be put below, and all the ventilating cowls taken off and put below, and the wood plugs placed in and secured from below. When all the work is finished the crew, I suppose, had better go to Vingorla, there to await shipment to Bombay, as you may advise me hereafter."

The captain thereafter remained by the vessel to take charge of her and her stores and equipment for behoof of whom concerned.

On 7th June 1879 the pursuer, who had been communicated with by telegraph from Bombay, gave notice to William Ewing & Co., on behalf of the underwriters, of abandonment of the " Krishna," as for a constructive total loss. In reply, Messrs Ewing on same day wrote :—" We have tendered to the underwriters the abandonment of this vessel, as you instruct, but they have, as is usual, declined to accept it."

From June till October it was admittedly impossible to do anything farther for the vessel. Her situation in the beginning of June was this—She did not appear to have been materially injured in the hull by stranding, though her fittings, steering gear, &c. were much destroyed. How far she was strained could not be ascertained. She was lying in soft sand, nearly broadside to the sea, and about high-water mark of neap tides; and the surge had formed a small bank of sand between her and the sea. She was light, as she had no cargo, and her ballast had been unshipped. It was matter of speculation what effect the heavy monsoon sea would have upon her during the next four months, but if she lived through it, and the storms with which it usually ended, without any farther injury, there was no reason why she should not be got off when the monsoon was at an end and the weather moderated.

In point of fact the monsoon of 1879 was unusually light, and unaccompanied by violent storms, and instead of the " Krishna " breaking up she was merely lifted further up the beach, out of reach of the surf, and being light apparently received no further damage. The underwriters sent out a Captain Burns, one of their agents in salving operations, who reported in August that as the breaking of the monsoon had not farther injured the ship, there was every probability of getting her off when it was over. Captain Burns accordingly commenced work on 15th October 1879, and got the vessel off on 16th November. She was towed into Bombay, and there, having been overhauled and repaired at the expense of the underwriters, was tendered to the pursuer's representative.

In the meantime the pursuer, adhering to his notice of abandonment as for a constructive total loss, given on 7th June previous, raised this action in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire to try the question of the underwriters' liability. The petition was presented on 1st October 1879. The pursuer concluded for £50, the amount underwritten by the defender, together with £6, 5s., being his rateable proportion of the charges incurred and disbursements made by the pursuer in his endeavour to save the vessel.

He pleaded;—(1) The said vessel having become a total loss by the perils insured against, and having been timeously abandoned by the pursuer, he is entitled to decree against the defender as one of the underwriters on the said policy of insurance for the sum underwritten by him, and for his proportion of the charges incurred under the "sue and labour clause" therein. (2) The underwriters upon the said policy having accepted the pursuer's abandonment, decree should be granted as craved.

The defender denied liability as for a total loss, though admitting his liability to pay his proportion of the loss which the pursuer might have sustained by the perils insured against by him.

He pleaded;—2. The pursuer's statements, so far as material, being unfounded in fact, the pursuer is not entitled to decree as concluded for. 3. The defender having always been and being willing to settle with the pursuer, so far as he has any claim under the policy founded on, the present action is unnecessary, and ought to be dismissed, with expenses. 4. The defender has not accepted abandonment in respect of Captain Burns' actings in saving the ship, because—(1) He acted in conjunction with underwriters who had special powers so to act.* (2) He acted only as a salvor, and the pursuer knew this. (3) He acted in accordance with the usual practice in such cases.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie), on 8th December 1880, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that on 23d May 1879 the pursuer's steamship 'Krishna,' being then insured in terms of the policy founded on, and the defender being an insurer to the extent of £50, was stranded during a violent storm on the coast of Hindostan, between Panjim and Bombay: Finds that on or about the 7th day of June following the pursuer intimated to the underwriters in said policy that he abandoned the 'Krishna,' and claimed as for a total loss: Finds that the underwriters did not accept the abandonment: Finds that the pursuer brought this action for indemnification of his loss upon the 1st day of October 1879: Finds that shortly after the stranding of the 'Krishna' the south-west monsoon began upon the coast of India, and continued till the end of September or beginning of October, and that during its continuance it was impossible to get the 'Krishna' afloat: Finds that in August and September, and at the date when this action was raised, the 'Krishna'

* "NOTE.—The pursuer's steamer was driven ashore while on a voyage from Panjim to Bombay on the 23d May 1879, and after some attempts by the master and crew to get her afloat, the pursuer, on 7th June, acting on the information he then had, gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters. The south-west monsoon was beginning, and the knowledge that all efforts to get the vessel afloat must consequently cease for some months, during which, moreover, the vessel, if exposed to the action of the sea, must run a great risk of being further damaged and possibly broken up, was doubtless one of the principal elements in determining the pursuer to take this course. If the legal effect of the abandonment were to be judged of according to the facts as they stood at the 7th of June, when notice was given, it would be difficult to say that the vessel, though then existing in fact, was not lost so far as any beneficial use to the owner was concerned. The validity of abandonment, as at the date of notice, is not, however, a point which must be decided here, because I think that by the law of this country it is necessary to the pursuer's success that the circumstances should have continued to be such as to involve a constructive total loss down till the raising of the action. There was an attempt by the pursuer to shew that it is an open point in the law of Scotland whether the validity of an abandonment is to be determined by the state of matters existing at the date of the notice, or by that existing at the time when action is brought; and the doubts expressed by Lord Eldon in the Scotch case of Robertson v. Stewart and Smith, 10th Feb. 1809, F.C. rev. 2 Dow, 474, were referred to in support of this view. But there is no authority in our law except the doubts of Lord Eldon, and the judgment in the Court of Session in that case, in support of the American and French doctrine on this subject, as distinguished from the English; and there is no sufficient ground for holding that our law and practice is not, as Professor Bell indicates in his 'Commentaries,' vol. i., p. 655, the same as that which obtains in England, and which has been settled by a series of English cases subsequent to Robertson v. Stewart and Smith, and all confirming the rule of Bainbridge v. Nelson, 10 East. 329, which Lord Eldon doubted. The principle to be extracted from the decisions is, that abandonment is a quasi offer, which grows into a contract or transaction fixing the rights of parties only (1) by the insurer's acceptance, or (2) by a judicial determination of its validity, which, like other judicial decisions, deals with the state of facts at the inception of the action in which it is given. 'Notice of abandonment,' says Bayley, J., in Brotherston v. Barbour, 5 M. and S., 418, 'is no more than a proposal on the part of the assured which the underwriters may accept, and then there will be a new agreement binding on both parties. But while the transaction rests in abandonment only on one side, the underwriter's responsibility may vary, and cannot amount to a total loss, if by subsequent events it has become otherwise at the time of action brought.'

"This point being fixed, the determination of the principal question of fact Argued for him ;—On 7th June 1879, when notice of abandonment of the “Krishna” was given by the pursuer, there was a constructive total loss. In the circumstances in which she was stranded there was at that date no reasonable hope that she would be got off at all. She was lying broadside to the sea, on an open beach, exposed to the whole force of the monsoon gale and the heavy sea, which, according to all experience, would continue for the next four months. According to reasonable deduction from all prior experience, the pursuer was warranted in acting on the supposition that nothing would be left of the vessel when the monsoon subsided. Had he been uninsured he would therefore have at that date sold her for what she would fetch, if he could have found any one venturesome enough to purchase the wreck. He was therefore entitled to abandon the ship to the underwriters, and was not bound to wait four months without his ship, to see what the chapter of accidents might bring forth. This being the state of matters at the date when notice of abandonment was given, it was at that point of time that the question of constructive total loss and the rights and liabilities of parties, hinc inde, were to be determined. Such was the rule of law in America, Germany, and France, and in fact in all mercantile countries except England.¹ In under adjudication becomes comparatively simple ; for it seems to me, that however hopeless the recovery of the ‘Krishna’ may have been at the beginning of June 1879, the prospect was very different at 1st October. The monsoon was then over, the ship was uninjured, or at least as little injured as it was possible for her to be after lying for four months on the beach, and there was no reasonable doubt to those acquainted with the position of the vessel, as indeed the event proved, that she could be got of without undue expense. The vessel was got off and repaired for a total cost of about £1400, and the pursuer’s own witness, Captain Cooper, places her value when offered to the owner at £6000, or about two-thirds of her original cost. We have not in this country adopted the American rule that a loss is total wherever the insured subject is deteriorated to the extent of half its value, or the cost of its restoration would exceed half its value. But if even that were our law the evidence does not lead to such a result. It would be useless to analyse the evidence on the subject, the mass of which irresistibly leads to the conclusion that at the 1st of October, when the claim for indemnity was judicially made, and the right to indemnity under the contract of insurance falls to be ascertained, there was no constructive total loss upon which the pursuer could rest his demand.

“But even if there were not a constructive total loss, it might be that a notice of abandonment having been given at an earlier date the insurers had so acted as to be barred from repudiating that abandonment, and the pursuer, somewhat late in the day, was allowed to add to the record a plea to this effect. It does not appear to me that there is even a plausible ground for this contention. The insurers at once declined to accept the abandonment when it was made ; a distinct notification to the same effect was made on their behalf early in August, and it is impossible to refer to any words or acts of theirs suggesting that they proceeded to float the ‘Krishna’ on any other footing than as salvors. I find nothing in the authorities to suggest that where insurers save an abandoned vessel, all the time protesting that they do not accept the abandonment, they are to be taken as accepting the abandonment. The judgment in Provincial Assurance Co. of Canada v. Ledue (43 L. J., P. C. 49 ; L. R. 6, P. C. 224) certainly does not support any such view, which would simply mean that where an owner abandons and the insurers repudiate the abandonment the subject insured must be left to perish utterly, because neither party can interfere for its protection or recovery without forfeiting his legal rights.”

England, from an early period, the date of raising action had been taken as the point of time at which the question was to be determined. And though many opinions had been expressed against the advisability, in point of principle, of looking at subsequently emerging circumstances prior to raising action, and refusing to look at those occurring prior to decree, the rule having once been fixed had been adhered to. In Scotland the question might be said to be new. But such authority as existed was in favour of the view that the more rational law of foreign states had been adopted in Scotland, and the law of England not followed. In Smith v. Robertson, Feb. 10, 1809, F. C.,¹ it was so decided by the Court of Session. On appeal, a very noticeable course was taken by the House of Lords, that House (2 Dow, 474) affirming the judgment on the ground of acceptance of abandonment to avoid determining whether the prior English authorities should be applied in Scotland, and the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) specially reserving his opinion as to whether the principle of these authorities was sound. In Scotland, therefore, the general rule must be held to prevail. But even if the contrary rule were adopted, still at the date of raising the action the evidence shewed that the ship, though floated off, was so much strained that she never could be used for the pursuer's trade again. He was not therefore bound to accept her when tendered by the underwriters, and merely claim for a partial loss. Further, the underwriters had, by their actings, impliedly accepted the abandonment.

Argued for the defender;—The point of time, with reference to the circumstances, at which the question of constructive total loss was to be determined, was not, as contended, the date of notice of abandonment, but of raising action on the policy. Even if Lord Chancellor Eldon might be said, in deciding the case of Robertson v. Stewart and Smith, 2 Dow's Ap. 474, to have reserved for reconsideration the point of principle involved in the earlier cases of Bainbridge v. Neilson, 10 East. 329, and Faulkner v. Ritchie, 2 Maule and Selwyn, 290, these cases had been followed in a multitude of subsequent English cases,² which adopted the principle on which they proceeded, and fixed the rule of law for England. In the absence of any authoritative decision to the contrary it could not be held, in a mercantile question, that that rule was not the law of Scotland also. But, in point of fact, the state of matters at 7th June was not such as satisfied the criterion precedent to the right to abandon, viz., that a prudent uninsured owner would have abandoned further exertions, and sold the wreck for what it would fetch.³ And if such was the case on 7th June nothing which happened subsequently altered matters, except for the better. The ship was an average, not a

Henderson.

At advising,—

LORD CRAIGHILL.—(After stating the facts)—1. The first question to be considered and decided is whether there was on 7th June, the date of the notice of abandonment, a constructive total loss. The Sheriff-substitute does not answer this question directly; but in his interlocutor he finds that shortly after the stranding of the “Krishna” the south-west monsoon began to beat upon the coast of India, and continued until the end of September or beginning of October, and that during its continuance it was impossible to get the “Krishna” afloat. In his note he adds—“The pursuer on the 7th June, acting on the information he then had, gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters. The south-west monsoon was beginning, and the knowledge that all efforts to get the vessel afloat must consequently cease for some months, during which, moreover, the vessel, if exposed to the action of the sea, must run a great risk of being further damaged, and possibly broken up, was doubtless one of the principal elements in determining the pursuer to take this course. If the legal effect of the abandonment were to be judged of according to the facts as they stood at the 7th of June, when notice was given, it would be difficult to say that the vessel though then existing in fact, was not lost, so far as any beneficial use to the owner was concerned.” Limiting this conclusion to the time when the notice of abandonment was given, and to the next three, or it may be four, months, its soundness can hardly be impeached. The weather was and would be an obstacle to the floating of the vessel, even if she did not break up, which could not be overcome. But the bad weather would, according to all experience, come to an end in October, if not sooner; and unless broken up in the interval, which, as a bank of sand had been formed between her and the sea, was unlikely, there was ground for a reasonable expectation that the “Krishna” might then be got off. This was not doubted at the time, and the result proved its accuracy.

There were thus only two elements by which a constructive total loss as on 7th June could be said to be established. One was the contingency that the vessel, before she could be removed from the strand, might in fact become a total wreck, or be so much injured that the cost of removal and repairs together would be more than her value when released and repaired; and the other was the length of time that must elapse before she could be removed.

With reference to the second element, that certainly was not such as, of itself, would warrant abandonment. Detention, or loss of the beneficial use of a vessel for such a period as the interval in question, will not convert what is in its own nature only a partial into a constructive total loss.

The first element, however, is more material. There was risk that the vessel while exposed on the strand might become a wreck, that is to say, only a congeries of planks, which, though it might still bear the semblance of a vessel, would not be worth more than the value of the materials; or, if not reduced to this condition, that she might be so much injured that the cost of getting her off and of the necessary repairs would exceed what would be her value when again afloat and repaired.

What right did these contingencies confer on the insured? The law upon this subject is not doubtful, and may be presented in the words used by Lord Abinger in Roux v. Salvador (3 Bingham, N.S., 266; Tudor's Marine Cases, Feb. 25, 1881. Shepherd v. Henderson. 140):—"There are intermediate cases,—there may be a capture which, though prima facie a total loss, may be followed by a recapture, which would revert the property in the assured. There may be a forcible detention which may speedily terminate, or may last so long as to end in the impossibility of bringing the ship or the goods to their destination. There may be some other peril which renders the ship unnavigable without any reasonable hope of repair, or by which the goods are partly lost or so damaged that they are not worth the expense of bringing them, or what remains of them, to their destination. In all those or any similar cases, if a prudent man not insured would decline any further expense in prosecuting an adventure, the termination of which will probably never be successfully accomplished, a party insured may, for his own benefit as well as that of the underwriter, treat the case as one of total loss, and demand the full sum insured." Would, then, a prudent man not insured have dealt, on 7th June, with the "Krishna" as a wreck,—that is to say, as a congeries of planks; or as a vessel, the floating and repair of which would exceed her value when again afloat and repaired? I think he would not. He would have waited. And why? Because even if the worst were to happen he could not be worse off than he would be were he immediately to act on the assumption that the vessel in the end would become a wreck. He might gain by holding on, but he could not lose; whereas disposing at once of the property as a wreck he might lose, and could not gain. The position of matters appears to have been this. It was not improbable that, stranded as she was, and exposed to the south-west monsoon, the "Krishna" might become a wreck; but it was possible, to say the least, that she might remain unbroken, that she might be got off when the south-west monsoon came to an end, and that she might be repaired at an expense far within her value. No prudent uninsured owner would, in the circumstances, as I think, have abandoned either hope or his ship. He could act otherwise only by sacrificing a possible advantage without any corresponding consideration, because his vessel at the beginning was not in fact a wreck, and this at the worst would only be its character when it came to be disposed of at the end.

These considerations have brought me to the conclusion that there was not as on the 7th of June, when notice of abandonment was given, any more than at any subsequent period, a constructive total loss, and this of itself would be a ground, though a different ground from that on which the Sheriff proceeded, for giving judgment for the defender.

2. But it may be that the notice of abandonment given to the insured was accepted by the underwriters, and if so, the latter, of course, will be bound by the agreement thus concluded. And this, the appellant says, is what happened; but in this part of the case I agree with the judgment of the Sheriff. There appears to me to be no reasonable ground for such a contention. Upon receipt of the notice, intimation was made on the part of the underwriters that "they, as is usual, declined to accept it." And to this, so far at least as protestation went, they uniformly adhered. But having in the month of August learned from persons sent to inspect the "Krishna" that when the south-west monsoon ceased she might be got off, they sent in the following October the men and the materials thought to be necessary for this undertaking, with the result that after four weeks' labour she was again afloat. This was done by the underwriters, as they say, simply in the character of salvors, and such, I think, is the fact. The underwriters, it may be, as they had rejected notice of abandonment, had not a legal title to do what they did, and certainly they might have been prevented by the appellant had he chosen to resume his right in the "Krishna" which had been abandoned; but this does not bring with it as a corollary the conclusion that their conduct was equivalent to acceptance of the notice of abandonment. No doubt, if in acting without title they injured the owner, they must make reparation, but all idea of injury is excluded on the present occasion, for on the one hand if there was, as on the 7th June, a constructive total loss, and if that is the date with reference to which the rights and obligations of parties are to be determined, the appellant will, notwithstanding the subsequent salving of the ship, recover the full sum insured, while if, on the other hand, the loss is to be held as having been only a partial loss, the getting off of the ship could not be an injury, but rather would be a benefit to the owner. If, indeed, the "Krishna" had been left uncared for on the shore where she was stranded, the result, sooner or later, would necessarily have been not a constructive but an actual total loss, but on the assumption that doing nothing himself the owner prevented others from doing what was necessary for getting her off, it is hardly conceivable that upon a claim as for a total loss the appellant could have recovered.

3. On the view that on the 7th June the circumstances were such as to entitle the insured to give notice of abandonment, and that this notice was not accepted by the underwriters, which is the view upon which the Sheriff has proceeded, the question whether the date of the notice or the date of the action is the point of time with reference to which the rights and obligations of parties are to be determined, is next presented for consideration. This, in truth, has all through been dealt with as the great question in the cause. Being purely a question of law, and therefore of general application, it is one of interest and importance; not, however, because it need have much influence upon insurers and the insured in time to come, for once the point is fixed, parties may so contract that the effect of the decision may be almost neutralised. If action should be raised simultaneously or nearly simultaneously with the giving of notice, the importance of a question like the one now awaiting decision is plainly diminished. That question, nevertheless, is one which has long been debated, and it is one upon which not only jurists but legal systems have differed. England, although the rule has not been applied, so far as appears, to a case like the present, or to other cases than loss from capture or restraint, if the dicta of Judges and the statements of institutional writers should be taken as conclusive, has chosen the date of action; while France and America have chosen the date of the notice of abandonment.

In Scotland the question has only once been before the Court, and the decision both of the Judge of the Admiralty Court and of the Judges in the Court of Session, was in favour of the view adopted in France and America (Robertson, Forsyth, & Co. v. Stewart, Smith and Others, Buchanan's Reports, p. 73, 2 Dow, H. of L., p. 474). Judgment, however, was given on a different ground in the House of Lords, and the case is almost more memorable for the protest entered by the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) against being thought to concur in or to differ from the previous decisions in England which had been cited as authorities than for what was decided either in the Court of Session or in the House of Lords. The same question has not, until the present action was raised, been again submitted for the consideration of the Courts in Scotland. Professor No. 100.

 Ball, however, in treating of the subject, has brought into prominence what, Feb. 25, 1881.
 since the days of Lord Mansfield, has been decided in England, and almost Shepherd v.
 suggests that the English rule may be taken to be the rule in Scotland. But Henderson.
 in so doing he is influenced not by any favour for the English rule, but by the consideration that it is not likely, and certainly would not be desirable, that what has long been taken for law on a mercantile question in England should be found not to be the rule recognised in Scotland.

Dealing with the point as one of principle, more, I think, may be said for the French and American than for the English rule. The assumption is that, at the date of the notice of the abandonment there was a constructive total loss, in consequence of which the insured were entitled to give notice of abandonment and claim for the sum set forth in the policy as by agreement the value of the vessel. Then why are the rights and obligations of the parties thence-forward to remain uncertain? It is said that contingencies may occur by which what at the time was constructively a total loss will be reduced to a partial loss.
 This reason, however, operates as much against the selection of the date of action as of the date of notice. Things relative to the condition of the vessel may change as well after the one as after the other, and, therefore, there is, so far as I can see, no consideration of principle which affects the first more than the last. But of the converse this cannot be predicated. Once notice is given, the ship is ceded by the insured, though the exact connection between her and the insurers consequently established has never been clearly, or, I may say, satisfactorily defined. The insured thenceforward cannot meddle, his power as owner is surrendered, and whatever may be apprehended he has no title upon which he can interfere and endeavour to guide the course of events. This being so, there would appear to me to be expediency in dealing with the contract in such a way that things as they were when notice was given should determine the measure of the rights of the insured and of the liabilities of the insurer. The truth is that in any case except the first to which the rule is applied, there can be no pretext for a complaint of hardship, whatever may be the rule which is the subject of application, because both parties when they contract know, or at least may know, what as regards constructive total loss is involved in their contract, and must therefore be held to have realised their respective positions.

These being my views, I should be disposed to hold, if there was no countervailing consideration, that the date of the notice of abandonment was the date with reference to which the question whether a constructive total loss had occurred was to be determined. But there is, in my opinion, such a consideration, and that is the opposite rule which has been recognised in England for more than a century. We are not bound by decisions which have been pronounced in another country, but in a mercantile question it would be unfortunate were we called upon to give a judgment by which a different rule would be set up here from that which has been established in England. But on this occasion we are not pressed by any such necessity, because if there was a constructive total loss as at 7th June 1879, the date of the notice of abandonment, the right to recover for the full value of the ship was not extinguished by anything which occurred previous to the 1st of October, when the action was instituted. At the later date, just as much as at the earlier, the "Krishna" was a wreck, assuming that at any time she could be so regarded. She still lay on the strand upon which she had been cast on the 23d of May, and whether she could be got off, and what if got off would be her condition, were matters merely of opinion or of speculation. But the underwriters, when sued as for a constructive total loss, could not satisfy the owners' demand by presenting them with a contingency even had that been one more hopeful than formerly could have been offered. Satisfaction of the owners' claim, if not by payment of the value of the ship, at least by the delivery of the ship herself, was what was required. This is the rule in England. The decisions of the Courts of that country established the principle, that if once there has been a total loss this is construed to be a permanent total loss, unless something shall afterwards occur by which the assured either has the possession restored, or has the means of restoring such possession. (Vide Maciver v. Henderson, 5 M. & S., p. 447; Deans v. Hornsby, 3 E. & B., p. 186.) Nor will the restoration of the hull be enough, for it has also been held that the insured were not bound to be satisfied by the mere restitution of the ship's hull under conditions which make it doubtful whether they would not have to pay more for its repair than it was worth. As the rule was expressed by Mr Justice Bayley in Houldsworth v. Wyse (7 B. & C., 794), "to reduce the loss once total to a particular loss, the subject of the insurance must be in existence under such conditions that the insured may, if they please, have possession," for they may reasonably be expected to take possession of it. The strength of the principle in question is even more fully exhibited in the language used by Lord Ellenborough in deciding Paterson v. Ritchie (4 M. & S., p. 393). The principle of the decision in Bainbridge v. Neilson (10 East, p. 329), he said is a general one, and is this, "I have a right of action for the non-payment of money; the party pays me before action brought; that takes away my right of action." Thus what is offered or given is the ship in such a condition that she is counted as money for the value insured, which necessarily excludes the idea of contingency in the matter either of restitution or of the ship's value when restored. But here there was at the raising of the action contingency as to both particulars, and therefore I think that assuming there was a constructive total loss at the date of the abandonment the liability of the underwriters who did not accept of the notice when given was not extinguished as at the 1st of October by any supervening change in the condition of the ship.

Upon this view of the case, the interlocutor of the Sheriff would have to be altered, and decree for the full sum covered by the policy be pronounced.

LORD YOUNG.—The Sheriff was of opinion that on the 7th June, when notice was given by the owners to the underwriters, there was a constructive total loss, but that, on 1st October, when this action was raised, the circumstances had changed, and did not involve a constructive total loss. He was of opinion, in fact, that at the first date there was, and at the second date there was not, a constructive total loss, and being of opinion, in point of law, that the date of action ruled the liability, he decided that the underwriters were not due as for a total loss.

I think the question of fact, as to whether there was a constructive total loss at 7th June—that is to say, whether the circumstances as at that date warranted the inference that a total loss had constructively occurred—I think that question of fact is attended with difficulty. Though the Sheriff is of opinion that the circumstances, as existing at 7th June, involved a constructive total loss, he arrives at that opinion with some hesitation. I share that hesitation, but I am inclined to agree with Lord Craighill that the better view is that they do not. No. 100.

Feb. 25, 1881.

Shepherd v.
Henderson.

In point of fact, the vessel was stranded at the commencement of the monsoon. She was driven on to a soft sandy beach, but suffered no material damage thereby. The question was whether she was to be got off in safety. She was all right, but in the wrong place. She was ashore instead of afloat. There did occur a chance of getting her off very shortly after she grounded—after the violence of the storm had subsided, and before the monsoon had regularly set in. But she was not then got off, and, those in charge of her having failed in their attempt, it was needless to make any farther efforts until the monsoon was over.

Accordingly, when the underwriters got notice from the owners on 7th June, they, in effect, replied,—“This is all nonsense. The ship, so far as appears, at least as to her hull, is as yet uninjured. She is not a total loss. The probability is that she will be got off without material damage if you wait till the monsoon subsides.” I think that was a reasonable answer. The result might not have justified the expectation of the underwriters. The ship might have broken up during the monsoon. But, in point of fact, the result did justify their expectation. And I think that the balance of evidence, not judged of ex post facto, but from the point of time, of the 7th June, and with regard to the then future contingencies, is in favour of the reasonableness of these expectations. I think the owners, if they had taken the more reasonable course, would not have given up the ship as a gone thing, but would have waited, and renewed their efforts at a more favourable opportunity.

I am inclined, though with a good deal of difficulty, to adopt that view. And that disposes of the whole matter so far as this case is concerned, for the ship was got off by the underwriters, acting as salvors, was completely repaired by them at a cost of £1400, and was offered to the owners on 5th December. She was then valued at something like £6000, or £3000 less than her value before she went ashore. That being so, and regarding the contract of insurance as really a contract of indemnity, I think that the insured are entitled to indemnity for that partial loss, though not as for a total loss.

What strikes me with surprise is that the case has never been regarded at any of its stages as a case of partial loss. There has been damage, and the underwriters must pay. The only question is whether they are to pay for a partial or a total loss, yet the case is directed to the recovery as of a total loss only. Partial loss never seems to have been thought of. There are no materials for its ascertainment, even supposing the summons would cover it. The case might quite well have been stated alternatively as for a total or a partial loss. But it has not been so, and the parties must have recourse to other proceedings, unless they can agree on a sum, to ascertain what is the amount of the partial loss.

If the conclusion at which I have arrived is correct, the question which the Sheriff has decided, and to which much of the argument was addressed, does not arise, viz., whether there must be total loss at the date of giving notice or of raising action. But I may say that my opinion on that question, taking it hypothetically, rather inclines to that expressed by my brother Lord Craighill. I do not wish to express myself more decidedly. There are, I think, grounds for distinguishing between cases of capture and cases of damage by perils of the sea. There may be an analogy, but I think cases of capture, which are specially insured against in every policy, may be distinguishable from such cases as the present. But I should desire to reserve my opinion on the point.

Shepherd v.

On the last point mentioned by your Lordships, if we were obliged to give a decision, I think much consideration would be necessary. But, in my opinion, specific restitution must always exclude a claim for reparation at whatever date specific restitution is made. And that is possibly a principle that may distinguish the case of capture from a case like the present.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that on 23d May 1879 the pursuer's steamship 'Krishna,' being then insured in terms of the policy founded on, and the defender (respondent) being an insurer to the extent of £50, was stranded during a violent storm on the coast of Hindostan, between Panjim and Bombay: Find that, on or about the 7th day of June following, the pursuer (appellant) intimated to the underwriters in said policy that he abandoned the 'Krishna,' and claimed as for a total loss: Find that the underwriters did not accept the abandonment: Find that the pursuer brought this action for indemnification of his loss upon the 1st day of October 1879: Find that shortly after the stranding of the 'Krishna' the south-west monsoon began upon the coast of India, and continued till the end of September or beginning of October, and that during its continuance it was impossible to get the 'Krishna' afloat: But find that there was on the 7th of June, and continued thereafter to be, a reasonable prospect of her being got off the sandy shore on which she lay, without greater expense than a prudent uninsured owner would reasonably incur: Find, therefore, that there was not, at that date, a constructive total loss of the ship: Therefore dismiss the appeal, affirm the judgment of the Sheriff appealed against, and decern: Find the defender entitled to expenses in this Court, and remit to the Auditor to tax the same, and the expenses found due in the inferior Court, and to report."

Lease—Mineral—Lease to terminate if minerals became "not worth expense of working"—Fall in market price of mineral.—In a lease of gas coal for twenty-nine years from Whitsunday 1867 it was provided that if at any time during the subsistence of the lease it should be "judicially found, upon a report by arbiters, that the gas coal, from no fault, neglect, or irregularity on the part of the lessees, has become not worth the expense of working, this lease shall come to an end at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after it shall be so found." In 1880 the lessees obtained a report from the arbiters setting forth that, from no fault on the part of the lessees, the mineral had become not worth the expense of working, the arbiters stating that the grounds on which they had arrived at this conclusion had reference "solely to the state of the market for gas coal at the time." In an action subsequently raised by the lessees, concluding for declarator that the gas coal, from no fault of the pursuers, "has become not worth the expense of working," and that said lease shall come to an end at Martinmas 1880, held (1) that the clause in question was to be construed as applicable, inter alia, to the case of the mineral becoming not worth the expense of working in consequence of a continued depression of market prices, although the produce of the mines had not deteriorated in quantity or quality; (2) that the report by the arbiters was to be regarded as proceeding on a due consideration of the existing state and future prospects of the market for gas coal; and therefore (3) that the lessees were entitled to bring the lease to an end. No. 101.

By lease, dated 6th and 12th January 1869, Sir George Deas let to trustees for the behoof of the Shotts Iron Company "All and Whole the seam of gas coal or parrot coal situated in the lands and others therein described, said gas coal being known in the neighbourhood by the name of the Shotts or Shottsburn gas coal, and sometime partially wrought by George Simpson, as tenant thereof; together also with what common coal and ball ironstone, and musselband ironstone, may be found to be associated with the said gas coal or parrot coal, and falling to be wrought therewith in the ordinary course of working, but no other coal, minerals, or substance whatever, and that for the space of twenty-nine years from and after Whitsunday 1867."

The lease excluded assignees, legal and voluntary, and also subtenants, "except on condition of the said lessees, the Shotts Iron Company, remaining liable for the rent and prestations, and implement of all the stipulations in the lease, on which footing the lessees may sublet, and not otherwise."

The subjects let were situated in or under the lands of Hartwoodhill and others, in the county of Lanarkshire.

The fixed rent payable under the lease was £300 per annum, or, in the option of the landlord, certain lordships, the lordship on the gas or parrot coal being 1s. per ton for the first five years of the lease, and thereafter at the rate of one-seventh part of the price thereof for the time being, after deducting the expense of taking the same to market.

During the first five years of the lease the stipulated lordship was paid in place of the fixed rent.

The lease further proceeded—"Declaring that if in the course of any year, from time to time, after the lapse of the said five years, the working of the said gas or parrot coal shall not be to an extent sufficient to yield a lordship equal in amount to the said fixed rent, the lessees shall be entitled to make up the difference from subsequent lordships at any time during the next three years immediately following the year in which the deficiency occurs; and if at any time during this lease, inclusive of the said first period of five years, it shall be judicially found, upon a report by an arbiter or arbiters nominated in the manner hereinafter provided for, that the said gas coal, from no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the said lessees, has become not worth the expense of working, this lease shall come to an end at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after it shall be so found, without prejudice to the subsistence and effect of this lease to every effect in so far as thus not legally terminated."

Then followed provisions for the working of the mines, among which occurred the following:—"And the said lessees bind themselves to work the said minerals and others by the longwall system only, or other complete system of excavation, and that in a regular, proper, and systematic manner according to the best practice, and to keep the whole mines and workings at all times in good order and repair, and to keep secure, upred, and patent all levels, roads, wall-faces, rooms, and air-courses of going pits or inclined planes, so far as may be necessary for the proper working thereof, and to leave the going pits and works, and the levels and air-courses, and rooms and wall-faces of the going pits at the natural expiry, or sooner termination, partial or total, of this lease, in good order and condition, and without any accumulation of water in the rise workings, and generally in such condition as shall enable the landlord or incoming tenant advantageously to pursue and carry on the same, or other workings therefrom, of the minerals in his lands."

Shotts Iron
Co. v. Deas.

By sublease, of date August and September 1870, the Shotts Iron Company sublet to L. U. La Cour and Anthony Watson, coal-masters and coal-exporters, Leith, and G. P. Simpson, coal-master, a part of the subjects let to them by Sir George Deas under the above lease.

This sublease was to endure for the same period as the original lease, and a clause in the same terms as that quoted above from the principal lease, relative, inter alia, to the circumstances and manner in which the lease might be brought to an end before the stipulated time, was inserted in it.

Sir George Deas was not a party to this sublease, and was not consulted as to its being granted.

Messrs La Cour, Watson, & Simpson entered upon the subjects, and worked the coal until August 1875, when they alleged that it became not worth the expense of working. They continued, however, to pay the rent fixed by the sublease to the Shotts Iron Company. At no time did they have any communication directly with Sir George Deas, all the states of output, &c., rendered to him being signed and certified by the manager of the Shotts Iron Company.

On 9th May and 4th August 1879 the sublessees intimated to the Shotts Iron Company "that the gas coal, from no fault, negligence, or irregularity on their part, had become not worth the expense of working," and, in terms of the sublease, nominated Mr Alexander Simpson, mining engineer, as their arbiter.

On 4th June 1879 the Shotts Iron Company sent a similar intimation to Sir George Deas, who, on 7th June, in replying to their letter, called upon the Shotts Company "to state from what cause the gas coal had become not worth the expense of working,—whether in respect of anything, and, if so, from what, in the state of the mineral, or from what other cause, as upon that it depended whether the question was one for skilled engineers, or one of relevancy to be determined by the Court."

Thereupon the Shotts Company made a call upon the sublessees in precisely similar terms, but to neither call was any answer returned.

Following upon these intimations, La Cour, Watson, and Simpson presented a petition against the Shotts Iron Company in the Bill-Chamber, repeating the substance of their letter of 4th May 1879, and calling upon the respondents to nominate an arbiter to represent them.

Thereupon, the Shotts Company presented a similar petition against Sir George Deas. Records were made up in both petitions, and were subsequently laid before the arbiters nominated by the parties.

From the proceedings in the Bill-Chamber it appeared that the Shotts Iron Company had declined to appoint an arbiter unless La Cour, Watson, & Simpson averred in their record that there was involved in the case a question of deterioration in the mineral fields which properly fell to be decided by men of skill. This the sublessees did, and the averment having been repeated by the Shotts Company in their record, Sir George Deas, who had taken a similar objection, nominated Mr Landale as his arbiter, and the Shotts Company chose the same gentleman to represent them.

These nominations, and that of Mr A. Simpson for the sublessees, having been approved by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, the records made up in the Bill-Chamber were laid before the arbiters as pleadings for the parties.

During the proceedings before the arbiters a proof was allowed to the parties of their respective averments, and on 16th July 1880 the arbiters issued their final report, which, after a narrative of the proceedings taken before them, concluded as follows:—"The arbiters have now duly considered the whole papers, productions, and notes of evidence, and farther they have visited and inspected the lands, and made inquiries as to the working of the gas coal in adjoining lands, and having submitted to the parties a draft of this report, and considered their observations thereon, and being now well and ripely advised in the whole matters referred to them, they hereby report that from no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the tenants, the Shotts Iron Company, the gas coal let to them by the said lease has become not worth the expense of working.

"The arbiters think it right to add, that the grounds on which they have arrived at this conclusion have reference solely to the state of the market for gas coal at the time the tenants gave notice to the landlord of their intention to terminate the lease; and indeed the tenants, in the evidence laid before the arbiters, did not attempt to rest their case on any other grounds. Neither did they dispute, nor in the opinion of the arbiters could they have successfully disputed, either the existence of gas coal in the lands let to them, other than those out of which the coal has been already wrought, or the fact that there is no physical difficulty in working the coal in said lands.—All which is humbly reported by

"While my co-arbiter and I have arrived at the conclusion that the gas coal in question is not worth the expense of working in the present state of the market it is impossible for any one to predict that it will continue so up to the end of the lease in 1896, or any specified period, as it is found whenever the better class of gas coal gets plentiful, and comes to be sold at or under 20s. per ton, second-class coal such as this cannot be sold, as is the case just now. When the prices of the better ones rise to 25s. and upwards per ton there is a demand for second-class, and they occasionally become highly remunerative. The working of such coal is therefore intermittent, and tenants, in using ordinary foresight, should be ready to meet the market, when it is favourable to them, which the sub-tenants in this case have not done. They have not fulfilled the following clause in their lease, viz., 'and the said lessees bind themselves to work the said minerals and others by the longwall system only, or other complete system of excavation, and that in a regular, proper, and systematic manner, according to the best practice, and to keep the whole mines and workings at all times in good order and repair, and to keep secure, upred, and patent all levels, roads, wall-faces, rooms, and air-courses of going pits, or inclined planes, so far as may be necessary for the proper working thereof, and to leave the going pits and works, and the levels and air-courses, and rooms and wall-faces of the going pits, at the natural expiry, or sooner termination, partial or total of this lease, in good order and condition, and without any accumulation of water in the rise workings, and generally in such condition as shall enable the landlord, or incoming tenant, advantageously to pursue, and carry on the same, or other workings therefrom, of the minerals in his lands.' On the contrary, they have worked out the easiest got portions of the field by the pits Nos. 1 and 2, taken out the pillars, partially dismantled the pits, let the water rise to its natural level, and left the workings inaccessible, without open roads or air-courses, to any wall-faces. They have also left about six acres of coal lying in a shallow trough between the pits unwatered, and have not left the workings 'in such condition as shall enable the landlord, or incoming tenant, advantageously to pursue and carry on the same, or other workings therefrom, of the minerals in his lands,' when the state of the market permits of the coal being wrought to profit, which I consider to be all-important, as by no exertion on the part of the tenants, or an incoming tenant, could the works be restored, or got ready to produce

"P.S.—I wish to explain that by nothing in the joint report did I intend to express or to indicate an opinion as to the legal construction of the words 'owing to no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the tenants,' or any other question of legal construction of the lease, all which questions I consider to belong to, and to be left for, the decision of the Court.

Following on this report, which was issued by the arbiters as applicable both to the lease and sublease, La Cour, Watson, & Simpson, on 26th October 1880, raised an action of declarator against the Shotts Iron Company concluding to have it "found and declared, by the Lords of our Council and Session, that the gas-coal let by the trustees of the Shotts Iron Company, unincorporated, to the pursuers, by lease betwixt the said trustees and the pursuers, dated 10th and 26th August and 22d and 23d September 1870, from no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the pursuers, has become not worth the expense of working, and that the said lease shall come to an end at the term of Martinmas 1880, or at such other date as shall be fixed by our said Lords in the course of the process to follow hereon, without prejudice to the subsistence and effect of said lease to every effect in so far as thus not legally terminated."

Thereupon, on 2d November 1880, the Shotts Iron Company raised the present action with precisely similar conclusions as those quoted above against Sir George Deas.

Records were made up and closed in both actions, the Shotts Company in their answers to the action brought against them by La Cour, Watson, & Simpson, repeating, mutatis mutandis, the pleas and averments advanced by Sir George Deas in the action at their instance against him.

Cond. 6 of the action raised by the Shotts Iron Company was in the following terms:—"The pursuers, soon after their term of entry, proceeded to explore the field, and expended a considerable amount of capital in doing so, by sinking pits and otherwise. Thereafter by sublease, dated 10th and 25th August and 22d and 23d September 1870, they sublet a considerable portion of the field to Messrs La Cour, Watson, & Simpson, coal-masters and coal-exporters in Leith, which sublease contained the same clauses in every respect (except that the royalties stipulated for were slightly higher) as those contained in the lease foresaid between the pursuers and defender, and soon after Messrs La Cour, Watson, & Simpson's entry to said field they expended capital to the extent of £5607, 7s. 3d. in acquiring and erecting machinery, sinking shafts, and providing plant for working the said coal-field. In the course of a few years they found the seam of coal become thinner, while the cost of working had increased, and the coal, from its inferior quality, had become unsaleable. The said gas coal, from no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the said subtenants or of the pursuers, had become and continues to be not worth the expense of working, and on or about 9th May 1879 the said subtenants gave intimation to the pursuers, in terms similar to the intimation thereafter given by the pursuers to the defender." The pursuers further set forth the proceedings before the arbiters.

In his answer to this condescendence the defender denied all knowledge of the negotiation for a sublease or of the alleged expenditure in working the minerals. He further explained that the quality of the coal was known to the pursuers from the first, and had never varied.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) It having been judicially found, upon a report by arbiters nominated in manner provided in said lease, that the gas coal let to the pursuers by said lease has become not worth the expense of working, the said lease is thereby terminated as at the term of Martinmas 1880, and the pursuers are entitled to declarator as concluded for. (2) Or otherwise, the pursuers are, in respect of the terms of the report of the said arbiters, entitled to have it judicially found that the said coal, from no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the pursuers, has become not worth the expense of working, and to obtain decree of declarator as concluded for.

Shotts Iron
Co. v. Deas.

The defender pleaded;—(1) According to a sound construction of the lease in question it is not contracted that a fall of market prices shall in any way affect the endurance of the lease, and the defender is therefore entitled to obtain a finding to that effect, and to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action. (2) Even assuming that a fall in market prices might in some circumstances affect or limit the endurance of the lease, it could not be held to do so where the arbiters have not affirmed the fall, except at the particular date of the pursuer's notice, and there is nothing to shew that the fall will continue throughout the future years of the lease. (3) The pursuers not having obtained, and not being entitled to obtain, a judicial finding terminating the lease, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

(The defender's pleas were, as already stated, adopted by the Shotts Iron Company in the action against them at the instance of La Cour, Watson, and Simpson.)

On 16th December 1880 the Lord Ordinary, having heard counsel, issued the following interlocutor in the case against Sir George Deas:—“Finds, declares, and decerns in terms of the libel, to the effect that the lease libelled terminated at Martinmas 1880: Finds the defender liable in expenses: Allows an account thereof to be lodged, and remits the same to the Auditor to tax, and report.” *

* “NOTE.—The chief question in this case is, whether the pursuers are entitled to put an end to the lease on the ground that the coal has become unworkable to profit, or whether it is necessary, in order to the exercise of this right, that there should be some change in the condition of the coal, either as regards quantity, quality, or accessibility, so that thereby it ‘has become not worth the expense of working.’ In either form of the question it is assumed that there has been ‘no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the lessees.’

“The Lord Ordinary is disposed to think that the pursuers are in the right, and that the clause was inserted in the lease in order to enable them to free themselves from the obligations of the lease, when the coal had, from any cause not due to their fault, become unworkable to profit. It appears to him that the question whether the ‘coal is worth the expense of working’ cannot be dissociated from any of the considerations which would determine any ordinary judgment in continuing or abstaining from working it. The expense of working necessarily introduces elements beyond the mere condition of the coal itself. In the sense of a commercial contract, nothing, it is thought, can be worth the expense of working which yields no profit, whether the absence of profit is due to the fall in value of the article or to the actual expense of working it.

“It is said that this construction of the lease gives the tenant the whole benefit of high prices, and throws on the landlord all the loss resulting from low prices. This is not true. The landlord gets the advantage of a prosperous time through the royalties which are stipulated for. On the other hand, when no profit is to be made, the landlord retains his minerals, which by a change in the market may become valuable, and the tenant merely avoids a loss in circumstances when it would be absurd to work them.

“Farther it was urged that the arbiters merely find that the coal was not

1st. As to the effect of a fall of prices.—In a mineral lease the landlord was understood to warrant the existence of the mineral and its being physically workable. The risk of market prices was in all cases presumed to be upon the tenant. If this risk was intended in the present case to be laid upon the landlord a stipulation so unusual would have required to be expressed in the most distinct and unmistakable language. The onus of so expressing it lay on the party who was to claim benefit from it. The construction of the words used in the clause under consideration was not a question for the arbiters any more than the analogous question in Dixon v. Campbell (2 S. App. 177), where, although the arbiters had found the coal was “incapable of being wrought to advantage,” the Court and the House of Lords found the reverse. In the present case the import of the clause had been under the notice of the arbiters, but they rightly refrained from giving or expressing an opinion upon it. It was left for the Court to determine what the legal construction of this clause was.

2d. Under a lease and sublease, each binding the lessees absolutely for twenty-nine years, and having still seventeen years to run, could it be held that such a period of depression as had been affirmed by the arbiters entitled a tenant or subtenant who had realised large profits to be forthwith free from his lease? Past profits fell to be taken into view whatever be the ground upon which a mineral tenant attempted to get rid of his lease—whether it be obstructions in the mine, short of absolute sterility, or coupled with a fall of prices and increased expense of working, or whatever else it might be—Lord Reston’s opinion in Dixon v. Campbell. In their joint report in the present case the arbiters said they had arrived at their conclusion with reference “solely to the state of the market for gas coal at the time the tenants gave notice to the landlord of their intention to terminate the lease.” In Dixon’s case the fixed rent was £900 a-year, and apparently the coal during several years of the lease, which was only for nineteen years in all, had not been wrought to advantage. Still, because it might be so in future, it was ultimately held that the lessees could not abandon. It was the duty of the arbiters in the present case to have instituted a comparison between profits and fixed rents, past and prospective, without which neither they nor the Court had the requisite data for considering the effect which ought to be attributed to the alleged depression, and still less for holding it conclusive. Words similar to those of the House of Lords’ judgment in Dixon’s case might not be inappropriate to the present case, viz., to find that in hoc statu it is not in the power of the tenants and subtenants to give up the lease and sublease.

Argued for the Shotts Iron Company ;—The words of the clause in the lease were too comprehensive to admit of being affected by any worth the expense of working at the time when the pursuers gave notice of their intention to terminate the lease, and that this finding may be referred to a state of the market which might be of short duration, and which had already passed away. But, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, it is not the fair meaning of the award. He thinks that it must be read as referring to a state of the market of indefinite—not of temporary or even measurable—duration. This is the only sense in which men of intelligence could address themselves to the question which they had to decide. It is worth notice that the defender does not aver that even now there has been a change, or even an indication of change, in the condition of the market.”

* * In the case against the Shotts Company, at the instance of La Cour, Watson, and Simpson, his Lordship issued a similar interlocutor, and referred to the above note as giving his grounds of judgment.

of the views urged for the landlord. They applied to all causes, whether in the state of the mine or the state of the markets, which could not be attributed to fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the lessees. As to the length of the period of depression, it must be presumed that the arbiters were of opinion that it could not be held as merely temporary, otherwise they would have said so. And as to the argument founded on past profits the subtenants were entitled to these in consideration of capital expended and the risk they ran in a precarious trade.

Shotts Iron
Co. v. Deas.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have considered this reclaiming note with attention and anxiety, and I have found the question not unattended with difficulty. It embraces some legal principles of importance to the extensive branch of commerce to which it relates. I need not recapitulate the facts—indeed there are no facts which would require recapitulation. The whole question lies in two points—first, the construction of the disputed clause in the mineral lease before us, and second, the proceedings of the arbiters.

The mineral lease between Sir George Deas as proprietor, and the Shotts Iron Company as tenants of the mineral field embraced in it, commenced in 1867, and was intended to have a currency of twenty-nine years, terminating therefore in 1896. The fixed rent stipulated was £300 a-year, and certain royalties or lordships were also contracted for. There is nothing peculiar or distinctive in the general provisions of this lease. It was certainly intended to be of long duration, and the defined term could only be interrupted by the clause on the interpretation of which this question turns. That clause is in the following terms:—“And if at any time during this lease, inclusive of the said first period of five years” (a period referred to in the immediately preceding clause, and to which no importance can be attached), “it shall be judicially found, upon a report by an arbiter or arbiters nominated in the manner hereinafter provided for, that the said gas coal, from no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the said lessees, has become not worth the expense of working, this lease shall come to an end at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after it shall be so found, without prejudice to the subsistence and effect of this lease to every effect in so far as not thus legally terminated.” It is maintained on the part of Sir George Deas that this clause was intended to provide only against one contingency, viz, the deterioration of the mineral field itself, which was the only subject of the lease, and that either by a change in the quality of the mineral which could be extracted from it by proper and skilful working, or by unknown and unforeseen obstructions in the course of its excavation. On the other hand, it is contended that the provision is quite general, and that its terms are unambiguous, and that its true as well as its popular meaning is, that if from any cause not attributable to the tenants themselves the mineral fields should prove not worth to the tenants the cost of working, taking one year with another, they should be at liberty to terminate the contract. I cannot say that I can cast the balance between these two constructions without hesitation. It is said by the landlord that his contention is supported first by the phraseology of the clause, second, by the substance of the remedy which it provides, and, generally, by the legal character or nature of the right conferred by it and the evil intended to be remedied. The words, it is said, refer only to the mineral itself. The clause is to take effect when the gas coal becomes not worth the cost of working. That denotes, it is said, as a condition preliminary to the provision coming into operation, some change for the worse on the mineral itself or in the mineral field let, and is not consistent with a state of things in which the coal might be of better quality or the workings easier than they ever were. It is further contended that the provision that this result must proceed from some cause other than a fault on the part of the tenants indicates that the contemplated failure must be such as might arise from such a cause. Lastly, it is said—and this is by much the most weighty consideration in the case on that side of the question—that the true object of the clause was to apply to this mineral lease the principle of sterility which obtains in agricultural leases, and to introduce into this bargain the equitable doctrine which was found in the case of *Baird*¹ to have no place at common law in a mineral lease. It is argued that while the landlord may be fairly held to guarantee that the subject of the lease is worth the cost year by year of cultivation so far as its productive power and quality are concerned, it is out of the question to hold him responsible for fluctuation or depreciations in the market which depend on elements and contingencies which no one can foresee or control. I have stated these views as they were argued to us, and as they occur to myself, because I think the views deserving of respect, and I am not inclined to treat them lightly. That these considerations may have occurred to the landlord in executing this lease is certainly not excluded by its terms. Nevertheless its scope, in my opinion, is too wide and its tenor too general to be so limited. It seems to me to provide, in language sufficiently precise and intelligible, for a condition of things in which it would not be reasonable to hold the tenant bound. That the tenant should be compelled year after year to expend his capital in fruitless labour, to a period which is almost co-extensive with the century, is a result not reasonable, nor is it unfair that the landlord should, on such an event occurring, simply resume his property, with power to turn it to any advantage which its nature or the times will permit. In regard to the structure of this clause, while the criticism on the phraseology has some grammatical force, I would remark that if it had been intended that it should only take effect when the result contemplated arose from certain specific causes, it would have been easy, and, as I think, necessary, so to have expressed it. What the gas coal was worth could only be ascertained from knowing what it would bring in the market, and the moment its worth was introduced as the test on the occurrence of which the clause was intended to operate the state of the market would be an essential feature. The causes which might lead to depreciation are innumerable, external and internal, and it would have required stipulations much more precise to have excluded this inference from the words employed. In regard to the analogy derived from the principle of sterility in agricultural leases, I should not have been surprised, after our judgment in the case of Baird, to have found a corresponding clause in such a case as this; and although the terms are materially different, the argument on this head did derive some support from the case of Dixon v. Campbell which was referred to in the debate. I may, however, remark that that case itself did not involve any general principle which it would be altogether easy or safe to follow. But from the views expressed in that case I think it was all the more desirable that the words employed in this clause, if that was the real contemplation of the parties, should directly have expressed their intention. I am therefore constrained to read this clause according to its more apparent meaning, and the only other question is, whether the event contemplated has been found by the arbiters to have occurred. No. 101.

In regard to the award of the arbiters, I certainly cannot say that it is a very favourable specimen of its class. It contains some things that are perfectly clear, and other things which are exceedingly obscure—at least I have been totally unable to comprehend the note which Mr Landale, after signing the award, has added to the opinion which he there expressed. I can neither understand its terms nor its object. But when I come to the award itself it is perfectly precise in the only matter that is of the slightest consequence. The question was, whether the gas coal let by the lease had become not worth the expense of working, and the arbiters find that the gas coal has become, and had become at the date which they fixed, not worth the expense of working, from which it necessarily follows that the lease comes to an end. It is quite true that the arbiters also say that they proceeded exclusively upon the market rate. Of course if the effect or result was produced solely and entirely by the fact that a commodity of that description no longer brought a price which would make it worth the expense of working, there was no alternative in arriving at that result but to go exclusively upon the market rate. But if I am right in my construction of the clause, that was exactly the proceeding which the arbiters were bound to follow. They have found that the gas coal is not worth the expense of working. The mode in which they arrived at that result is not essential, provided they were entitled to arrive at it on these grounds. They have explained that they arrived at it thus—the price or the worth of the gas coal, which must necessarily depend on the market price, had gone down to a degree which made it wholly unremunerative. It is said—and that part of the award I am not altogether satisfied with—that the arbiters should have told us how they arrived at the market rate, and whether they proceeded only on the present or on the prospective rate which was likely to rule the market one year with another. The Lord Ordinary has held, however—and I entirely concur with him—that the only meaning of the expression used by the arbiters must be presumed to be, not that the market rate on the particular day would have made the coal not worth working, but that, taking one year with another, the prospects of the market as well as its existing condition enabled them to say that permanently, and in a chronic sense, this gas coal is not now worth the expense of working. They necessarily were obliged to consider the market rate in any view of the meaning of the clause, and I therefore assume that the arbiters in the explanation which they give are referring to their practical knowledge as applied to the existing and past and probable rates to enable them to arrive at the only result submitted to them, viz., whether the gas coal was worth the expense of working. And therefore I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be adhered to, and of course the same result will follow in the corresponding reclaiming note for the Shotts Company.

Shotts Iron
Co. v. Deas.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and, I confess, without any doubt or difficulty. The only question, as your Lordship has pointed out, is, whether or not the arbiters have misapprehended the meaning of the clause in the lease which your Lordship has read. If they have not, then their report to us is conclusive, for they report in terms that, “from no fault, negligence, or irregularity on the part of the tenants, the Shotts Iron Company, the gas coal let to them by the lease has become not worth the expense of working.” But it is said that the arbiters have misapprehended the true meaning of the clause in the lease with reference to which they were to report; and the misapprehension alleged, as your Lordship has pointed out, is, that whereas according to the true meaning of the clause (as the landlord maintains) the result of becoming not worth the expense of working thereby provided for must be brought about by some change in the mineral field—exhaustion of the coal, or the occurrence of troubles which render it impossible to work it, or less easy to work it,—the arbiters have, misunderstanding the true meaning and import of the clause, thought that the same consequence under the clause would follow if the result of becoming not worth the expense of working was brought about by a fall in the market, the worth of the article when wrought and produced not being equal to the expense of working and producing it. If the latter view of the true meaning of the clause, which it sufficiently appears from the report was the view taken by the arbiters, be the right one, then the defender has no case, and I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that it is the right one. The clause in question was introduced for the protection of the tenant. It is in his favour and for his protection. Protection against what? Against its turning out at any time that the mineral of which he had a long lease was not worth working. He wanted to be protected against that possible future event—that he should not in that case be saddled with a lease under which he should have to pay, not lordship, because he would not work the mineral that was not worth the cost of working, but a fixed rent of £300 a-year. He desired to be protected in that possible event against paying £300 a-year for nothing. But if that event, for his protection against which the clause was introduced, occurred—that he could take nothing by his lease, because the mineral which was the subject of it was not worth the expense of working it—what could it signify to the interest which he desired to be protected how that result was brought about? The suggestion that the tenant requires protection if it is brought about from a change occurring in the mineral field, but does not require it if it is brought about in any other way, as, for example, from a rise in the cost of labour or a fall in the market price, is a suggestion which I do not understand. There is no fault in any case. It is no fault of the landlord or the tenant that a change occurs in the mineral field. It is no fault of the landlord or the tenant that the price of labour rises, or that the market price of coal falls, or that it ceases to be marketable altogether. But the protection which the tenant desired was against the possible event of his mineral lease becoming of no worth to him—that he should not in that event have to pay the landlord £300 a-year. A change in the coal will not per se bring about the result without reference to something else. There are two things given to you—the one is worth, that is, worth of the article when produced, and the worth of the article when produced is just its value in the market, and the other is the cost of working it. If the latter does not exceed the former, then the thing is worth the cost of working, and otherwise not. You must have the two things before you and compare them, and see whether the one equals or exceeds the other, and which is in excess of the other, before you can answer the question whether the mineral is worth the expense of working or not. If you ask anybody, “Is that mineral field worth the expense of working it?” he would say, “I must know the price of coal in the market, and I must know the cost of producing it in this field.” Without knowing these two things he could not answer you. And I take leave to say that a change in one respect may counteract a change, or the effect of a change, in another. For if the coal had become greatly exhausted, or troubles had occurred in the mineral field, the effect of that might be counteracted by a fall in the cost of labour or a rise in the market price of the article. A change in the mineral field which without any change in the price of labour or the market price of the article would lead to the result provided against by this clause may be entirely counteracted by diminished price of labour or increased market price of coal. Again, a fall in the market price of coal which per se would lead to the result that this mineral field was not worth working might be effectually counteracted by a fall in the price of labour, or by the coal in the field becoming more abundant, affording a richer and more easily worked seam. In short, you must take account of all those things, and the prudent tenant, considering whether the mineral is worth working or not, has to take all these things into account, and if, taking them into account, he comes to the conclusion that it is not worth the expense of working, he comes to a conclusion which, in his opinion at least, would bring him within the operation of this clause, and will do so if his conclusion be well founded. But the landlord very properly protects himself against the tenant hastily and upon insufficient grounds coming to that conclusion, for he requires that it shall be supported by the report of arbiters.

We were told that the tenant gave up working the field some five or six years ago, because in the state of the market it was not worth working. But the market might have come round, and then the case entitling him to relief, or inducing him to desire relief, would have ceased to exist. But at last he desires a report of the arbiters, and they report that he is right—that the mineral is really not worth the cost of working; there is plenty of it, and physically there is no difficulty in working, but it is not worth the cost, because when worked it would not produce a price which would cover the cost. Well, the arbiters report upon that, and is not that the very case in reason and in common sense which is provided for by the clause. To say to the tenant—It is quite true the coal is not worth the expense of working, it would be foolish to work it, for you would be laying out more money than you would get when you produced it, and so you must leave it unworked, but this clause is not meant to protect you in that case—is a proposition which I cannot assent to. I think it is against law, and frustrates the object which both parties had in view in agreeing to the clause. I have, therefore, no hesitation in concurring in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. I assume that without the clause in question the tenants would have been held to the lease for better or worse, and so must have paid the rent while it endured, although they had and could have no return for it. But the clause, as I construe it, is a very reasonable bargain with reference to the legitimate interests of both parties, for it only stipulates that the lease shall end when ascertained, by arbiters mutually chosen, to be worthless—not momentarily, or only for a season, the end of which can be reasonably foreseen, but indefinitely, that is, for a period which has endured for a long while, and the end of which cannot be foreseen; for I assume with the Lord Ordinary that no arbiter would terminate the lease upon a merely temporary depression of the market. It was not formally established, but nevertheless it was admitted at the bar, that the mineral was not worth the cost of working, and was not in fact worked for several years before the arbiters were appealed to.

LORD LEK.—I have come to the same conclusion, but I desire humbly to confess that I have felt the same difficulty with your Lordship in the chair. Your Lordships are asked by this summons to find and declare that from no fault on the part of the tenants or their workings this gas coal has become not worth the expense of working, and your Lordships are, upon that ground, asked to find and declare that, at a date to be fixed by the Court, this lease came to an end. The action at the instance of the Shotts Iron Company (the principal tenants) is substantially a defence against the action raised by La Cour & Watson, to whom they granted a sublease containing a clause in the same terms as that referred to by your Lordships; and the defence stated by Sir George Deas to the action at the instance of the Shotts Iron Company appears to be in substance identical with the defence stated by the Shotts Iron Company to the original action. The pleas stated upon the construction of the lease are the same. It is necessary, however, the question having been raised, to construe the clause according to its legal import, and it is not possible to put a different construction upon it as between the parties to the original lease from that which it bears in the sublease to La Cour & Watson. Now, the question raised depends on the terms of the report which has been obtained from the arbiters, and the question is whether, upon that report, the Court can judicially find in terms of the conclusions of the summons. Two points have been raised by the reclaimer upon the terms of that report. A third point was raised in argument, which I think has not yet been adverted to, about the date which should be fixed, but that is a subordinate matter. The two points which were argued were, in the first place, that the state of the market by itself cannot justify a finding that the coal has become, within the meaning of this lease, not worth the expense of working; and the second point was, that in any view the state of the market at the time the tenants gave notice is not sufficient to support such a finding with reference to a lease for twenty-nine years from Whitsunday 1867. Now, on the first point, my opinion is that the worth of coal in a particular field necessarily depends on the state of the market, because it depends on the market in that neighbourhood whether that coal can be brought into use at such a cost as will pay working expenses. I think this is illustrated by supposing that at the time when the lease was entered into there had been no coal of that kind in the district which could be supplied without working a mine of equal depth and difficulty, and that subsequently a similar coal of equal quality had been discovered near the surface of the ground and in the same locality. In that case it is obvious that the coal in the lease must become and be not worth the expense of working so long as the more accessible coal should last, and that if there is enough of that coal this state of matters must endure for the remainder of the lease. Thus, without any change on the subject of the lease or in the expense of working, and simply by reason of the outside circumstance of other coal being attainable, and capable of being brought into the market without the trouble and expense of working such a mine as was required here, the coal in the lease ceases to be worth the expense of working. I think that all contingencies affecting the value of coal in the district must be held to have been in view of the parties to this lease, and that, therefore, it must have been contemplated as possible that the coal might come to be not worth the expense of working, although everything in the way of proper working has been done, and no change has taken place except in the state of the market. I agree, therefore, with the Lord Ordinary on this point.

On the question whether the report sufficiently shews that the coal had become not worth the expense of working, I assent to the proposition contended for by the reclaimer, that the fact to be ascertained is not merely the worth of the coal with reference to the state of the market at a particular time, but that it is absolutely, so far as this lease is concerned, not worth the expense of working. But although I agree with the view which your Lordship has expressed upon the ambiguous and even apparently contradictory character of the report in some parts of it, I think the reporters in referring to the date at which the tenants gave notice cannot be held to have qualified the absolute terms of their report as made in the previous paragraph. They appear to have thought it necessary to fix some time at which to bring their calculation to a point; but it is not consistent with a fair construction of their report, in my view, to hold that they did not take into consideration, in arriving at the conclusion as at that date, the whole circumstances of the lease, including the length of it. I do not think that they could have reported as they have done in the second last paragraph of their joint report if they had confined their attention to a particular month or year. I concur, therefore, on both points, and I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed. In my view, the case of Dixon v. Campbell is really not applicable here at all. I have examined that case with some care, and it appears to me that the clause in the lease and the report which was before the Court in that case were both different. The terms of the lease related to unforeseen accidents, occurrences, dykes, or troubles not occasioned by irregular or improper working. These expressions were construed as having reference to something within the mine, and as requiring that the Court should be able to find that from some cause arising within the mine, or at least partly from some cause arising within the mine, the coal in question had ceased to be capable of being worked to advantage. That ground does not apply here, for the lease is different. It does not refer to anything of that kind, but is quite general in its terms. Further, the view on which the case was decided was that the report shewed only a temporary fluctuation in the market, and did not shew a permanent change. In both of these respects, therefore, the case of Dixon v. Campbell is clearly distinguishable from the present.

With reference to the date which should be fixed by the Court as that at which this lease should be declared to be at an end, I do not see that there is any occasion to alter the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

THE COURT adhered.

JOHN CAMPBELL AND ANOTHER (Rankine's Tutors-Nominate), Petitioners. No. 102.
—Kirkpatrick.

Nobile Officium—Minor and Pupil—Tutors and Curators—Authority to accept reconveyance of feu where feuar unable to pay feu-duty.—In circumstances creating a case of high expediency amounting in law to necessity the Court authorised tutors-nominate to accept a re-conveyance of subjects which had been feued out by the father of the ward.

(Vide ante, vol. vii., p. 1032, under date June 26, 1880.)

By feu-disposition, dated 4th April 1876, William Macbean Rankine of Dudhope disposed to David Bremner certain areas of ground upon the Dudhope estate, extending to 4 acres 3 roods and 24½ poles, at a cumulo feu-duty of £313, 16s. The disponee was taken bound to erect buildings of the value of £6000, at least, upon the ground, within four years from the date of the disposition. The disponee proceeded to erect dwelling-houses upon the ground so feued, and, under a power of allocation in the deed, the feu-duty payable for the houses so built, which had been sold or were heavily bonded, amounted to £174, 15s., thus leaving £139, 1s. unsecured.

At Mr Rankine's death, on 28th October 1879, large arrears of feu-duty were due to him, and the tutors-nominate to Mr Rankine's heir craved in this petition to be allowed to discharge the disponee's obligations under his feu-disposition to the extent of £139, 1s., upon payment of arrears to Martinmas 1879, and upon their getting a reconveyance of the ground, extending to 347 poles 19 yards, which had not been built upon.

The petition set forth that in consequence of the great depression in the trade of Dundee the building trade had suffered likewise, and that there was no prospect of laying out money to advantage in the erection of houses on the ground feued; further, that the feuar felt unable to pay the annual feu-duty for which he was still liable, and was unable to give any security for the future payment of the feu-duty for the ground still unbuilt on. It was further stated that the feuar had found security to pay the arrears of feu-duty; that the petitioners were satisfied that he could not pay the annual feu-duty for the portion of ground which he wished to reconvey; and that it would be for the benefit of the estate that such reconveyance should be accepted.

The First Division of the Court, upon 19th March 1880, remitted the petition to the Junior Lord Ordinary to inquire, and report. Mr A. F. Adam, W.S., was appointed curator ad litem to the two pupil children other than the heir.

The Junior Lord Ordinary (Adam), on the petition coming before him, remitted it to Mr Patrick Adam, S.S.C., to "inquire into the circumstances set forth in the petition, and to report."

Mr Patrick Adam reported that, as the First Division had already authorised the petitioners to grant feu-rights in their administration of Dudhope (ante, vol. vii., p. 1032), and as the petitioners were satisfied that the feuar could not implement his obligations for the reasons stated, he was of opinion "that it would be for the benefit and advantage of the estate if the petitioners were authorised to accept of the reconveyance offered."

The Junior Lord Ordinary (Lee), upon 13th July 1880, pronounced an interlocutor reporting the proceedings to the First Division,* who, on 17th

* "NOTE.— . . . It appears to the Lord Ordinary that it would have been desirable, if possible, to obtain, before reporting upon the application, more distinct evidence that loss must be caused to the estate if the application be not granted. The petitioners, however, desire a judgment on the matter as it stands; and, as tutors-nominate, the Lord Ordinary thinks they are entitled to have the case reported for the purpose of enabling them to ask a judgment.

"Notwithstanding the doubts which have been expressed as to the competency of authorising tutors-nominate to exercise such powers, the Lord Ordinary thinks that it may be taken as now settled that there is no incompetency if a case of necessity be made out. The cases of Mackenzie, January 27, 1855, 17 D. 314, Morison, July 19, 1861, 23 D. 1313 (previously reported under date February 20, 1857), and Turner, March 1, 1862, 24 D. 694, are illustrations of such powers being granted to tutors-nominate; and a tutor-at-law was authorised to accept a renunciation of a lease in the case of Brown, December 11, 1846, 9 D. 250. In the case of Berwick, November 13, 1874 (2 R. 90), the Court, while refusing as incompetent an application by trustees for power to accept a renunciation, indicated an opinion that in the case of tutors-nominate such powers might have been granted.

"It is only, however, on the ground of necessity that the Lord Ordinary July 1880, remitted back to his Lordship to direct further inquiry, and No. 102. to report.

Under a second remit, Mr Adam reported that the feuar was a builder in large business in Dundee, and owned house property to the value of £16,288, burdened to the extent of £15,763, and that he was at present engaged in two large building contracts. He referred to a letter from his agent,* and concluded by saying that, with reference to that letter, "and to the fact that it might be the petitioners' duty to take proceedings against the feuar for recovering the arrears and future feu-duties, it would seem to merit consideration whether, in order to avoid a crisis in his affairs, and probable loss to the pupil's estate, it might not be expedient to grant the prayer of the petition." Feb. 26, 1881.
Campbell.

The Lord Ordinary (Lee), on 15th January 1881, of new reported the proceedings to the First Division, adding in a note that he could not report that "any necessity for the intervention of the Court had been established."

After a hearing, on 19th February 1881, the Court allowed the petitioners to state in a minute "whether there is any immediate prospect of refueing the ground in question at a lower rate of feu-duty than that stipulated in the feu granted to the present feuar, and if so, at what reduction of rate; and to furnish the Court with such evidence as may be possible of the probability of so disposing of the ground."

The petitioners accordingly obtained a certificate by Messrs Salmond, land-valuator, and Alexander, architect for the burgh of Dundee, to the effect that a feu-duty of 8s. per pole, or £64 per acre, "is an excessive rate in present state of the building trade, and that such a rate is unlikely again to be obtained, at least for a very considerable time: And we are further of opinion that if under the authority of the Court, the tutors and curators nominated by the late Mr Rankine are authorised to receive a reconveyance of this ground from the feuar, they will in all probability be able, between this and the term of Martinmas next, if the ground in question is properly advertised, to get the whole or a portion of it feued off at the rate of from 4s. to 5s. per pole, and that offerers would probably have presented themselves ere this had the ground been in the market at the above rate."

Two letters were also produced, one offering at the rate of 4s. 6d. per understands such applications can be entertained. If no necessity for the interposition of the Court can be shewn the tutors-nominate will be left to act on their own responsibility. In the present case Mr Adam reports that 'it would be for the benefit and advantage of the estate if the petitioners were authorised to accept of the reconveyance offered by the feuar.' He also reports that 'the petitioners are satisfied that he is not in a position to be able to pay the annual feu-duty of the portion of ground he now wishes to reconvey to them.' The question is whether this is enough to enable the Court to grant the powers craved."

* The letter bore, inter alia,—"Unfortunately, property in this locality is, and has been for a very long period, practically unsaleable. The incoming sums barely meet the outgoing amounts. Were the feuar to abandon the management, which is his only alternative if the unproductive ground, bearing 8s. per pole, is to remain a burden, I am satisfied that a sale of the properties would, irrespective of the costs, entail a heavy loss on the bondholders, more especially on Mr Rankine's tutors, under their postponed security for the past-due feu-duty; and should the bondholders, under an action of mails and duties, enter on possession, judicial management implies heavy costs, and if both ends met, it would be with difficulty."

LORD PRESIDENT.—This is a case of a very unusual kind, and is attended with a good deal of difficulty in point of principle. The Court have not been in the habit of granting extraordinary powers to tutors in the administration of the estates of their ward on the mere ground of expediency, or from a consideration that the exercise of the powers sought for will enhance the value of the estate, or be of advantage to it. These are not sufficient grounds. But, on the other hand, the expediency of a certain course of management may be so high as to amount to what the Court holds to be necessity. The question is whether this is a case of that nature, and whether there are circumstances which justify us in holding that there is a necessity entitling us to deal with the subjects as is proposed.

It is pretty clear that the feuar is not in a condition to fulfil his obligations as feuar. So far from that being the case, it is obvious that he will not and cannot do anything in the way of building on this ground. His own circumstances are such as to preclude any such prospect. That of itself undoubtedly creates a great difficulty in dealing with this ground. It is now totally unproductive, and if it remains in the present feuar's hands it will remain unproductive for an indefinite time. There is a possibility that his circumstances may improve, and there is also a chance that the value of such ground will rise. The prospect of an improvement in the feuar's circumstances is not very rose-coloured, and as regards the value of the ground the estate need not lose if the tutors are authorised to accept the reconveyance, because it does not necessarily follow that the ground is to be feued out at a much lower rate than that for which they have stipulated with the present feuar. The tutors will retain it in their own hands if there is a rise or a prospect of a rise in the value of building ground in Dundee. The acceptance of the reconveyance may possibly not expose the estate to any immediate loss if offers can be got from other quarters of nearly the same amount as the present feu-duty. If there is no prospect within a reasonable period it will be for the consideration of the tutors whether they ought not to accept a lower value; and on this point it is not to be thrown out of view that the Court have already authorised the tutors to feu other portions of this estate at a much lower rate.

The only other question is whether it is necessary to hold the feuar to his agreement without any prospect of getting anything from it, or whether we may empower the tutors to take it back and submit to the probability of a depreciation in the amount of feu-duty they will realise from it. The position of the estate is not so embarrassed that in order to extricate it from its difficulties there is any necessity in the sense of a very high expediency that we should grant the prayer of this petition. But I am disposed to think, though not without a great deal of difficulty, that we should grant the powers asked, reserving to the tutors their right to bye-gone feu-duties, and leaving it to them to sue for damages owing to the feuar's breach of contract.

LORD MURE.—I have come to the same conclusion. The Court grant such powers as are here asked only when the expediency of doing so is so great as to amount substantially to a necessity. Now, the feu-duty is irrecoverable at present, and there is no prospect of its ever being recovered, for the feuar cannot fulfil his obligations, and there is evidence to shew that his affairs are in such a state that, if he is pushed for payment, the necessary result will be bankruptcy. The state of the building trade, moreover, in Dundee at present is such that the rate of feu-duty payable under Mr Bremner's contract cannot be got; for we know that the petitioners have been forced to feu portions of the adjoining ground at a lower rate, and that there is little immediate prospect that the rate of feu-duty will rise. In the whole circumstances, therefore, I agree in thinking that there is here a case of such extreme expediency as amounts substantially to a necessity for authorising the petitioners to take the feu off Mr Bremner's hands, and that this entitles us to grant the prayer of the petition.

No. 102.

Campbell.

LORD SHAND.—The state of the ground in question is that it is entirely unbuilt upon. There is no security for the payment of the feu-duty. Mr Bremner has become liable in past feu-duties which he is unable to pay, and the tutors who now make this application have been compelled to enter into a transaction in regard to the arrears, but all that they have been able to get is a fifth bond over certain properties in Dundee, which are probably not able to meet the debt. Since 1879, when this transaction was entered into, the same thing has gone on just as before. Mr Bremner professes himself unable to meet his liabilities, and I am quite satisfied that this is the fact. If the tutors are left in this position there must be a continuing loss to the estate. The feu-duties will remain unpaid. It is true that the tutors may make Mr Bremner bankrupt, which will involve them in questions with the trustee, or they may wait and bring an action of irritancy of the feu ob non solutum canonem, but they would thereby lose the chance of recovering the feu-duties. It appears to me therefore that it would be highly expedient to grant this petition. Certain loss to the estate will thereby be averted. The Court has the power and ought to grant it to the extent of allowing the petitioners to accept a reconveyance, and to feu out the ground again at such rates as they can obtain.

LORD DEAS.—I have read the papers in this case with great attention, and it appears to me that the application is attended with difficulty. What your Lordships propose to sanction seems to me to be rather a case of strong expediency than one of necessity. The principle of all the authorities is that nothing will justify the Court in sanctioning an alienation of a pupil's heritage except necessity, and that is so far founded on good reasons. The pupil is incapable of having any say in the matter, and, long before he comes of age, circumstances may have been so changed that it may be for his advantage that the property should have remained in the state in which his guardians found it. So much is this the case that powers of this kind have been granted, based upon strong expediency, which have been subsequently found not to be binding on the pupil when he came of age. We have had strong instances of that. It is therefore a very serious thing to assume that to be necessity which is nothing more than strong expediency. It would be very unsafe therefore, to my mind, to admit any relaxation of a principle upon which the Court has immemorially proceeded. At the same time, your Lordship has pointed out, what is an important distinction, that it is not proposed to feu this ground at a lower rate

No. 102. than 8s. per pole, the sum payable by Mr Bremner, but merely to cancel the existing feu-right, because there is no reasonable prospect of getting it fulfilled. It would have been a very strong thing to sanction the acceptance of a lower feu-duty. But the tutors will be under no obligation to grant a new feu-right until and unless they can obtain the former feu-duty. The existing bargain is simply to be cancelled because of the impossibility of getting it implemented. It is that consideration only which reconciles me to your Lordships' proposal, as not changing the principle upon which the Court has hitherto gone, and, although I have still great difficulty, I am not prepared to differ from your Lordships.

The sugar remained with the refiners subject to S. & Co.'s control, but was entered in the stock-book of the latter as sold to M. & Co.

On 11th February M. & Co. sold the sugar to F, and gave him a delivery-order (dated 17th February) in his favour addressed to S. & Co., which he transmitted to them with a request to hold to his order. S. & Co. did not acknowledge the receipt of this order, but in their stock-book, of date 17th February, they entered against the parcels of sugar,—“Transferred by M. & Co. to F.”

M. & Co. became bankrupt on 13th March, and their bill for the sugar was dishonoured. On 19th March F demanded delivery of the sugar, which was refused by S. & Co. on the ground that they were entitled, on the bankruptcy of M. & Co., to retain till the price was paid.

Held that S. & Co., having sold on credit, were bound to deliver at the date when the delivery-order in favour of F was transmitted to them, the term of credit not having then expired, and the original purchasers, M. & Co., being still solvent; and that, having at that date received F's intimation of the resale and request to hold to his order, they were to be regarded as holding for F, and that they were barred from retaining against him on the bankruptcy of M. & Co.

Fleming gave Macnaughtan & Co. his acceptances at three months for the price of the sugar purchased by him.

On 17th February 1880, Fleming received from Macnaughtan & Co. a delivery-order for the eleven casks, ninety-five bags and seventy-six bags, and forwarded it to A. C. Smith & Co. on 18th February, adding "which please hold to my order." A. C. Smith & Co. did not acknowledge this intimation, but entered the transference in their stock-book thus—"Transferred by F. J. M. & Co. to J. Fleming, Leith, eleven casks," &c., "17/2/80."

On 13th March 1880 Macnaughtan & Co. stopped payment.

On 17th March Macnaughtan & Co.'s bill for £758, 17s. 1d. fell due, and was dishonoured. It was subsequently retired by A. C. Smith & Co.

On 19th March Fleming sent to A. C. Smith & Co. an order to deliver the eleven casks, ninety-five bags and seventy-six bags. To this A. C. Smith & Co. replied:—"We hold no sugars belonging to you. The sugars you refer to were sold to Messrs F. J. Macnaughtan & Co., but they have not been paid for, and the transaction has been cancelled by their failure. Yrs., &c. A. C. SMITH & Co."

A. C. Smith & Co. having refused to deliver this lot of sugar, this action was raised against them by James Fleming for delivery or damages.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The pursuer having purchased the sugar in question, and duly intimated the purchase to the defenders by forwarding his delivery-order, they were and are under obligation to give delivery on demand. 2. The defenders having accepted the delivery-order for the sugar at a time when they had no right of retention as against the original purchasers, the pursuer is entitled to insist on delivery.

The defenders pleaded;—2. The defenders were entitled to retain the sugar in question at the time when delivery was demanded, in respect it had not been paid for, and the purchasers had become insolvent.

The Lord Ordinary, on 20th December 1880, after finding in fact in accordance with the above narrative, found, as matter of law, "that the defenders by their silence during the period between the receipt of the pursuer's letter of 18th February 1880, and accompanying delivery-order by F. J. Macnaughtan & Co. in favour of the pursuer, must be taken to have consented that the sugars in question were to be held by them to the order of the pursuer as required; and that after F. J. Macnaughtan & Co.'s insolvency they were not entitled, and are not now entitled, to refuse delivery of said sugars to the pursuer: And before further answer, appoints the cause to be enrolled that these findings may be applied, and an interlocutor exhausting the cause may be pronounced, reserving all questions as to expenses of process." *

* "NOTE.—If the matter in question were to be determined according to the law of England it was hardly disputed on the part of the defenders that the pursuer would be entitled to judgment. Even, however, had this view been resisted, the Lord Ordinary thinks that the authorities cited by the pursuer (Hawes v. Watson, 2 Barnwell and Cresswell, p. 540; Houston on Stoppage in transitu, pp. 78 and 79; Benjamin on Sale, 2d ed., p. 640; Pearson v. Dawson, 27 L. J., Q. B. 248; Woodley v. Coventry, 32 L. Fleming v.
Smith & Co.

Argued for them;—Though the sale was on credit, still on the bankruptcy of the purchaser, or on the expiry of the credit, a right of retention arose to them, if and so far as delivery had not actually been made. A sub-sale, even if intimated, did not interfere with this right of retention. On receiving such intimation they became bound not to deliver to the original purchaser, and for that reason, and that alone, they had properly entered a notice of the sub-sales or transfer in their stock-ledger, but the sub-purchaser took subject to all the conditions under which the original purchaser lay. The sub-vendee was in no way bound to them, he did not become their debtor for the price, and they were not bound on mere intimation of the sub-sale to give up their right of retention, which was good against the original purchaser who had contracted with them, and thereafter to hold the goods for behoof of a third party with whom they had no contract, and from whom they could not obtain payment. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 2, not only specially reserved their lien, but made payment of the price a condition of delivery to a second purchaser, in the circumstances which had emerged.¹

Wiffen, L. R. 5 Q. B., 660) would have been conclusive of the controversy. But the law of Scotland, and not the law of England, must govern the decision as to the rights and liabilities of the parties in the present action.

"The defenders' contention is that they remain undivested of the property in the sugars, and that they are not bound to give delivery to the pursuer while the price for which these had been sold by them to F. J. Macnaughtan & Co. continues unpaid. But for the effect due to their silence subsequent to the receipt of the delivery-order and pursuer's letter of 18th February, this claim probably could not be resisted; and the point on which the case turns truly is, whether such silence is, in the circumstances shewn in the proof, to be regarded as acquiescence. Had the defenders written, in answer to the pursuer's letter, that in terms of his request the sugars would be held for the pursuer, the Lord Ordinary thinks it plain they could not have resiled from the consequences of this undertaking. Is the result different when, in place of returning an answer, they keep the delivery-order and letter of request, and remain silent? That they might have refused to hold except upon the condition that any rights they had, or might have in the sugars, should be preserved, may be true. But when they say nothing in answer to a request which obviously was made upon the assumption that what was asked would be granted, they must, the Lord Ordinary thinks, be held to have acquiesced in or consented to what was required. To hold otherwise would be hard upon, not to say unfair to, the pursuer, as in a question with the defenders. They could not at the time have refused delivery to the pursuer, had immediate delivery of the sugars been asked, because they had taken a bill for the price, which was still current, and F. J. Macnaughtan & Co., the acceptors, were still solvent, as they continued to be for some time afterwards. The pursuer, by the course followed by the defenders, was put off his guard, and led to refrain from insisting for what at the time could not, and indeed would not, have been refused. To sustain the plea now put forward by the defenders would be in effect to sustain their right to a benefit which they never could have obtained if they had answered the pursuer's letter, and thus warned the pursuer that other measures than the request to hold the sugars for him must be adopted for his protection against contingent or possible claims upon the sugars at the instance of the defenders."

Argued for the pursuer;—The defenders were barred by their silence, No. 103. which, even apart from the entry of transference in their stock-book, was equivalent to acceptance of the notice of sub-sale. By such acceptance they undertook to give delivery to the pursuer as sub-vendee. Had they not so undertaken, the pursuer would at once have insisted on delivery, which at that date the defenders could not have refused, as the sale was on credit, and the credit had not expired.¹

LORD YOUNG.—This case raises an important question of mercantile law. The facts lie in small compass. Smith & Co. sold a quantity of sugar to Macnaughtan & Co., and sold it on credit, in the usual sense of the word—that is to say, on the terms that the sugar should be delivered immediately or on demand, and that the credit be one month, a bill being given by the buyers Macnaughtan & Co. at one month's currency. That is truly, and in the ordinary sense of the words, a sale on credit. Within the month Macnaughtan & Co., the buyers, having granted their bill for the price, sold the sugars to the pursuer Fleming. Fleming intimated the sale to Smith & Co., the sellers, who did not acknowledge the intimation by answering the communication of Fleming, but they assented to it and acted on it by entering the sub-sale in their stock-book of the date mentioned in the communication thus—"Transferred by F. J. M. & Co. to James Fleming, Leith, 17/2/80." Within the month Macnaughtan & Co. became bankrupt, and were unable to pay the contents of their bill, and thereupon Smith & Co. refused to give delivery of the sugar to Fleming, on the ground that they were entitled to hold it in respect that the purchaser had become bankrupt, and the price was unpaid. Fleming, on his part, says that the sub-sale having been acknowledged, the seller must be regarded as holding the sugar on his account, and cannot now be heard to plead the bankruptcy of the original purchaser against his demand for delivery. The Lord Ordinary has decided in conformity with this contention, and I am humbly of opinion that his judgment should be adhered to.

We have no information on the record as to the exact position of the sugar, but in answer to inquiries made during the debate we were told that it is still in the warehouse of the refiners from whom Smith & Co. bought it, but on what contract it remains there we do not know. If in the refiners' possession on the contract of sale, and to be delivered to Smith & Co. on demand, then, according to the principle of our law which requires delivery in order to pass the property, it has never become the property of Smith & Co. at all. If, again, as is more probable, it is in the refiners' possession on a contract under which warehouse rent is paid to them by Smith & Co. for its deposit,—that is, in their hands, though they were sellers, on another contract than that of sale, they receiving warehouse rent for it,—why, that would be esteemed sufficient delivery to pass the property. I think that, as the case is presented to us, we must take it as

Smith & Co.

Now, there is no doubt that by our law the undivested seller, unless he bargains otherwise, is entitled to retain for the price. If he sells on credit he is of course bound to deliver according to the contract to the buyer, having waived his right to payment of the price before delivery. But if during the currency of the credit, whether a bill has been granted for the price or not, the buyer became bankrupt, the sellers' right to withhold delivery until he is paid revives if the goods be still undelivered, notwithstanding the sale upon credit. That is substantially the law of England also, though there the seller's right to withhold is attributed to seller's lien, whereas with us it is attributed to his undivested right of property. The result is the same in both cases. But it is the law of England, and I think the law of Scotland also, that if a seller has received intimation of a sub-sale, and has assented thereto, that deprives him of all right to retain as against the original purchaser. In this case it is almost conceded that if Smith & Co., the original sellers, had acknowledged receipt of the pursuer's letter, and undertaken in terms of the requisition contained therein to hold the sugars to his order, they could not have afterwards on Macnaughtan & Co.'s bankruptcy refused delivery to Fleming on his order and demand. That acknowledgment was not made, and no reason is given for it not being made. But, as I have stated, the letter was received, and was assented to and acted upon, for a transfer by sub-sale thereby intimated was entered in the sellers' stock-book. We have the entry made of the date of the delivery-order in the print before us. When Fleming received no answer from Smith & Co.,—no repudiation of the transfer, which he was entitled to expect if assent was not given to it,—it is, I think, reasonable to deal with the matter on the footing of that having been done which in point of fact was done, though the fact that it had been done was not communicated to Fleming, namely, that a notice had been received and assented to, and the transfer entered in the books accordingly. There is no doubt that if Fleming had applied for the sugars within the following month—for nearly a month elapsed before Macnaughtan & Co.'s bankruptcy—delivery could not have been withheld. But when he applied after the month had expired he was applying to the party who within the month undertook, as I assume from their actings Smith & Co. did undertake, to hold to his order. That is exactly according to the authority quoted from the law of England, according to sound principle, and, as I think, for the convenience of commerce. Macnaughtan & Co. were entitled to demand immediate delivery. They transferred their right, as they were entitled to do, to Fleming, and Fleming communicated the fact to Smith & Co., who had no answer to the demand, with a request to hold to his order. My opinion is, that although Smith & Co. did not acknowledge receipt of the letter, yet they must be dealt with on the footing of assent, which is exactly in accordance with the fact of the order to hold for Fleming having been entered in their stock-book.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a question of some interest, and one attended, as I have found it, with considerable difficulty. The sugars in question were the property of the defenders, and were, at the date of the sale alleged, stored on their account with sugar-refiners in Greenock. They were sold on No. 103. the 9th and 10th of February 1880 to Macnaughtan & Co. on credit, and a bill at one month's date was granted for the price by the purchasers. The pursuer, ^{Feb. 26, 1881.} Fleming v. Smith & Co. on the 11th of February, purchased these sugars from Macnaughtan & Co.,—also on credit,—and obtained from them a delivery-order on the defenders. This was intimated to the defenders on the 18th of February, who noted the transfer in their books; and it is not disputed that although no answer was returned to the intimation the defenders held the goods for delivery to the sub-vendee instead of the original purchaser.

Before the bill granted for the price to the defenders was paid Macnaughtan & Co. on the 13th of March stopped payment, the sugars still remaining in the possession of the defenders. The sub-vendee has brought this action for delivery to him of the goods. The question is, whether the defenders are bound to deliver the goods without receiving payment of the price.

The condition of this question is that the property of the goods remained with the original sellers, who were under an obligation to the purchaser to deliver them in terms of his contract. The purchaser was simply a creditor for delivery, and, had this been a ready-money transaction, could never have demanded delivery without payment of the price; nor could he by assigning the obligation place his assignee in any better position than himself. That could only have been accomplished either by a new contract with the original seller, or by some act on his part equivalent to delivery.

In the present case I am of opinion that nothing took place between the sub-vendee and the defenders which either amounted to delivery or to a new contract. The first is not maintained, nor, indeed, could it be so; but it is contended, and the Lord Ordinary has in substance held, that the conduct of the defenders in not replying to the pursuer's intimation, while they noted the transference in their books, amounted to an obligation to deliver absolutely to the purchaser, or at least misled him with the result of inducing him not to demand delivery.

Had the sale been one for ready money I do not think that the defenders did anything but what they were entitled and bound to do, consistently with all their rights reserved by the original contract, and resulting from their continued possession. The want of an acknowledgment of the intimation was immaterial; and, the assignation being intimated, they were bound to hold for and deliver to the assignee on the same terms as they had held for and were bound to deliver to the cedent.

This, however, was a sale on credit, one consequence of which was that the seller was bound to deliver the goods sold when demanded, within the period of credit, although the price remained unpaid. There is not much authority in our law on this subject, and no light, in my opinion, can be obtained on it from English cases. By the law of England, if the property of the thing sold has not passed to the vendee, a sub-vendee has no higher right than the original purchaser. Such cases occur where the goods sold require identification, or separation, or the like. From this it would follow that as with us the property only passes on delivery, an assignee cannot acquire a higher right. But in regard to an ordinary sale the English analogy necessarily fails, because, when the contract of sale is completed, the property of the subject of the sale passes to the vendee, and the whole fabric of case law which has been built up on this head rests entirely on this foundation. The right of the seller is not a right of property, but merely a lien over the property of another, which is held to be waived or to revive under varying circumstances, but always on the assumption that the property has passed to the vendee or his assignee or sub-vendee. Mr Benjamin in his work on Sale has these remarks (p. 626),—"When the goods have not yet left the actual possession of the vendor he has at common law at least a lien for the unpaid price, because he is always presumed to contract unless the contrary be expressed, on the condition and understanding that he is to receive his money when he parts with his goods. But he may agree to sell on credit,—that is, to give to the buyer immediate possession of the goods, and trust to his promise to pay the price in futuro. Such an agreement as this amounts plainly to a waiver of the lien, and if the buyer then exercises his rights and takes away the goods nothing is left but a personal remedy against him. But if we now suppose that after a bargain in which the lien has been thus unequivocally waived, the buyer for his convenience, or any other motive, has left the goods in the custody of the vendor, until the credit has expired, and has then made default in payment, or has become insolvent before the credit has expired, what are the vendor's rights? He has agreed to relinquish his lien, and the goods are not yet in transit. Does his lien revive, on the ground that the waiver was conditional on the buyer's maintaining himself in good credit? Or can the vendor exercise a quasi right of stoppage in transitu—a right that might perhaps be termed a stoppage ante transitum? The true nature and extent of the vendor's rights in this intermediate state of things have not yet, perhaps, been in all cases precisely defined; but they have been considered by the Courts under such a variety of circumstances that in practice there is now but little difficulty in advising in cases as they arise." But the rules thus established,—and some of them are technical enough,—to which Mr Benjamin afterwards refers, proceed on the initial assumption that the unpaid vendor's right is one of lien, and the vendee's right one of property, and the result is reached, generally, by inquiring whether the seller is or is not estopped or personally barred from using his lien.

Fleming v.

We have no materials in our different, and, as I think, simpler system, on which these rules can be specifically applied. The rights of the parties are exactly the converse. The seller remains proprietor. The purchaser is only creditor for delivery. There is no lien of any kind vested in any of the parties, and these principles of waiver, lien, and personal bar seem entirely inapplicable and inextricable.

I arrive, however, at the same result on a simpler ground. When the sale is for ready money then there is no obligation to deliver except on condition of payment of the price. If the sale is on credit the seller is bound to deliver on demand during the currency of the credit, but if the buyer become insolvent before delivery then his breach of the contract will prevent him from enforcing it. But if, while things are entire, he assign this obligation to deliver on demand to a third party, who intimates his assignation before the seller become bankrupt, I think this right to delivery on demand becomes absolute in the person of the assignee, and the seller's right for payment is only a personal claim against the original purchaser.

Contract—Liquidate damages—Penalty—Time bargain.—In an action by a contractor for the balance of the contract price, the employer pleaded that he was entitled, in terms of the contract, to a deduction from the contract price of £2 per day for each day the work had remained unfinished after the date stipulated. Held that, in the circumstances, the various stipulations as to time being inconsistent with the work being completed on the date fixed, the claim as to liquidate damages could not be enforced.

Observations on penalties and liquidate damages.

ON 3d February 1879, John Robertson, joiner, Dollar, raised an action 2D DIVISION. against John Henry Driver, residing at Springfield, near Dollar, for Lord Lee.
 balances alleged to be due to him on two contracts for repairs and altera- R.
 tions executed by him on Mr Driver's house. Mr Driver defended the action, and stated certain objections to the accounts sued upon. Some of these objections took the form of details of sums of money stated to have been necessarily expended by Mr Driver in consequence of the careless and bad workmanship of Robertson in connection with the first of the contracts.

With respect to the second contract, Mr Driver claimed to set off against the balance said to be still due a sum of what he averred to be penalties incurred by Robertson under the stipulations in the contract.

This contract was one for the putting in of oriel windows into Springfield House, and provided for the whole work connected with the alteration, including not only mason work, and the joiner, carpenter, and glazier work, but also the work of the plasterer, and the slater, and the plumber. The whole mason work is to be completed "within six weeks from the acceptance of offer;" and the clause relative to joiner, carpenter, and glazier work provides as follows:—"The roof of the oriel windows to be made ready for the slates within two days after the time specified for the completion of the mason work, and the portions of rooms requiring to be plastered to be made ready for the first coat of plaster within two days thereafter, and the internal finishing proceeded with as soon as possible." Article 2 of the general conditions was—"Should the contractor refuse or delay so to carry on his work as that it may be fully and properly completed in every respect, viz., mason, joiner, slater, plumber, glazier, and all other work, on or before seven weeks from the date of contractor receiving the acceptance of offer, it shall be in the power of the proprietor, after giving two days' notice in writing to the contractor of his intention so to do, to employ other tradesmen to carry on and complete the work at the contractor's expense. . . . 6. The contractor to receive one-third of the contract price as soon as the mason has the stone-work of the oriel windows completed, the other third to be paid after the glazier, slater, and plumber work is completed, the remaining third to be paid on the completion of the work; but said price shall be subject to deduction of £2 for each day or part of a day after date as before specified for the completion of the work, during which the work may remain unfinished, or in any manner incomplete, of which the proprietor, or architect, or inspector foresaid, shall be sole judge."

Mr Driver averred that the work had been unduly delayed, Robertson's offer to execute it having been accepted by him on 18th August 1876, and the contract therefore falling, in terms of the specification, to be completed by 6th October 1876, whereas it was not completed until 2d December 1876. He, therefore, claimed deduction of £2 per diem for the sixty-two days after 6th October until the work was completed.

Robertson averred in answer to the defender's statement that any delay was due to Mr Driver's own fault.

On 11th June 1879, the Lord Ordinary (Young) "on the motion and of consent of both parties," remitted to Mr Smith, Dean of Guild, Edinburgh, to report on the matter in dispute, with the exception of the claim for penalty.

Mr Smith took evidence at considerable length as to the work executed, and the time employed in doing it. On 7th June 1880 he reported the result of his investigations, which was that Mr Driver was due a sum of £288 odds to Robertson.

Mr Driver having died soon after this, his trustees were, on 20th July 1880, sisted as defenders in his place.

The Lord Ordinary (Lee), on 26th October 1880, allowed both parties a proof of their averments as to the claim for penalties. From the evidence adduced it appeared that Robertson only received the acceptance of his offer and the relative plan and specification on 28th August 1876 instead of 19th August as averred by Mr Driver, and that the contract which should have been completed in seven weeks from the former date, i.e., on 16th October, was not finished until 30th November. Evidence was led by Robertson to the effect that it was impossible that the contract could ever have been completed in seven weeks, the plaster-work alone requiring most of that time to dry. There was also evidence of wet weather and unforeseen delays which retarded the work. The evidence on this and the other points is referred to in the Lord Ordinary's note.

On 24th December 1880 the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—" . . . Finds, . . . and apart from the defender's claim for penalty under the oriel window contract, the balance due to the pursuer upon the accounts libelled amounts to £282, 13s. 3½d.; and with respect to the defender's claim under the oriel window contract for a deduction from the price payable under the same, in respect of the pursuer's failure to complete the work within the stipulated time, finds that on a sound construction of the said contract, as contained in the specification with relative offer and acceptance annexed, the pursuer undertook for £314 to execute, complete, and in all respects finish the work referred to in said specification, within seven weeks from the date of his receiving the acceptance of his offer, and agreed that the price payable as therein provided should be subject to deduction of £2 for each day or part of a day after the date therein specified for the completion of the work, during which the work might remain unfinished or in any manner incomplete: Finds that the pursuer received the acceptance of his offer on 28th August 1876, and that the work was not completed until 30th November 1876: Finds it not proved that the deceased defender was to blame for the delay in the completion of the work, or for any part thereof, but that there was some wet weather during the contract, and that for delay so caused, and other unforeseen contingencies, the pursuer is entitled to an allowance of three weeks over the time stipulated: Finds that the defenders are entitled to a deduction at the rate agreed upon as aforesaid, for each of the remaining twenty-four days, and are therefore entitled to set off against the sum of £104, 13s. 4d. remaining unpaid, under the said oriel window contract, and included in the balance above mentioned, the sum of £48: Decerns against the defenders, trustees of the deceased John Henry Driver, and as sisted in his place, for the sum of £234, 13s. 3½d., in terms of the conclusions of the summons, with interest thereupon at the rate concluded for from 4th February 1879 until payment: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses from 6th June 1879: Quoad ultra finds neither party entitled to expenses; and remits," &c.*

Driver's Trustees.

* "NOTE.—The proceedings in this case, which have been of a protracted and confusing character, have arisen in the settlement of accounts between the pursuer, as a joiner and contractor at Dollar, and the deceased Mr Driver, who was proprietor of a villa residence called Springfield House in that neighbourhood. Mr Driver died during the dependence of the process, and the present defenders were sisted as his trustees in his place. Besides a general jobbing account, the pursuer undertook, in 1876, two contracts for work upon said house—firstly, a contract for the erection of a bath-room, &c., for the fulfilment of which no time was fixed; and, subsequently, a contract for the alteration of the front of the house, by making four oriel windows, two on each side of the door, as shewn in the plan No. 31. Besides a variety of objections to the accounts, which were a good deal mixed up by the pursuer, the defender maintained certain counter claims, and especially a claim under the oriel window contract, to a deduction at the rate of £2 per day for sixty-two days, on account of the pursuer's failure to complete the work within the stipulated time.

"If the balance of accounts between the parties be adjusted, the only remaining points are (1) as to the defender's claim to a deduction under the oriel window contract, and (2) as to interest. The former of these involves a question of considerable nicety, and of some practical importance.

"The contract provides for the whole work connected with the alteration, including not only mason work, and the joiner, carpenter, and glazier work, but also the work of the plasterer, and the slater, and the plumber. The whole mason work is to be completed 'within six weeks from the acceptance of offer;' and the clause relative to joiner, carpenter, and glazier work provides as follows:—'The roof of the oriel windows to be made ready for the slates within two days after the time specified for the completion of the mason work, and the portions of rooms requiring to be plastered to be made ready for the first coat of plaster within two days thereafter, and the internal finishing proceeded with as soon as possible.'

"Article 2 of the general conditions provides—'Should the contractor refuse or delay so to carry on his work as that it may be fully and properly completed in every respect, viz., mason, joiner, slater, plumber, glazier, and all other work, on or before seven weeks from the date of contractor receiving the acceptance of offer, it shall be in the power of the proprietor, after giving two days' notice in writing to the contractor of his intention so to do, to employ other tradesmen to carry on and complete the work at the contractor's expense.'

"Article 6 of the general conditions provides for payment of the price as follows:—'The contractor to receive one third of the contract price as soon as the mason has the stone work of the oriel windows completed, the other third to be paid after the glazier, slater, and plumber work is completed, the remaining third to be paid on the completion of the work; but said price shall be subject to deduction of £2 for each day or part of a day after date as before specified for the completion of the work, during which the work may remain unfinished or in any manner incomplete, of which the proprietor, or architect, or inspector foreshaid, shall be sole judge.'

"The contract price for the whole work was £314. The pursuer's offer is

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If I thought that any farther light could be obtained upon this case I would have suggested that the Court should take some time to dated 14th August 1876. The acceptance is dated 18th August 1876. Both offer and acceptance are written upon the specification. It is proved, however, that the acceptance was not received by the pursuer on 18th August or for ten days thereafter. A letter was sent to him on the 18th, and was received by him on the 19th, informing him that Mr Driver had appended his acceptance to the specification. But the pursuer, being unable to go on with the work without the plan and specification, which were in the hands of Mr Driver's agent in Dundee, wrote on the 22d asking that they should be sent. Owing to the absence of Mr Driver's agent from Dundee there seems to have been some delay about this, as his reply, though dated 25th, was not received until the 28th. This is the date when the contractor actually received the acceptance of his offer; and, although he heard on the 19th that his offer was accepted, it appears to the Lord Ordinary that, in the absence of the relative plan and specification, this was not equivalent to receipt of the actual acceptance, as it did not enable the contractor to begin the work.

"As to the progress of the work and the time when it was finished, it appears from the evidence that the mason work was completed on or about 8th October; the roof was ready for the slater on 10th October, the slater work was completed, and the ridges put on by the 12th; the plasterer began on the 14th and finished on the 21st October; but the joiner and carpenter work (being the work peculiarly belonging to the pursuer) was not finished until 30th November.

"Now, as the period of seven weeks from the contractor's receiving the acceptance expired on 16th October, it is plain that if the contract contains an obligation to complete the work by that date to which the stipulation in article 6 of the conditions is referable, a question arises concerning the import and effect, in the circumstances, of the alleged penalty or deduction from price. The Lord Ordinary had imagined from the record that the pursuer's reply to the defenders' counter claim was that stated in his 4th plea in law, viz:—'That the defender, being responsible for any delay which occurred, is not entitled to recover the penalties referred to.' But it appeared at the proof and debate that the pursuer now maintains that the contract imposed no obligation upon him to complete the whole work within any specified time. He states in his evidence that the joiner and carpenter work, to a considerable extent, could not be done until after the plaster work was completed and dry. He referred specially to what is called 'the internal finishing,' which seems to include putting on shutters, breasting, and foot-base, also the shutter knobs, window fastenings, and other mountings. And evidence was adduced by him to the effect that it was impossible the whole work could be completed within seven weeks, as the plaster work, if done in three coats according to contract, would necessarily occupy many weeks, and would take, according to any mode of procedure and in any weather, some weeks to dry sufficiently to allow of the wood work being completed. It was maintained on behalf of the pursuer that the seven weeks' stipulation does not apply to the plaster work, and the Lord Ordinary admitted the evidence adduced on the subject above-mentioned in case it should be ultimately held that the contract is ambiguous on this point. His own view, however, is that the contract is clear; that the obligation applies to the completion of the whole work falling under the contract; and that the pursuer having undertaken by the terms of his offer to 'complete and in all respects finish the work herein before referred to, in accordance with the true meaning and intent of the foregoing amended specification,' is not entitled to plead against the defenders the impossibility now alleged, especially as he does not attempt to prove that the deceased defender was made aware of any such impossibility.

"It was contended on behalf of the pursuer, that the contract itself admits of a construction which would exclude plaster work from the stipulation as to time. This contention was founded on the explicit terms in which the time is read this proof. But after the full statement by the counsel for the defenders, No. 104. and looking to the elaborate note of the Lord Ordinary, I do not think more regulated up to the plasterer's work; the provision that the internal finishing is to be proceeded with 'as soon as possible,' and the absence of any express mention of plaster work in article second of the conditions. The Lord Ordinary is far from saying that the contract is as distinct as it could have been made. But he is unable to read the contract as between the defenders and the contractor, who states that he prepared the specification, otherwise than as assuring the employer that the whole work could and would be completed 'in all respects' within seven weeks. The argument that plaster work is not included in the enumeration in the second article of the conditions is open to two observations. In the first place, this is not a deed of entail that is being construed. In the second place, the enumeration includes expressly joiner work, as well as 'slater, plumber, glazier, and all other work,' and it is clearly proved by the defender's evidence that the joiner work could not be completed until after the plaster work had been done.

"The Lord Ordinary, therefore, holds that, under the contract, fairly construed, the pursuer was bound to complete, and in all respects finish, the work within seven weeks from 28th August, unless prevented by some cause for which he cannot be held responsible.

"It is pleaded that the deceased defender was to blame for the delay, and it was contended that the delay in sending the specification involved more than a mere postponement of the date of receiving the acceptance. Had the receipt of the agent's letter of 18th August been sufficient to bind the pursuer as an acceptance there would be great force in this argument, for it is obvious that a week's delay at that time of year might have involved, through subsequent change of weather, a delay of much longer duration. The Lord Ordinary, however, is of opinion that it was open to the pursuer to withdraw his offer any time before he received the plan and specification. These formed an essential part of the acceptance. For the acceptance referred to the 'foregoing offer;' and the offer related to the foregoing amended 'specification and plan.' Without these the acceptance was incomplete and unintelligible. Mr Agnew's observation that the pursuer ought to have kept a tracing of the plan, and a copy of the specification, is of no weight in a case where the plan and specification were adjusted, as in this instance, and where no arrangement was made for duplicates. Having on 28th August received and acted on the acceptance, with plan and specification all complete, and having made no objection then that the contract as to time should be no longer binding on him, the Lord Ordinary must hold that the pursuer, as well as the defenders, is precluded from founding upon delay prior to that date.

"The question, then, is, what is the effect, under the contract, of the stipulated penalty or deduction of £2 per day? Although it has been called a penalty on the record the Lord Ordinary holds that in determining the effect of the stipulation, and whether it is incumbent upon the employer to prove damage by the delay, or whether it rests with the contractor to shew grounds of abatement, the thing to be considered is the real nature and substance of the stipulation. It may be either (1) a penalty properly so called, viz., a sum imposed in pœnam; or (2) an adjusted and agreed on rate of damages proportionate to the breach of contract; or (3) a rate of damages agreed upon, but exorbitant and unconscionable. The cases of Craig v. M'Beath, 1 M. 1020, Johnstone v. Robertson, 23 D. 646, and Forrest & Barr v. Henderson, 8 M. 187, illustrate the distinction between these several cases. The result of them appears to be, that if the sum be truly penal, it will not be enforced beyond the damage actually suffered. Even where the sum bears to be agreed upon as liquidated damages, the Court may modify it if exorbitant and unconscionable. But where intended as liquidated damages, and there appears to be nothing exorbitant in the stipulation, but a reasonable and fair proportion between the consequences of a breach of contract and the penalty, a Court of justice will not interfere—(1 Bell's Com., 5th ed., p. 655, and Johnstone v. Robertson.) If it be maintained

No. 104. detailed information is necessary. The question comes to be, whether this penalty is at all applicable to the circumstances of the case.

Mar. 2, 1881.
Robertson v.
Driver's Trustees.

in any case that the stipulated sum is excessive and exorbitant, it rests with the party alleging this to set forth and establish grounds for modification, otherwise the party claiming the penalty is entitled to assume that the damage has been justly assessed by the contract at the amount of the penalty—(Craig v. M'Beath).

"In the present case the party claiming the penalty does not allege actual damage, except in so far as the want of the front part of his house implies damage. His claim is founded entirely on the contract. On the other hand, the party resisting the deduction so claimed sets forth no grounds for abatement or modification, but pleads non-liability, in respect that any delay which occurred was caused by circumstances for which the claimant was alone responsible.

"The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that according to the true meaning of the contract the sum stipulated as a deduction from the price in the event of a breach of the obligation as to time is of the nature of pactional damage, and not penalty. He cannot distinguish the stipulation in substance from that in Johnstone v. Robertson. He holds that there is nothing manifestly disproportionate and exorbitant in the rate agreed upon by the parties. His view is that the parties, knowing the kind of house and having before them the extent of inconvenience that must be caused to the employer by delay, assessed the damage at a rate which they mutually agreed upon as proportionate to the breach of contract. The stipulation of the second article of the conditions does not seem to be at all inconsistent with this view. It is intended to provide against unreasonable delay, or refusal to do the work. Article 6 assumes that the work is proceeded with and done, but that the contractor fails to implement his obligation to do it in the time stipulated.

"In this view, the only question comes to be, whether the pursuer has established, as a matter of fact, that any delay which occurred was caused by circumstances for which the defender is responsible. The alleged delay in sending the plan the Lord Ordinary has already dealt with. He holds that in the circumstances it goes to the date of receiving the acceptance and cannot exclude the defender from enforcing the contract. The case of M'Elroy v. Tharsis Company, 5 R. 161, and H. L. 171, was different, and the judgment in that case has no application to this cause of delay,—for in that case the Court proceeded upon fault during the time allowed for executing the contract. Here the delay was in concluding the contract, and thus fixing the time for its commencement.

"But other causes of delay are also alleged, for which it is pleaded that the pursuer cannot be held responsible, and particularly unusually wet weather in the early part of the contract, causing some postponement of the proceedings, which was consented to by the deceased defender. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that a certain amount of wet weather is proved to have occurred during the execution of the work, for which the pursuer is entitled to an allowance in point of time. It was not, however, extraordinary in character, or sufficient in duration to account for anything like six weeks' delay. With the exception of two or three days, it appears to have occurred after the work should have been completed. Even assuming that the six weeks occupied in the internal finishing had been accounted for by satisfactory evidence that it was required for the purpose of allowing the plaster work to dry, the Lord Ordinary doubts very much if the pursuer would be entitled to plead such a delay in this case. But the evidence on that subject was not satisfactory to the Lord Ordinary's mind. The portions of wall which required to be plastered were of small extent, and consisted of narrow strips. The plaster on the new bit of roof added at the oriel windows is not proved to have interfered in any way with the wood work. It is very difficult indeed to understand how the six weeks between 21st October (when the plaster work was finished) and the 30th November were occupied, if the wood work had been previously in course of preparation, as it is said to have been and might have been. The evidence rather suggested to the Lord Ordinary that a couple of men in each of the four rooms could have fixed up

It is manifest that the parties meant to make a time bargain, as is also the fact that the time taken to perform the work was unusually long, and presumably might have been shortened if greater activity had been displayed.

When we come to the penalty clause we are bound to look at the stipulations on which it rests. I do not think we can tie down the contractor to these provisions. If we were to attempt to do so then he would have been bound to complete the mason work in six weeks, and then to have the roofs ready in two days, and within two days thereafter to have the walls ready for plastering, "and the internal furnishings proceeded with as soon as possible." Such stipulations never could lay the foundation for exacting such a penalty as is here demanded. I am quite willing to let the defenders read the subsequent stipulation as to time as they desire, namely, that the whole work was to be completed in seven weeks. But if that be so, then what was undertaken was impossible, because we have it proved that six weeks being taken for the mason work as provided in the contract, the plaster work could not be ready for the joiners for a fortnight after that. The Court will not enforce a penalty where the thing undertaken could not possibly be done in the time. It is quite plain that this is a case where the Court must modify the stipulated penalty. That is the short view I take of the case. I think we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, except in so far as it allows the £2 penalty to form a deduction from the contract price.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I regret there should have been such a prolonged litigation in this case. When it originally came before me as Lord Ordinary, seeing that it was an action for a contractor's account, I suggested that the whole matter should be remitted to a competent man of skill. This was done, and I am sorry that the man of skill should not in so simple a the internal finishings in a very few days ; and it is quite inconsistent with the idea of continuous wet weather that the window sashes, which were glazed at the beginning of October, should have been kept out for some time, for drying purposes. On the whole, the evidence satisfied the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer either undertook to do what he knew to be impossible, or failed to do that which he had undertaken to do, and which, with proper diligence, could have been done. In either view, the defenders appear to be well entitled to enforce the contract against the pursuer, at least to the extent of setting off the stipulated deduction against the balance of the contract price.

"It is reasonable, however, that every possible allowance should be made to the pursuer for unforeseen delays ; and the Lord Ordinary thinks that fourteen days may be allowed for wet weather, and that another week may be allowed for a delay of two days, caused by a new beam which was required, and for other contingencies, though not proved to have caused delay. An examination of the evidence will possibly shew that this allowance of three weeks is too liberal. But the Lord Ordinary holds it to be consistent with legal principle that the equitable jurisdiction of the Court should be exercised favourably towards the contractor in this matter.

"With regard to interest, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the result of this action shews that the pursuer's claim was subject to certain counter claims, and that it was necessary to ascertain the balance. No interest before the date of citation, therefore, has been allowed. From that date, however, the pursuer has been found entitled to interest on the balance, because he appears to have offered, before proceedings were commenced, to refer to arbitration the adjustment of the accounts.

"As to expenses, the defenders have been found entitled to expenses from the date of the minute of tender, No. 16 of process."

No. 104. matter have given his judgment without taking this proof, which we would have been better without. He should have gone and seen the house himself, and formed his opinion from his observation. I certainly intended the man of skill to go and inspect the work, and that seems to me the reasonable way of settling the matter.

Mar. 2, 1881.
Robertson v.
Driver's Trustees.

The question of penalty or no penalty as a question of law was properly excluded from the remit. The Lord Ordinary has now found the defenders entitled to £48 as stipulated penalty. I agree with your Lordship that this is not a case where the penalty clause, having regard to the evidence and terms of the contract, is capable of being enforced. Where there is a distinct time bargain and a stipulation by the parties that if the contractor fail to complete the contract within the time distinctly limited, he shall be liable for a certain sum of money for every day or week during which it remains incomplete, the Court will generally give effect to that bargain if it be reasonable that damages be paid. But if, again, the penalty be truly a penalty—that is, a punishment—the Court will not allow that, because the law will not let people punish each other. They may contract that the one will be bound to reimburse the other for any loss caused, but not for punishment. Anything beyond compensation, which is a reasonable enough penalty, is punishment, and will not be enforced. That is the result of all the decisions. The word “penalty” is sometimes used to express liquidate damages, and, again, what is called liquidate damages is really penalty. The Court will look into the circumstances of each case, without being influenced by the term used, and having ascertained the truth, will act accordingly. In this case, in the circumstances, I do not think this penalty should be enforced.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the opinions which have been expressed.

If the stipulation had been clear and distinct, and capable of being fulfilled, the defenders would be entitled to succeed in their demand. But when we look at the contract we find that under it the contractor was bound to finish all the work under the contract in seven weeks. Now, we find six weeks and four days of that time is to be taken up in certain specified work, but after that is completed there is still a great deal of joiner work and internal fittings to be done. It is not a compatible provision that six weeks and four days are to be given to do so much of the work, and then only three days are to be allowed for the rest. It is impossible to imagine that that was the bargain. Upon this contract, as it stands, I am of opinion that it is impossible to enforce this penalty or deduction.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against : . . . Find that the defenders are not entitled to any deduction from the sums sued for in respect of the penalty stipulated in contract between the parties, and that the balance due to the pursuer upon the accounts libelled amounts to £282, 13s. 3½d. sterling, and decern against the defenders, the trustees of the said John Henry Driver, as sisted in his place, for payment to the pursuer of that sum, with interest thereon at the rate of £5 per centum per annum from 1st March 1877 till payment : Find no expenses due by either party to the other prior to 7th June 1880, the date of Mr Smith's report : Find the pursuer entitled to expenses from that date, and remit,” &c.

Right in security—Security over moveables—Lease—Possession—Reputed ownership.—The proprietor of a new hotel (which required £20,000 to furnish it) in letting it to a tenant agreed to advance £10,000, to be expended on furniture, on condition that furniture to that value should be placed in certain rooms and inventoried as his property, and that the tenant should lease this furniture for ten years at a rent equal to 5 per cent on the sum expended by the landlord. There was also a separate agreement that the tenant should purchase the furniture in ten lots by yearly payments of £1000, the furniture rent being reduced in proportion as the payments were made. In terms of this agreement the furniture was purchased and inventoried, and the agreement itself was subsequently embodied in formal deeds. The tenant, after making three half-yearly payments of the furniture rent, and paying for one lot of the furniture, became bankrupt. security over the furniture without possession by the creditor, held that the agreement was lawful, and that in terms thereof the landlord was proprietor of the furniture standing in his name, and that the tenant had possession of it merely on a contract of hire.

JOHN DUNCANSON, builder, Glasgow, was proprietor of the Grand Hotel, Charing Cross, Glasgow. Towards the close of 1877, the hotel being then nearly completed, he entered into correspondence with Mr Lewis Jefferis, then proprietor of the Queen's Hotel, Cork Street, London, who contemplated becoming tenant, as to the duration of the proposed lease of the hotel, and as to how Jefferis was to be assisted in purchasing the £20,000 worth of furniture necessary to furnish the building. Jefferis was anxious that Duncanson should supply £10,000 towards the furnishing, and on 29th November wrote that should he do so he was willing to give him any security short of a registered bill of sale, which he thought might injure his credit. By 26th December Duncanson and Jefferis had agreed upon the main points in connection with the lease of the hotel, and that £10,000 was to be in some way or another contributed to the furnishing by Duncanson. The manner in which he was to be secured in repayment was made the subject of conversation and correspondence between the parties, and eventually it was arranged that Duncanson was to purchase £10,000 of furniture which was to be placed in particular rooms in the hotel, and inventoried as belonging to him, Jefferis to get a lease of this furniture and to pay rent therefor. The following letters from Jefferis shew his understanding of the arrangement at that time:—"29th December 1877.—I received your favour of yesterday, and will get Mr King to send you copy of estimate as soon as he can do so. The way we have done it is this:—We have taken so many drawing-rooms at one price, so many at another, and the same with the bedrooms, so many large, and so many single, and so many servants'. Then, again, for some of the best rooms an additional amount is provided, with separate sums for coffee-room, drawing-room, billiard-room, smoking-room, &c. The carpets are all carefully measured, both for rooms and passages, staircases, &c.; plate, linen, mats, gasaliers, mops and brooms, glass, kitchen, buttry, and lots of other things unnecessary here to mention.

"Depend upon it I will take care that you have an ample amount to cover your advance, and shall look out that all the substantial and large furniture is booked to you, and stamped J. D. underneath with a stamp that I shall keep in my possession. Then, as I pay off, you can stamp a suitable amount with a stamp L. J., to be kept in your possession. Take, for instance, tables, chairs, couches, looking-glasses, gasaliers, bedsteads, spring mattresses, wardrobes, billiard-table, fire-grates, and similar articles that will not wear out or perish, like china, glass, earthenware, linen, and carpets. This seems to me to be the right way, and if you can suggest anything else pray do so."

"2d January 1878.—Since writing you my last letter I have been talking the matter over with Mr King, and he thinks it will be better for you to have a list of the furniture in certain rooms, to be numbered and invoiced to you, and he has prepared an estimate accordingly, which I beg to enclose. If you want more articles included to make it a better security, I am quite willing to fall in with your views. Practically speaking, it may as well all be invoiced to you; but, as a matter of business, the invoice ought to be for about the same amount, as this arrangement is, after all, a bona fide purchase of so much furniture on your own a/c." . . .

The furniture was ordered by Jefferis from Green & King, a London firm, who had furnished his own hotel.

Duncanson's agents having been, in the end of December, instructed to prepare the deeds necessary to carry out the proposals of the parties, made drafts of a lease of the hotel, a lease of £10,000 worth of furniture, and of an agreement between the parties. These drafts were duly revised by the parties and their agents by 28th February 1878, but owing to a difficulty in getting the inventories of the furniture completed, were not finally executed until 16th August 1878, some time after Jefferis had been in possession of the hotel and furniture as tenant of both. In February 1878, while the furniture for the hotel was being prepared and collected by Green & King, Jefferis asked Duncanson to grant them a letter of obligation for the £10,000 worth of furniture, which was to be invoiced to him. To this Duncanson, on 16th February, replied:—"I had a meeting yesterday with Messrs Mitchells, Cowan, & Johnston, and my own lawyer, and they both saw a difficulty in the way of me signing the letter to Mr King before arrangements were complete as to what goods I was to purchase, the manner in which they were to be distinguished from yours, and divided into lots of as nearly as possible £1000 each, so that when the time came for you to take them over the different settlements would be of the simplest character and devoid of confusion. I have to see them again on Monday, and hope that they will have seen their way then to get the details settled to their mutual satisfaction."

"Since wiring you to-day I have been looking over your letters of December 29th and January 2d, and with the information obtained from them, part of which had escaped my memory, I think that I see my way to give them ideas on the subject which will enable them to adjust details. However, to keep Mr King and yourself quite at ease on the matter, I may state that there is no misunderstanding as to the arrangement between you and I, viz., that I am to purchase and pay for £10,000 worth of goods, to be put into the hotel at Charing Cross here and leased to you. You are quite at liberty to shew Mr King this letter, which will let him see that the entire delay lies with the lawyers, and not with me."

On 4th March, however, the following letter to Green & King was sent by Davidson, Duncanson's manager:—"Glasgow, 4th March 1878.—I beg to order of you furniture to the extent of ten thousand pounds sterling, to be charged in ten distinct invoices.

"The goods and furniture to be of the best description, as selected by Mr Lewis Jefferis, and to be approved of by myself both as to quality and value. I agree to pay you the sum of £4000 on the 1st June 1878, and the balance of £6000 on the 24th June 1878, or as soon as the furnishing of hotel shall be completed. It is quite understood that the balance for the furnishing is to be paid by Mr Jefferis."

Subsequently, on 9th March, this letter was confirmed by Duncanson himself at Green & King's request. Green & King made use of these letters to obtain overdrafts from their bankers.

Furniture commenced to be sent to the hotel in March 1878, and by 31st May, when Duncanson paid Green & King £4000 to account, furniture to a greater value than that sum was in the house. The furniture, with the exception of a few articles, was all in the hotel by the end of June, and on 1st July the hotel was opened by Jefferis, Duncanson on that day handing over possession of the house and the furniture invoiced to him. Duncanson subsequently, on July 3d and August 2d, paid Green & King two cheques for £3000 each, making up the balance of the £10,000.

The leases and agreement entered into between the parties were all executed on 1st and 16th August 1878, and were shortly in the following terms:—1. Lease of the hotel.—By this Duncanson let Jefferis the hotel for twenty-one years, with breaks at seven and fourteen years, the Jefferis bound himself to pay a yearly rent of £500, but for the year 1878, as his tenancy was only to commence on 1st July, he was only to pay £454, 15s. 11d. He was also taken bound to keep in good order and repair the furniture, and replace all broken or damaged articles.

3. The agreement.—By this deed (which was recorded for preservation and execution on 21st June 1879) it was provided, after a narrative of the leases of the hotel and the furniture, 1st, that Duncanson was to purchase £10,000 worth of furniture, which was to be divided into ten lots worth £1000 each, and to place the whole within the hotel by 24th June 1878.

2d, That Jefferis was to purchase a similar amount of furniture and place it in the hotel.

3d, That Jefferis was to purchase as at 15th May 1879, and so on each year until 15th May 1888, one of the ten lots of furniture put into the hotel by Duncanson, each at the price of £1000.

4th, That the rent of the furniture was to be reduced each year as each lot was paid for.

The other stipulations were to take effect if Jefferis took advantage of the breaks allowed in the lease of the hotel.

Jefferis continued to occupy the hotel until June 1880, when he was adjudicated bankrupt in the Bankruptcy Court in England. Baker Philip Daniels was appointed trustee on his bankrupt estate. Daniels having claimed the whole of the furniture in the hotel as belonging to Jefferis, Duncanson, on 26th June 1880, presented a note of suspension and interdict against his selling or removing the furniture inventoried in the list appended to the furniture lease between Jefferis and Duncanson. In the statement of facts the transactions and deeds above-mentioned were narrated, and it was contended that under them the furniture claimed was the property of Duncanson. Daniels stated in reply that the furniture was truly the property of Jefferis, and that Duncanson had merely advanced £10,000 towards payment of the price thereof. The deeds he alleged were executed merely with a view to create a security for that advance, and that the lease of the furniture was merely a simulate transaction intended to confer a security upon Duncanson. The furniture, he stated, was not thereby let; it never belonged to Duncanson, and the lease was not acted on. He added,—“From June 1878 down to his bankruptcy Mr Jefferis had the sole control and use of the said furniture; he was holden and reputed as sole owner of the same, and he was dealt with by his present creditors upon the credit of such ownership. All this took place in the knowledge of the complainer.”

Duncanson pleaded;—(1) The furniture in question being the property of the complainer, the respondents are not entitled to sell or cause to be sold, or remove, or otherwise interfere with the same, without the complainer's consent. (2) The respondent, the said Baker Philip Daniels, having intimated his intention to remove the said furniture, and dispose of it without the complainer's consent, to the complainer's serious loss, suspension and interdict ought to be granted as craved. No. 106.

* As before stated, the drafts were adjusted and the deeds extended by the end of February, and before Duncanson had written to Green & King ordering the furniture.

Interim interdict having been granted, Daniels pleaded ;—(1) The furniture libelled being part of the bankrupt estate of Mr Jefferis, the note should be refused, and interdict recalled. (2) Separatim, Mr Jefferis having been reputed owner of the said furniture, the present application cannot be maintained. Mar. 4, 1881.
Duncanson v.
Jefferis' Trustee.

A proof was led, from which, in addition to what has been above stated, the following facts appeared :—Messrs Green & King, the furnishing firm, although they had received letters from Duncanson and his manager ordering the furniture, and had also received payment of £10,000 from him, in their books entered all the furniture against Jefferis, and credited him with the payments made by Duncanson. Mr King, the partner who conducted the whole transaction, deponed that he always looked on Jefferis as the customer and proprietor of the furniture, and that he understood that Duncanson was only advancing the money to him to enable him to furnish the hotel. When the furniture had been placed in the hotel, Green & King prepared an invoice to Duncanson of furniture alleged to be of the value of £10,000. Duncanson had had this invoice checked by practical men, and on their report objected that the prices put on the furniture were too high, and in consequence the goods invoiced to him did not really represent £10,000. After some demur on the part of Jefferis this point was yielded, and the furniture of twenty-one additional rooms was added to the invoice. From this invoice the inventory was made out which was annexed to the lease of the furniture. This addition to the invoice was made in June before Jefferis was in possession of the hotel and furniture. Jefferis deponed that although he had meant all along to act in good faith with Duncanson, still that he had understood the transaction to be a security one, and not a purchase by Duncanson and lease to him.*

On 17th January 1881 the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Finds that the bankrupt Lewis Jefferis obtained possession of the furniture in question under and by virtue of an agreement with the complainer to take a lease of the Grand Hotel, Glasgow, in which it was placed, and to become tenant also of said furniture, in terms of the two leases Nos. 5 and 6 of process, and relative agreement No. 6/1 of process, and that at the date of his bankruptcy the possession of the said Lewis Jefferis was due to the contract of lease therein contained : Finds it not proved that the bankrupt Mr Jefferis was at the date of the bankruptcy the owner or reputed owner of said furniture ; therefore repels the respondent's pleas in law, suspends the proceedings complained of, interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the respondent as craved from selling or causing to be sold, or removing or otherwise interfering with any of the articles enumerated in the inventory or list appended to said lease, No. 6 of process : Declares the interdict formerly granted perpetual, and decerns.”†

* Jefferis paid the stipulated rent for the furniture at Martinmas 1878, Whitsunday 1879, and Martinmas 1879, and on 7th March 1879 he also paid £1000 as purchase price of lot No. 1.

† “ NOTE.—At the date when Mr Jefferis became bankrupt he was in possession of the furniture in question. It was situated in the hotel occupied by him, and if no distinct title of possession other than that of property could be instructed the trustee was well entitled to found on the presumption of law that possession of moveables presumes property.

“ But a distinct title was produced, in the shape of the two contracts of lease, dated in August 1878, and the relative agreement of same date. Upon the strength of the definite contract thus instructed, the Lord Ordinary granted interim interdict in passing the note for the trial of the question. As, however, it appeared that Mr Jefferis had been in possession of the hotel, and of the furniture, prior to the date of the leases, and from the beginning of July 1878, and as it was alleged by the respondent that Mr Jefferis had been the real purchaser of the furniture, and that the lease was merely part of an arrangement for securing an advance on the furniture to the extent of £10,000, it appeared to the Lord Ordinary to be necessary that inquiry should take place concerning the original title of the bankrupt's possession, and that the complainer should lead in the proof.

"The result of the proof, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, is to shew that the arrangement embodied in the deeds of 1st and 16th August had been deliberately adjusted and agreed to by the parties before possession was obtained by Mr Jefferis, either of the hotel or the furniture specified in the inventory. And although the inventory was not fully completed till after 19th July, when the amended invoice was sent down by Messrs Green & King, the agreement under which Mr Jefferis obtained possession is proved to have been entirely consistent with the arrangement ultimately expressed in the formal deeds. Indeed, the deeds themselves had been adjusted in draft some time previously, and the only thing that prevented the execution of them before possession was given was the fact that the inventory of furniture was not completed.

"It is true that the object of the arrangement, as adjusted and expressed in the deeds, was to enable Mr Duncanson to give Mr Jefferis assistance to the extent of £10,000 in furnishing the hotel. But it is not proved that that assistance was to be given in the shape of an advance to Mr Jefferis to be secured over the furniture. On the contrary, the Lord Ordinary thinks it proved by the correspondence, and by the evidence of Messrs Cowan and Mitchell, that the form in which such assistance was to be given, according to the agreement of parties, was that Mr Duncanson should purchase furniture for the hotel to that amount, and grant a lease of it on the terms ultimately expressed in the formal deeds. Mr Jefferis' letters of 29th December and 2d January, and Mr Duncanson's letter of 16th February, shew that there was no misunderstanding on the point; and the evidence of Messrs Cowan and Mitchell proves that the deeds were adjusted with the knowledge and authority of all concerned, in the shape in which they were put, for the very purpose of enabling Mr Duncanson to give the required assistance in the form most favourable for himself, and so as to give him as effectual a hold of the furniture as possible.

"After all that has taken place, therefore, the question comes to be, what is the import and effect of the contract embodied in the lease and relative agreement? The Lord Ordinary has not arrived at the conclusion that the dispute resolves into this question without full consideration of the evidence adduced, and satisfying himself that possession was obtained under an obligation bona fide undertaken by Mr Jefferis to execute such a contract. But he refrains from any discussion of the evidence as unnecessary. The fact that Mr King considered Mr Jefferis to be the purchaser of the furniture (assuming it to be the fact), appears to him of very little consequence, because the question is, what was the fact? And that depends not upon Mr King's opinion, but on the contract between Mr Jefferis and Mr Duncanson, and the actings of parties. Mr King's reason for his opinion accordingly shews, that what he went upon was, that he got the order through Mr Jefferis, and that Mr Jefferis selected the furniture. Mr Duncanson's letter of 4th March, however—confirmed on 9th—shews that Mr King must have known, that as between the parties Duncanson was the giver of the order, and Jefferis was to select the furniture, subject to his approval. The Lord Ordinary cannot take it off the hands of Mr King that he did not supply any goods to Mr Duncanson on the faith of the letter of 4th March, and that that letter was only intended for Mr King's bankers. He thinks that Mr King, having got that letter and acted on it, both in getting advances from his bankers, and ultimately in getting payment from Mr Duncanson of the price of the furniture as therein promised, cannot be permitted to repudiate it. It is quite true that the hotel furniture had been ordered before the date of the letter of 4th March, but the footing on which it had been ordered was the same as therein expressed. This is clear from Mr Jefferis' letter of 2d January 1878. With regard to the form in which the transaction is entered in the books of Mr Jefferis the Lord Ordinary thinks that the point chiefly to be considered is the substance of the contract, which, in his opinion, was that for the purpose of enabling Mr Duncanson safely to aid Mr Jefferis in regard to the furniture there should be a purchase of furniture by him on his own account. The evidence of Mr Jefferis is, as a whole, perfectly candid, and quite consistent with this view.

Duncanson v.
Jefferis' Trustee.

"Much stress was laid upon the mode in which the furniture of twenty-one rooms was added to Mr Duncanson's invoice in the end of June. The Lord Ordinary has felt that the way in which this was done introduces an element of difficulty into the complainer's case which would otherwise have been absent. But the additional furniture having been transferred to Mr Duncanson's invoice before possession had been given it appears to the Lord Ordinary that any agreement to take possession under a lease of the articles, as specified in an inventory, must be applied generally to the whole. No distinction can well be made. Unless, therefore, the circumstances attending the addition of these articles could be held to give to the agreement a different complexion from that which it professes to bear, and to prove collusion or want of bona fides, it must depend on the contract, executed in terms of that agreement, whether it instructs a lease as the title of the bankrupt's possession, or a mere right in security of money lent. The Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the circumstances do not justify any conclusion that the deeds do not truly represent the contract of parties.

"Holding, therefore, that possession was obtained by Mr Jefferis under an obligation to execute a contract in terms of the lease No. 6, and relative agreement, the Lord Ordinary inquires, what is the import of that contract? It was contended for the trustee that it discloses a right of property in the bankrupt, and a mere security in favour of the complainer. If it be the true meaning of the instruments that the relationship of lessor and lessee should be apparent merely, the Lord Ordinary does not doubt that the real character of the lessee's right must receive effect. No reduction would be necessary, and in this case no ground of reduction is alleged. But it must be kept in view that if the tenant truly obtained possession under an obligation to enter into the contract the fact that the furniture was in the lessee's possession at the date of the contract is no reason for construing it against the relationship which it appears to create.

"The contract may be said to consist of three deeds, all of the same date—1st and 16th August 1878: (1) A lease of the Grand Hotel for twenty-one years from Whitsunday 1878, but containing clauses which shew that the tenant's occupation was to commence, and had commenced, only on 1st July, at a rent of £1500 per annum for the first three years, but rising ultimately to £2500 per annum; (2) a lease of certain 'articles of furniture, enumerated in the inventory thereof annexed,' for the period of ten years from Whitsunday 1878. The articles so described are referred to as 'to be purchased by the first party (Mr Duncanson), and to be placed in that portion of the building . . . let or about to be let by the first party to the second party.' But this form of expression is explained by the fact that the drafts had been adjusted some months previously. There is a declaration that if the lessee becomes notour bankrupt, the lessor should have power to bring the lease to an end, and to take possession of or re-let the furniture. The rent is to be at the rate of £500 per annum, equal to 5 per cent on £10,000. The lessee is to keep and maintain the furniture in like good condition as he acknowledges to have received it, and to replace all articles broken or damaged, and the lessor is to have free access to inspect it at all reasonable times. It is stipulated that the lessee shall insure the said articles of furniture, and the furniture in said hotel belonging to himself, to the extent of £20,000; (3) an agreement relating to these leases, and narrating that the parties had each agreed to invest £10,000 in the purchase of articles of furniture 'to be placed in the said hotel as the furniture thereof, and the first party's share whereof is contained in the lease last before mentioned.' Thereupon the parties agreed that the furniture to be purchased by each of them should be placed in the hotel between 1st May and 24th June 1878, the lessor's share being specified as conform to inventory subscribed as relative to the furniture lease, and being divided into ten portions, each containing articles of furniture to the value of £1000. The lessee is taken bound to purchase one of said lots annually, commencing 15th May 1879 with lot number one in said inventory, and so on until 15th May 1888, at which date the whole ten lots would be purchased, and the lease would come to an end. It is provided that the several sums of £1000 so payable by the lessee to the lessor shall respectively bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent from the respective dates of payment during the non-payment thereof, 'but declaring that no sale of any portion of the said furniture shall take place until payment of the price thereof, the said respective lots of furniture remaining the property of the said first party or his assigns until payment of the respective prices thereof, as above provided; but on payment of the price of each of the said respective lots, the property of such lots so paid for shall ipso jure vest in and belong to the second party or his assigns absolutely, and free from payment of the rent applicable thereto stipulated for, in, and the whole conditions of the said lease of furniture before referred to.' Provision is also made for a proportional reduction of rent upon each payment of £1000, and for the earlier payment of some of the lots in certain contingencies.

"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that, although the arrangement expressed in these deeds may be an unusual one, there is nothing in it at all inconsistent with the idea of a bona fide contract of lease being the true title on which the lessees held possession of the furniture. And he is of opinion that, assuming the deeds to represent the true contract of parties, there is no reason in law why that contract should not receive effect according to its terms. That the complainant and the bankrupt were both desirous to make the best arrangement possible for starting the new hotel; that the bankrupt had not the means himself to provide the requisite furniture; and that one object in view was to enable the bankrupt to become the tenant, and to occupy it, suitably furnished—seem to account sufficiently for the form of the contract. But none of the facts contradict or throw doubt upon the deeds as representing the truth of the contract between the parties. Can it be said, then, that there was anything unlawful in the arrangement? Was it beyond the power of the parties to arrange that the object in view should be effected by Mr Duncanson becoming the purchaser of the furniture to the extent of £10,000, and giving the intending tenant the use of it for a hire equal to five per cent on the price, with a stipulation that he should keep it in repair, and purchase it in lots annually. The Lord Ordinary knows no authority for such a view. He is of opinion that the law of Scotland allows a contract of that kind, if made in good faith, and that the cases of Cowan v. Spence, 21st May, 1824 (3 Sh. 28), Wight v. Forman, 10th December 1828 (7 Sh. 175), and Orr's Trustees v. Tullis, 2d July 1870 (8 M. 936), afford proof that the law will give effect to such a contract against creditors, if satisfied that it truly and honestly represents the engagements of the parties. The cases of the Heritable Securities Investment Association v. Wingate, 8th July 1880 (7 Rettie, 1094), and Cropper & Co. v. Donaldson (ib. 1108), were decided upon the ground that, according to the true meaning of the deeds, the transactions were not really of the nature of lease or hiring, but were securities

Duncanson v.
Jefferis' Trustee.

LORD YOUNG.—We think it is not necessary to have any further argument in this case, which has been exhaustively argued for the reclamer.

It raises an important question of law, but we think the case clear, and that the Lord Ordinary is right. The intention of the parties is not doubtful, and I venture to think it a pity that language should have been used for obscuring it, in the apprehension that by stating it frankly the legitimate position of the parties would be judicially affected. The relation of the parties was this—Mr Jefferis, an hotel-keeper in London, desired to become tenant of an hotel in Glasgow which the other party, Mr Duncanson, was in course of building, and which was in 1877 on the verge of completion. It was a great undertaking to open it and carry it on, but Jefferis was prepared for it. The hotel was so large that the only question was how much the purchase of the necessary furniture for it would exceed £20,000. Jefferis was not prepared to lay out so much, so in the course of the negotiation he told Duncanson that it would facilitate their arrangements if he could advance £10,000 for furniture. The tenant thus proposed that the landlord should accommodate him with £10,000 to furnish the house. In the result the landlord, Duncanson, agreed to do this provided that he should be satisfactorily secured. No security was available but the furniture itself, and Jefferis, who is an Englishman, being familiar with bills of sale and the inconveniences attending them under the statute, which requires that they should be registered, proposed that Duncanson should, if possible, be content with a security not involving any registered deed. But after an agreement as to that matter was come to, on applying to a Scotch man of business they were told that a security could not be thus granted in Scotland. A bill of sale is a written contract of sale, just as a bill of lading is a written contract of carriage, the word bill being equivalent to written contract. By the law of England a sale of moveables passes the property of the article sold, and so prior to the statute to which for monies lent or acknowledged to be due, attempted to be created over moveables belonging to the debtor. The Lord Ordinary does not understand that the majority of the Judges differed from Lord Young upon the law. They took a different view of the facts; and, at all events, the Lord Ordinary holds that the decisions above referred to, and the case of Marston v. Kerr's Trustee (6 R. 898), make it clear that if the title of possession be a definite contract of hiring or lease, and be bona fide entered into, it is no objection to the contract that it enables the owner of moveables to give accommodation to an intending purchaser, by allowing him to hire the subjects in the meantime, and thus have the use and possession of them without ownership.

“The Lord Ordinary rejects, as inconsistent with the deeds, the contention that they instruct a present sale of the furniture by Mr Duncanson to Mr Jefferis, and that they contain no effectual condition suspensive of the transfer of property. He also repels as unsupported by evidence the plea of reputed ownership. And, for the reasons above stated, he is of opinion that the claim of the complainer has been established.

“It is right to explain that he delayed judgment, in order that he might dispose at the same time of another action raised by the complainer against the respondent, and arising out of the matters in controversy in this case.”

No. 106. I have referred a bill of sale of the borrower's furniture in favour of the lender passed the property to the lender and gave him a good security as on a property title. He became proprietor of the furniture just as if he had bought it, although he really only had entered into a contract of sale with the owner—a perfectly fair contract of sale—in which he was to be in the position of a buyer, limited if necessary to this, that he should not use those rights or that title to any further effect than to obtain payment of his money, with interest. But by the statute a bill of sale is required to be registered, and Jefferis was, at first, apprehensive of registration, lest that should affect his credit. I refer to that merely to interpret the letters, and to shew what was intended, viz., that there should be a loan, the lender being made proprietor of the furniture which his money was to purchase. If he had done that it is not doubtful (indeed it is conceded) that the furniture would have been his, and would not have passed to the creditors of Jefferis on his bankruptcy. But it is said, I think reasonably, that what was done was substantially the same. The tenant, who was to acquire the furniture, thought he would get it reasonably from Green & King, and the arrangement was that he (Jefferis) should order the whole £20,000 worth of furniture, and that Duncanson should put himself in the position of orderer to the amount of £10,000. That was assented to. It was very satisfactory to Green & King, for Duncanson became liable to them for £10,000 worth of it by his order. But the furniture was a unum quid, and the two purchasers desired Green & King to invoice £10,000 worth of it to Duncanson, sending it all to the hotel. Now, this was done, and to accomplish the transaction—we think a legitimate transaction—it was necessary to divide the £20,000 worth, and the parties to make the division were Jefferis and Duncanson, the only parties interested, and they did so by putting so much into the inventory as it was agreed that Duncanson should have a property title too. The only two parties interested agreed that that should be the position of affairs, and it is an observation of no value whatever that the articles were put into the inventory at lower prices than were to be paid to Green & King. That was a matter for the parties themselves.

Duncanson having paid the £10,000, and having the furniture representing it inventoried as his with the consent of Jefferis, proceeded to give Jefferis possession of it by lease, the rent to be paid being, according to the legitimate arrangement of parties, equivalent to interest at five per cent on the price paid by Duncanson for the thing leased. It was to be £500 a-year. That was the bargain. It was carried out by being reduced to formal deeds in July and August 1878, in pursuance of the agreement of parties, but these deeds expressed the arrangement which had been acted upon all along. I put the question during the argument—After all this had passed, after the furniture had been sent in and divided, and the inventory made, and the rent fixed and paid by the tenant, what, as between Jefferis and Duncanson themselves, was the title on which Jefferis held? There could be but one answer. Jefferis put his name to a deed, being sui juris and solvent, and in pursuit of a legitimate end, in which he says he holds £10,000 worth of furniture on a contract of hire. Who can say that that was not his position? If he could not say so, neither could his creditors. If he had been transgressing the bankrupt law, or committing any fraud, some one might have had a right to object; but it was a perfectly fair open transaction, and neither he nor his creditors, nor his trustee, who takes tantum et tale as he had, could object. The suggestion in such cases always is that there is something unfair to creditors. But how? Nobody is entitled to suppose that the tenant of a great hotel like this has the property of the furniture. It may be with him on hire. That is a matter for inquiry. The result of inquiry here would have been that Duncanson was proprietor and Jefferis lessee of this furniture. There was absolutely nothing in which the creditors of Jefferis were interested, and the case is undistinguishable from that of Duncanson going to his own tradesman and ordering the furniture, and sending it to the hotel. It would then have been in the hotel all the same, and Jefferis' possession would have been all the same. I am therefore of opinion—and I believe that is really the opinion of the Court—that here Jefferis held this furniture as lessee, or upon a contract of hire with Duncanson, and that, so far as he did not in pursuance of that contract purchase it and pay for it before his bankruptcy, it does not pass to his creditors or to his trustee, but remains the property of Duncanson.

and other manufacturers in Brechin, and also against the Commissioners of Police of the Burgh of Brechin, to have them prevented from polluting the river South Esk. The whole defenders other than the Commissioners of Police made offer to construct remedial works, on time being allowed them for that purpose.

The Lord Ordinary adjusted this issue for the trial of the case between the pursuers and the Commissioners of Police:—“Whether, between the 11th day of June 1877, and the 11th day of June 1880, the Commissioners of Police of the Burgh of Brechin did, by discharging sewage or other impure matters, or permitting sewage or other impure matters to be discharged from the sewers or drains under their charge, at or near the burgh of Brechin, into the Skinners Burn, the Den Burn, and the Glen-caldham Burn, or one or more of them, before their confluence with the river South Esk, and into the said river South Esk itself, pollute the water of the said river South Esk, to the nuisance of the pursuers or their authors, or one or more, and which of them?”

The pursuers moved the Court to vary the issue by deleting therefrom the words “and which.” They contended that the words were unnecessary, and contrary to the established form of issue in similar cases.¹

Earl of Southesk v. Inch Bleaching Co. &c.

The defenders maintained that the three pursuers were very differently situated with regard to nuisance from the town sewage,—Lord Dalhousie being chiefly above the town, Lord Southesk some little distance below, and Mr Erskine as much as six miles below, where it was impossible he could receive any appreciable injury from them. Each pursuer must prove his own case independently of the others, and if he failed the defenders were entitled to a verdict in their favour quoad him, with expenses. The words “and which” were therefore necessary to bring the case properly before the jury.

The pursuers offered to withdraw Mr Erskine's name from the issue, as in the question with the Police Commissioners he was not materially interested. This was accordingly done.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the issue should be “to the injury of the pursuers or their authors, or one or other of them.”

LORD DEAS concurred with the Lord President.

LORD MURE.—My opinion has been distinct from the first that the words “and which” should be deleted from the issue. Their insertion is a departure from the style of issue on which cases of a similar description have been satisfactorily tried, and I think the Lord Ordinary ought not to have allowed them to be inserted in it, unless on some special grounds. No such cause, however, has been shewn; and, as they are not necessary, I think that they are just as likely to confuse as to assist the jury.

LORD SHAND.—I confess I think this reclaiming note a most unnecessary and unreasonable proceeding. It is perfectly obvious that unless the jury should find a verdict for all the pursuers they must specify by name the particular pursuers to whose injury the nuisance or pollution was caused, and if the Lord Ordinary thought it would tend to clearness to bring this out by adding the words “and which of them,” I can see no reason for interfering with what he has done, and certainly nothing worthy of being called a reason has, in my view, been stated in support of the reclaiming note. The issue as adjusted appears to me to be quite as well fitted to try the case as that proposed by your Lordship, and the counsel for the pursuers have been altogether unable to suggest any possible mischief or disadvantage to the pursuers by leaving the issue as it is. I should have thought and said the same if the Lord Ordinary had preferred the words proposed by your Lordship, for under that issue also the jury must specify particular pursuers if they do not find in favour of all of them. But to alter the words of the issue settled by the Lord Ordinary, when no reason affecting its substance can be stated, appears to me to be simply giving encouragement to expensive procedure for no end. I am for refusing the reclaiming note, and leaving the issue in the terms of which the Lord Ordinary has approved.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Remit to the Lord Ordinary to alter the said issue by striking out the words ‘more, and which,’ and substituting the word ‘other’ in their place, and to proceed farther as shall be just.”

Parent and Child—Access to child by mother living separate from husband.—A lady who had left her husband presented a petition to the Court praying their Lordships to regulate the terms on which she was to have access to her only child, two years of age, who remained with its father. Petition dismissed, on the ground that the lady had left her husband without any good or sufficient reason in law.

2D DIVISION.
R.

MRS MACKENZIE presented this petition to the Inner-House, praying their Lordships to find her entitled to access to her only child. The narrative of the petition contained the following statements: Mr and Mrs Mackenzie were married on 26th June 1877, and a daughter, the child in question, was born on 1st March 1879. Mrs Mackenzie averred that ever since her marriage her husband had treated her with "much neglect and unkindness." In February 1880, as she stated, "on the suggestion of and with the full consent of her husband," she went to stay with her parents in England, leaving her child with her husband at their home in the north of Scotland. Shortly after her departure her husband left his own house and went with the child to live with his mother in the neighbourhood. Mrs Mackenzie, in the meantime, had been unwell, but on 5th June she wrote, offering to return to her home and rejoin her husband and child, and making certain proposals as to contributions to be made by her out of her separate income—her fortune having been settled on herself. Mr Mackenzie answered, declining the proposed pecuniary arrangements, and offering to receive her in his mother's house. Mrs Mackenzie thereafter, on 1st July, went to her mother-in-law's house, where she remained until 4th August, when "certain painful circumstances" occurred "which compelled her to leave." She thereupon took a residence within two and a-half miles, and applied through her legal advisers that arrangements should be made for her obtaining access to her child. The result of this was that her husband stated he was prepared to permit her to see her child for an hour three times a-week at his mother's house, on condition of her coming unaccompanied, and of the child being attended by either its nurse or its grandmother. The petition then proceeded,—“The petitioner does not dispute that in law the custody of her child belongs to its father, subject to her right of access to it, but she considers that, taking into consideration her being prepared to isolate herself in this remote part of Scotland, many hundred miles from any of her own relations, where she has taken and furnished a residence, and will there have to keep a suitable establishment for the one object of being able to see her child, from whom she has now been separated for a year, with the exception of a few weeks, the access now offered is insufficient, and is hampered with conditions which ought not to be imposed upon her, and she now craves your Lordships to make such regulations as shall seem to you good for securing to the petitioner adequate access to and means for enjoying the society of her only child. The petitioner has throughout been desirous of being reconciled to her husband, and has made overtures more than once with that view, but hitherto without success. The petitioner is still wishful to effect a reconciliation with her husband, but in the meantime, and until that can be effected, she is naturally desirous of enjoying the company of her child so far as the law permits.”

The petitioner prayed their Lordships “to find that the petitioner is entitled to free access to her child, the said Mary Thyra Mackenzie, at all reasonable times, and in particular that she is entitled to have the said child sent to her at her own house for two whole days in each week, to be fixed by your Lordships, and is also entitled to have access to her company on the other days at all reasonable times during the day at the grandmother's house, or where the said child may be for the time, and that in either case outwith the presence of its father or his mother, or any one on their behalf.”

Mackenzie v.
Mackenzie.

Mr Mackenzie lodged answers to this petition, in which he repudiated the charges of neglect and unkindness. He also stated that before her departure to England in February Mrs Mackenzie had formed a design for removing the child with her without his knowledge. He explained that after Mrs Mackenzie's departure their marriage-contract trustees had withdrawn her separate income, and otherwise made calls upon his resources which had so crippled him that he had to break up his own establishment and go and live with his mother. He denied all responsibility for the "painful occurrence" alluded to in the petition, but which was not otherwise explained or referred to in greater detail, and concluded with a judicial offer to receive the petitioner as his wife at his mother's house, his mother having offered to take up her residence elsewhere in the meantime. On the whole matter, he submitted that the petition ought to be dismissed as altogether unnecessary. The correspondence between the parties was printed and boxed to the Court, but was not otherwise made public.

LORD YOUNG.—We do not think it necessary to call for an answer. We have read the petition and answers, and also the correspondence which has been printed and laid before us, and we are of opinion that the course taken by the counsel for the petitioner is to be commended,—that is, in abstaining from stating the cause of the disagreement, or referring to the letters, which it is desirable should not be published. The separation has not been of so long duration as to destroy all hope of the parties coming together again. Indeed I am inclined to entertain sanguine hopes that they will. I will not go into the terms of the correspondence, as to do so would be not for but against the interest of the parties.

This lady has been living apart from her husband, and she declines to return to him, although she has been invited, and affectionately invited, to do so.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, we must assume that her absence from her husband is not legally warranted. In another than a legal point of view there may be more or less of excuse for her, but legally—and we must regard her conduct from the legal point of view—she is not doing her duty in living apart from her husband and child. The fact of her removing her separate income is not in her favour. She has thereby compelled her husband to break up his own establishment and go and live with his mother, whose only son he is. She has been invited to come and live in her mother-in-law's house, but declines to do so unless she is to be the mistress of the house. We consider that demand not legally warranted. As far as we can judge from the correspondence we are inclined to sympathise to a large extent with the husband, and to hold that the wife is not legally warranted in absenting herself in such circumstances. We know of no authority empowering a wife so deserting her husband and child to apply to the Court for access to the child. It is unnecessary to go more into detail. Our opinion is that the petition is not legally maintainable, and ought therefore to be refused. The affectionate terms of the husband's letters precludes the idea that he, in any spirit of vindictiveness, or from any other motive not to be commended, will deny access to this child on the part of its mother. This child may eventually be a bond to bring the spouses together again.

The petition will be refused.

LORD CRAIGHILL and LORD LEE concurred.

Public burden—Burgh assessments—Public charity—Liability of charitable hospital for assessments—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879 (Stat. 42 and 43 Vict. cap. 32.—"The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879," sec. 70, exempted from burgh assessment "any house or building which is solely occupied for purposes of public charity, or any premises exempted from taxation by public law." The directors of a charitable hospital in Edinburgh, in order to extend the usefulness of the hospital, opened certain additional wards—which they had otherwise not sufficient funds to support—to patients who should pay 3s. per day for board. Held that the fact that certain patients contributed to the cost of their own maintenance did not deprive the hospital of the character of a building "solely occupied for purposes of charity," and that it was entitled to exemption.

THE following narrative is taken from the Lord Ordinary's note:—2D DIVISION.
Lord Adam.
R.
"Mr George Chalmers, who died in 1836, left the residue of his estate to the Dean and Faculty of Advocates for the purpose of founding a new infirmary or sick and hurt hospital.

"The Dean and Faculty accepted the trust, and in 1863 they erected the buildings now occupied as 'Chalmers's Hospital for Sick and Hurt.' The building contains four wards—one for males and one for females on the lower storey, and the same on the upper storey. Each ward affords accommodation for eight patients.

"There are no limitations as to the persons who are admitted to the benefits of the charity. All kinds of surgical cases are admitted, and all kinds of medical cases except certain cases of infectious disease.

"When the hospital was opened in 1863 the funds at the disposal of Chalmers's Trustees were insufficient to enable them to make use of all the wards, and the two lower wards only were used. In the year 1870-71 the trustees fitted up and furnished the two upper wards for the benefit of those who could afford to contribute to the expense of their board. The sum which they contribute is 3s. a-day.

"The daily average number of patients in the paying wards for the years 1877, 78, 79, was four, five, and eight respectively, and the sums received for their board in these years respectively were £209, 14s., £241, 4s., and £434, 5s."

In 1879 the Magistrates of Edinburgh obtained a new Municipal and Police Act, stat. 42 and 43 Vict. cap. 32. Under the 70th section of this Act it is provided as follows:—"The burgh assessments shall not be imposed in respect of the Royal Palace of Holyrood, Queen's Park, Arthur's Seat, Duddingston Loch, nor houses or buildings in the Castle of Edinburgh; nor the Courts of Justice, General Register House, City Chambers, County Buildings, Prison of Edinburgh, nor the University of Edinburgh and the buildings connected therewith, except those parts which are used as houses; nor the Royal Infirmary, the Royal Edinburgh Hospital for Sick Children, nor the Assembly Hall of the Church of Scotland, the Free Church College, the Free Church Assembly Hall, the Synod Hall of the United Presbyterian Church and the buildings connected therewith, so long as these shall continue to be solely used for ecclesiastical purposes, or shall not be let for hire for other purposes, except those parts which are used as houses; or in respect of any house or building which is solely occupied for purposes of public charity, or any premises exempted from taxation by public law ; and the public parks, gardens, and bleaching-grounds, drying-grounds and grounds, public buildings, public wash-houses, baths, gymnasiums, open spaces, the police offices, station-houses, and other buildings or grounds connected with the police establishment, or provided or upheld out of the burgh assessments, shall be exempted from the payment of such assessments, and the said police offices, station-houses, houses, and other buildings or grounds connected with the police establishment shall also continue to be exempted from the payment of all cess or poor-rates imposed or to be imposed."

In September 1879 the burgh assessor for the first time included Chalmers's Hospital in the assessment-roll, and notice setting forth the assessments imposed upon the building and grounds of the hospital was sent to the directors. The directors, through their agent, objected to being assessed, on the ground that the hospital was a public charity, but their objection was overruled by the Magistrates. The directors then, on 6th May 1880, raised an action against the Magistrates, concluding for declarator " that the building or premises called and known as ' Chalmers's Hospital for Sick and Hurt,' situated in Lauriston Place, Edinburgh, are, in respect to assessment under the ' Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879,' a house or building solely occupied for purposes of public charity within the meaning of the 70th section of said Act, and are within the meaning of said section premises exempted from taxation by public law ;" and that the Magistrates were not entitled to impose assessments on the hospital.

There was also a conclusion for interdict against payment of the assessments already laid on being enforced.

The Magistrates defended the action.

A minute of admissions was adjusted, which bore :—" 5. That no charge is made for the accommodation and treatment of patients in the hospital, except in the case of—(1) pauper patients, who are paid for at the same rate as in the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh by the inspector of poor of the parish to which they are chargeable, but no such pauper patients have been in the hospital since 1864 ; (2) the patients in the two upper wards ; and that in no case are any fees or gratuities allowed to be taken, on any pretence, by any one connected with the hospital, from any patient or the friends of any patient. 6. That the two upper wards (male and female), each affording accommodation for eight patients, are set apart for the benefit of persons who require hospital treatment, and are able to make some contribution ; and that the patients in said wards are admitted in the same manner, and under the same conditions, except as regards payment, as the patients in the other wards. 7. That the funds of the hospital do not admit of the said two wards being kept open unless the patients in them make some contribution. 8. That the acting physician and the acting surgeon, as well as the house surgeon, give their services gratuitously (with this exception, that the house surgeon is provided, without payment, with apartments, board, and attendance in the hospital). 9. That the average annual number of patients treated in the hospital during the last five years ending 31st December 1879 has been 267, of whom 32 on an annual average have contributed 3s. a-day during their stay in the hospital for their board ; and that the average number annually treated in the waiting-room and surgery of the hospital as outdoor patients during said period has been 2138, none of whom have contributed towards the funds of the hospital ; and that a few donations to the hospital have been voluntarily made by patients and their friends, amounting to about £17 a-year. 11. That property and income-tax paid or retained from the revenue of Chalmers's Hospital is returned by the Government, on the ground that Chalmers's Hospital is an institution exempt from property No. 109. and income-tax under the statutes regulating said tax, and that applications for the return of the sums paid as property and income-tax are made by the trustees of Chalmers's Hospital every three years. 12. That inhabited house-duty is not paid by the trustees of the hospital. 13. That land-tax is paid by the trustees of Chalmers's Hospital in respect thereof, and that the parochial assessment for the repair of the church of St Cuthbert was also paid by them in 1879 in respect thereof. 14. That the amount of the hospital expenditure in the years ending 31st December 1877, 31st December 1878, and 31st December 1879 respectively, was £1381, £1540, and £1753. 15. That the sums received for board for the years ending 31st December 1877, 31st December 1878, and 31st December 1879 respectively, were £209, 14s., £241, 4s., and £434, 5s."

Chalmers's
Hospital v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

From abstracts prepared by the treasurer of the hospital it appeared that on no occasion since the hospital had been open for paying patients had the sum of 3s. per day for each patient been sufficient to meet the expense incurred in their maintenance.

On 15th February 1881 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the actions.*

* "NOTE.—The question in this case is whether the buildings known as Chalmers's Hospital are liable to have burgh assessments imposed upon them under 'The Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879.' That, again, depends upon whether or not they are solely occupied for purposes of public charity, or are exempted from taxation by public law. In either of these cases they will fall within the exceptions specified in section 70 of the Police Act, and will be free from the imposition of such assessments; otherwise they will be liable to assessment.

"The facts which raise the question are these—(Quoted in narrative).

"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that hitherto the trustees have not derived any profit from these paying patients, as from the smallness of their numbers the expense which they occasioned is considerable. Were these patients to become more numerous the Lord Ordinary thinks that the result would probably be different, and that the present rate of charge would probably yield a surplus. It also appears that so long ago as in 1864 some pauper patients were sent to the Infirmary by the Parochial Board, for whom payment was made. But that has not occurred since, and, the Lord Ordinary thinks, may be left out of view in the present question.

"The Lord Ordinary accordingly thinks that the question truly at issue is whether the use which is thus made of the hospital for paying patients takes it out of the category of buildings solely occupied for purposes of public charity.

"That the scheme which the trustees have thus initiated is a most benevolent and excellent one the Lord Ordinary does not doubt. It no doubt has proved of the greatest benefit to the persons who, as appears from Mr Crichton's evidence, have already taken advantage of it, and the Lord Ordinary has no doubt that, as it becomes better known, it will be more extensively made use of.

"If this result be obtained the Lord Ordinary thinks that the success will probably be attributable to the fact that those who make such use of the hospital are making a return for the benefits derived from it, and will not regard it in the light of an institution from which they are receiving charity. In order to be exempt from assessment the buildings must be solely used for purposes of public charity. The case may be taken, therefore, as if the hospital were solely used for paying patients. The Lord Ordinary has the greatest difficulty in seeing that such an institution could be considered as a 'public charity.' The rate of board charged—3s. a-day—must necessarily exclude the immense majority of the public, and all the most necessitous.

"The word 'charity' has a wider and a more limited meaning. In its wider

The directors reclaimed. Argued for them;—(1) The Lord Ordinary had taken too narrow a view of what constituted a charity. Here the charity consisted in giving the sick and hurt gratuitous medical and surgical treatment, including drugs, nursing, surgical appliances, and attendance. If all the patients treated could be so treated without food this would be done, but that was impossible, so in order to make the charity reach as far as possible these small sums were taken from a comparatively very limited number of patients, in order that they might get the benefit of the medical and surgical skill supplied by the charity. The true definition of a "public charity" was a charity managed either by a public body or by trustees, as opposed to a private individual charity. Any charity which could not be put an end to by the caprice of a private individual was a "public" charity.¹ (2) This hospital was exempted from taxation by public law. The Legislature exempted from taxation under local statutes all properties which were exempted from imperial taxation. That was the position of Chalmers's Hospital.

Argued for the Magistrates;—(1) The hospital could not be held to fall under the exempting clause (a), because it was no longer used "solely" as a public charity; and (b) because even if it could still be called a charity it was no longer a "public" charity. It did not matter that no profit was made out of the charges for board. If any revenue was drawn it ceased to be a public charity. That, at all events, was the rule in sense all benevolent schemes and institutions may be considered as charitable schemes and institutions, and in this sense the scheme of the trustees is a charitable one. But in its more limited sense charity means relief given to the poor gratuitously; and the Lord Ordinary thinks that in this Act of Parliament the word is used in this more limited sense. The Lord Ordinary has already said that in this case no profit is at present derived from the paying patients. Were it otherwise, he does not suppose that it could be contended that this, or any similar institution, was solely a public charity. He does not see that its character as a public charity can depend upon the fact of whether or not, in any particular year, the contributions of the patients did or did not meet their expenses, or that any inquiry could be gone into on that matter. He thinks that there is involved in the idea of public charity that there shall be no return in money for the relief or benefit given. He is, therefore, of opinion that the hospital is not exempt from assessment in respect that the buildings are solely used for purposes of public charity.

"The next question is whether the hospital buildings are premises exempt from taxation by public law. The pursuers contend that the buildings are exempt from taxation by public law, because they are exempt from taxation under the statutes relative to the House-Tax and the Property and Income-Tax Acts. The Lord Ordinary does not think that the meaning is to exempt from assessments buildings that may be exempt from taxation under any particular statute or statutes. He thinks the meaning is that they shall be exempt from taxation by public or general law, apart from statute—as, for example, property in the occupation of the Crown, or of persons using it exclusively in or for the service of the Crown. After the decision in the case of the Mersey Docks, 3 Macph., H.L., p. 102, note, it may be difficult to say that any other class of property falls under this exemption, but in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary it is to property so exempted that the exception in the 70th section of the Police Act is intended to apply.

Chalmers's
Hospital v.
Magistrates
of Edinburgh.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case has been very carefully considered by the Lord Ordinary, and ably argued to us. It involves the construction of a recent statute, and the result may reach very far however we may decide it. This makes the case one of importance, although no very large question is involved, nor one accompanied with much intricacy.

The question arises under the following circumstances. The late Mr Chalmers, who died in 1836, left the residue of his estate to the Faculty of Advocates for the purpose of founding "a new infirmary or sick and hurt hospital." The Faculty accepted the trust, and, through managers selected from the body, prepared and carried through a scheme for the erection of such an hospital as was indicated by the testator. The question we have now to decide is whether the bequest which has now been carried into effect by the erection of a building and the framing and execution of a scheme of management which has been found to be of great public benefit for a number of years is or is not a charity. In order to decide that we must find some definition for the word "charity." It seems to me that a charity is the application of funds for a benevolent purpose for the benefit of those who would not otherwise be able to supply themselves with the advantages so put within their reach. I do not think a closer definition is necessary. The funds must not be expended for profit or for pleasure and amusement only. If that be even an approximate definition then Chalmers's Hospital is a charity in every sense of the word. The next question for us to consider is, is it a public charity? It may be argued that to be such it must be supported by public money. But I do not think that a large hospital such as St Thomas's in London, or this Chalmers's Hospital, are public in any other sense than that they exist only for the benefit of the public. That being so, the question arises, does the 70th section of the recent Edinburgh Municipal Act of 1879 affect this hospital? That section provides that certain buildings and properties belonging to the Crown, and some public bodies, shall be exempted from municipal taxation, adding, "and the buildings connected therewith, except those parts which are used as houses." It then goes on to exempt the Royal Infirmary, &c. and certain ecclesiastical buildings, but again adding, in connection with the latter class of buildings, "so long as these shall continue to be solely used for ecclesiastical purposes, or shall not be let for hire or other purposes, except those parts which are used as houses." Then comes the part of the section which we have now to construe, "or in respect of any house or building which is solely occupied for purposes of public charity or any premises exempted from taxation by public law." Now, the question comes to be, is this hospital "a house or building solely occupied for purposes of public charity"? As I indicated in the course of the debate I think that "solely" there means that no part of the building is used so as to make it rateable as in the case of public or ecclesiastical buildings. That I take to be the meaning of "solely" here, because there are no other words in the clause which are appended as a qualification to the use of the other buildings mentioned. The construction put upon the wording of this special part of the section by the Magistrates is that no one shall be relieved in the hospital who can in any way contribute to their own maintenance.

The lower wards in this hospital we find contain patients who pay nothing at all, and those in the upper wards pay 3s. a-day for their board, but the directors supply them with medical attendance, drugs, nursing, and all the other advantages of the hospital, gratuitously. It is said this is not fulfilling the purposes of a public charity, because part of what the patients in the upper wards receive is not supplied out of the donor's funds, but out of their own. That is, I think, a very narrow view. It is plain that this receiving of paying patients was resorted to by the directors to enable them to use all the wards in the hospital, which they could not have done with the funds at their command unless something was paid for board by those patients who could afford to do so. The charge is 3s. a-day, which costs the patients no more than if they bought their own food. This in no wise resembles an extraneous use of part of the building for boarders. But, it is argued, the amount of public charity bestowed altogether is infinitesimal. Now, I find from the returns of the hospital that during the last five years an annual average of 267 patients have been treated in this hospital, of whom not more than an average of 32 have been so-called paying patients, and, in addition, the annual average of out-door patients has been 2138. I do not think that that can be called an infinitesimal contribution to public charity, or that the proportion of paying patients, or the element of their being treated, can in the slightest degree alter the character of this charity. I am therefore of opinion that this hospital falls under the exemption as a public charity.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The law of the matter can really be put in a single line, whether or not this building "is solely occupied for purposes of public charity." With your Lordship, I am clearly of opinion that it is so, and that notwithstanding that a small daily payment is taken from some of those who are recipients of the charity.

I agree that "solely" here is not meant to touch a case like this, where small daily payments are taken from some of the patients, but has the plain meaning that no part of the building is to be occupied otherwise than for charity.

We have nothing to do with the political economy of the question here. If we had, I would sympathise with the Magistrates in trying to bring all the subjects they can within the area of their assessments. These assessments are not, properly speaking, a tax. They are, in reality, for supplies and services given, such as lighting, cleaning, and watching,—and such conveniences, if supplied, must be paid for. The Legislature has, however, made certain exemptions from liability for such charges, and this building, falling within one of these exemptions as being solely used for charitable purposes, is protected from liability.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion.

Chalmers's Hospital, in my opinion, is a public charity, and the building is "solely occupied for purposes of public charity."

I entirely adopt your Lordship's definition of a charity so far as it is necessary for deciding this case.

According to the way in which this charity has been administered there are several ways in which the public can get the benefit of it. Numbers come as dispensary patients to receive out-door medical advice and treatment. Others come into the hospital because they are "sick or hurt," and in order to be treated they are also maintained. These belong to a class which, unless so treated and fed, the charity could not reach. If the charity had been limited to this class of patients, the upper wards of the hospital could never have been used owing to want of funds. The directors accordingly resolved to admit to the upper wards patients who could and would pay—not for their treatment, medical or surgical, but for their own food. No profit was to be or is made out of these payments; but even if there were a profit I doubt whether the building could be held to be used in any sense contrary to its proper use as a public charity. It is only being used so as to extend the purposes of the charity further. Nothing is paid for medicine, or nursing and attendance, or medical and surgical treatment. The difference between the cases of paying and non-paying patients will not deprive this hospital of its character as a building "solely occupied for purposes of public charity." I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has erred in the conclusion he has come to.

Traill v.

Partnership—Obligation on expiry of Partnership to renew, but without a term, whether enforceable—Agreements and Contracts.—Three medical practitioners, in 1869, entered into a contract of partnership for a period of ten years, and thereafter so long as they should agree, but subject to any of the partners being entitled to put an end to it at the 30th April 1879, or at the 30th April in any year thereafter, on notice given. The two senior partners bound themselves by a supplementary agreement, also entered into in 1869, "that on the termination of the fixed period of copartnership provided by the said contract" . . . "neither of them shall enter into any new arrangements connected with the carrying on of their profession and business in A without the concurrence and consent of the other, and, unless otherwise agreed, each of the said parties hereto shall then be entitled to retain an equal interest . . . in the present business, subject to deduction," &c.

Held that the supplementary agreement was not binding on the parties to it, for want of a definite and certain term.

PRIOR to 1860 the pursuer, Dr John Traill, had carried on a medical practice in Arbroath, in partnership with his elder brother, Dr William Traill, for many years. In 1860 Dr William Traill retired from practice, and the pursuer took into partnership the defender, Dr James A. Dewar. The contract of partnership then entered into was terminated by agreement in 1869, and a new contract was entered into between Drs Traill and Dewar, and Dr James Keith Anderson, whom they assumed as a third partner.

This contract of partnership provided, inter alia,—"First, the copartnership shall, notwithstanding the date of these presents, be held to have commenced upon the 1st day of May last 1869, and shall endure for the period of ten years from that date, that is, till the 30th day of April 1879, and thereafter so long as the partners shall agree, . . . but it shall be in the power of any of the partners to put an end to the copartnership at the said 30th day of April 1879, or at the 30th day of April in any year thereafter, provided such partner shall give notice in writing to his copartners of his intention to do so six months previous to the date at which he wishes to withdraw from or to terminate the copartnership."

The fourth head provided for the distribution of the profits, in payment of certain annual allowances to the partners, the surplus being divided equally. But no provision was made for the possible deficiency of the receipts to pay the stipulated allowances.

The tenth head provided for the winding up of the affairs of the partnership on its termination or dissolution.

In consequence of the contract in its fourth head not providing for a possible deficiency of receipts to pay the stipulated annual allowances to the partners, and for other reasons, a supplementary memorandum of agreement was entered into on 14th October 1869 between the pursuer and defender, the two senior partners.

Article 1 contained the altered agreement between the pursuer and defender as to the emoluments, and it was further provided in art. 2 that "the said parties hereto agree and bind themselves respectively that on the termination of the fixed period of copartnership provided by the said contract, being ten years from 1st May 1869, neither of them shall enter into any new arrangements connected with the carrying on of their profession and business in Arbroath without the concurrence and consent of the other, and, unless otherwise agreed, each of the said parties hereto shall then be entitled to retain an equal interest of not less than one-third in the present business, subject to the deduction of two pounds per week, or one hundred and four pounds per annum, for the services of an assistant, in terms of article sixth of the said contract, in case of absence or inability to attend to duty."

The original contract between the pursuer, the defender, and Dr Anderson was brought to an end at the expiry of the ten years on 30th April 1879, by notice given by the defender, and thereafter differences arose between the pursuer and the defender as to the obligations of the latter under the second head of the supplementary agreement.

The pursuer maintained that the defender was bound to remain in partnership with him for the period of their joint lives, or, at any rate, for a farther period of ten years, which had been the period of endurance of their two former contracts of partnership. He accordingly raised an action against the defender to compel him to enter into a formal contract either for life or for such usual and reasonable period as the Court should determine, and to account for his whole profits and emoluments from his practice since the expiry of the term of their former partnership at 30th April 1879.

The defender maintained that the supplementary agreement being indefinite, and without any certain term, was not binding on him, but, subject to all his pleas, he made offer to account to the pursuer, on the assumption of their partnership having been extended for one year from 30th April 1879, and tendered a sum in full of what might be found due on that footing.

This offer the pursuer declined.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) Upon a sound construction of the said supplementary agreement the defender is bound to enter into a partnership with the pursuer, which shall secure to the pursuer a life-interest in the business of the copartnership. (2) In any view, the defender is not entitled to limit the partnership to a single year, but is bound to enter into a partnership for such usual and reasonable period as may be fixed by the Court. No. 110.

Mar. 8, 1881.
Traill v.
Dewar.

The defender pleaded;—(2) The agreement founded on does not constitute any obligation upon the defender to enter into a copartnership with the pursuer, and no termini habiles of a contract of copartnership are therein contained. (4) Separatim, in any event, no contract is therein provided for longer than a year's duration.

The Lord Ordinary, on 5th January 1881, assolizied the defender from the conclusions of the summons.*

The pursuer reclaimed.

After hearing counsel, the Court continued the case to allow the defender an opportunity of considering whether he would not repeat the offer made by him at the commencement of the litigation. When the case was again called, the defender repeated the said offer at the bar, on condition that he was not to be subject to any farther proceedings for damages or interdict.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This may, and probably is, a hard case for the pursuer, who, at his age, and with apparently somewhat infirm health, may find that he has lost hold of the business in which he has been engaged for the greater part of his life, and that it has gone over to his younger and more active partner. But, at the same time, I cannot avoid agreeing with the Lord Ordinary, for I am of opinion that there are no materials to enable us to give effect to the conclusions of the summons.

The whole case depends on the second head of the supplementary agreement, which was introduced to remedy a defect in the original contract. The first part of that head provides "that on the termination of the fixed period of copartnership provided by the said contract, being ten years from 1st May 1869, neither of them (i.e., the pursuer and defender) shall enter into any new arrangements connected with the carrying on of their profession and business in

* NOTE.—(After stating the terms of the contract of copartnership of 1869, and relative supplementary agreement)—It is sufficiently clear that the parties intended, on the expiry of the existing contract, to carry on business in partnership. It will be observed, however, that nothing is provided as to the disposal of one-third share of the business in the event, which has occurred, of neither party desiring to have a third partner. But what is more material in the present question is, that there is no provision as to the duration of the partnership. In particular, it is not provided that it shall endure during the lifetime of the parties, and the Lord Ordinary can discover no data from which it is to be inferred that such was the agreement of parties. If the partnership is not to be for the lifetime of the parties, the Lord Ordinary does not know what would be a "usual and reasonable period" for the duration of such a partnership. It was suggested that, as the two previous partnerships in connection with this business had each been for a period of ten years, it ought to be inferred that this one was intended to be for a like period. But the Lord Ordinary cannot think that that would be a legitimate inference to draw. The Lord Ordinary is therefore of opinion that the supplementary agreement cannot be enforced against the defender to the effect of compelling him to enter into a new partnership with the pursuer, seeing that one of the essential terms of the partnership has not been fixed.

"The pursuer has an alternative conclusion for damages; but the Lord Ordinary thinks, in accordance with the principles laid down in the case of M'Arthur v. Lawson, 19th July 1877, 4 R. 1134, that the pursuer cannot recover damages."

Dewar.

Arbroath without the concurrence and consent of the other." Now, I think that unless a term is adjoined to this provision, it is inextricable, and cannot have any effect. A contract of this kind is capable of receiving effect, but only when it is so limited that it has a definite and certain end. The reason is obvious. In the present case there is unfortunately no such limitation.

I do not think it necessary to add more. The result is that this imperfect and informal agreement can receive no effect in a Court of law. At the same time the tender which the defender made at the commencement of the proceedings, and repeated to-day at the bar, is a very proper one in the circumstances, and should, in an honourable way, put an end to the dispute between the parties.

LORD YOUNG.—My opinion is also in favour of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and I would only explain, shortly, why we continued the case from the last hearing. It was not because we entertained any serious doubt about the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, but because we thought it not unreasonable, and certainly desirable, that the defender should renew the offer which he had made at the commencement of this litigation. I was of opinion that, taking the most favourable view of the case for the pursuer, the defender could not, under article 2 of the supplementary agreement, be bound for more than one year. I am far from saying that that view is a sound one; but the farthest point to which I think it possible to go is to hold that the clause of the original contract putting it in the power of any of the partners to bring it to an end at the 30th April 1879, or the 30th April in any subsequent year, was by implication part of the supplementary agreement, and that, therefore, if the partnership did continue after the lapse of the ten years for which the original contract was to run, it was an indefinite continuance, liable to be brought to an end, on notice, at the end of any one year. Otherwise the supplementary agreement would import an obligation on the partners to continue in partnership for the term of their natural lives,—a thing which cannot have been contemplated. In that view the defender, by offering to account for the profits of the year succeeding the ten years' partnership, has completely satisfied the utmost which the pursuer can possibly demand from him. We thought the offer proper and reasonable, and that the pursuer was ill-advised in not accepting it. We, therefore, gave time for the defender to consider whether he would not renew it. This he has done, and I have no doubt it will be honourably carried out without the necessity of its entering our judgment.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the judgment proposed by your Lordships. On an anxious consideration of the original contract and the supplementary agreement I am unable to adopt any construction which will warrant the conclusions of the action.

The truth of the matter seems to be, that the pursuer himself had no very accurate conception of his own rationes concludendi. Accordingly we have him proposing alternative conclusions, the effect of the latter of which is simply that because the parties have not made a formal and obligatory agreement for themselves the Court is asked to make a new one for them.

I therefore adopt the reasoning of the Lord Ordinary and of your Lordship.

THE COURT adhered.

 M'Meehin v.
 Russell and Tudhope.

Bill—Accommodation Bill—Blank stamp—Bankruptcy.—Held that a person who has obtained for his own accommodation a blank acceptance is barred by the acceptor's sequestration from making use of it thereafter.

Bill—Blank stamp—Indorsee—Reparation—Damages—Wrongous use of diligence.—In an action brought by the acceptor of a bill against the drawer and an indorsee, concluding for reduction of the bill, and damages, on the allegation that the bill had been signed blank by the pursuer, and delivered to the drawer for his accommodation prior to the pursuer's sequestration, and that the drawer had wrongously filled it up and indorsed it after the pursuer's sequestration, and that the indorsee had redelivered the bill to the drawer to enable him to obtain the pursuer's apprehension on a meditationes fugæ warrant which had followed, held that the pursuer had set forth a relevant case against the drawer of the bill, but not against the indorsee, as it was not averred that he knew that the bill had been delivered blank to the drawer for his accommodation prior to the sequestration of the acceptor.

Issue.—Forms of issues to try a question of wrongous filling up of and indorsement of a blank bill, and of wrongous apprehension and imprisonment on a meditationes fugæ warrant.

THIS was an action by John M'Meehin, iron-merchant, Coatbridge, against Robert Russell, Carluke, and Alexander Tudhope, Carluke, concluding (1) for reduction of a bill for £100 which bore to be drawn by the defender Russell upon the pursuer, and to be indorsed to the other defender Tudhope, dated 1st March 1879, and payable twelve months after date; (2) for damages.

The pursuer made the following averment:—He and the defender Russell were in the habit of granting to each other accommodation-bills, and for this purpose were in the habit of sending blank bill stamps for signature. In accordance with this practice the pursuer signed and delivered to the defender Russell two blank bill stamps in July and another in October 1877 for the accommodation of Russell.

(Cond. 4) "The pursuer's estates were sequestrated in December 1877, after which no further transactions of any kind whatever took place between him and the defender Russell, and no bills or bill stamps have since been signed by the pursuer, either for the defender or any other person. The pursuer was discharged under the sequestration on the report of Mr Henry M'Lachlan, accountant, Coatbridge, the trustee, on payment of a composition, in December 1879. The defender, although well aware of said sequestration, and of the whole proceedings therein, never lodged any claim in respect of the bill for £100." (Cond. 5)

"In March thereafter the pursuer arranged to go with his family to Australia, and paid half of the passage money—the steamer being timed to leave on 31st March 1880. He had then in view lucrative employment abroad, and the defender Russell, who was aware of this, and of the pursuer's intention to leave Scotland, called upon the pursuer and urged upon him to arrange for payment of two bills which had arrived at maturity, and which had been drawn in accordance with the foresaid practice for the pursuer's accommodation prior to the sequestration."

(Cond. 6) "The pursuer was apprehended on 8th March 1880 on his (Russell's) instructions as in meditationes fugæ. The debt on which the proceedings were taken by the defender was set forth as a sum of £100, contained in a bill alleged to have been drawn by the defender upon and accepted by the pursuer, and dated 1st March 1879, payable twelve months after date, and indorsed by the defender Russell to the defender Tudhope, who was said to be the then holder thereof. In the petition presented for the pursuer's apprehension and detention the defender Russell stated in his condescendence, inter alia, that the pursuer became indebted to him in said sum of £100, for which the bill was granted; that he indorsed the bill to the other defender Tudhope for value; that in the event of the pursuer failing to pay the contents the said defender Tudhope would fall back upon Russell for recourse; and that thus the defender Russell had an interest to apprehend and detain the pursuer. The petition in said fugæ proceedings was presented on 6th March 1880, by which time the pursuer had taken out and paid for the passage to Australia of himself, his wife, and children, a circumstance well known to both defenders, or at all events, to the defender Russell. In order to accomplish this the defender Tudhope gave facilities to the defender Russell by reinstating the latter in the possession of the bill, which was founded on and produced in the proceedings." (Cond. 8) "The pursuer never heard of said bill alleged to be due on 4th March 1880 until he was apprehended as aforesaid, nor was he ever asked for payment of its contents until he was in custody, and within the precincts of the Airdrie Court-House, where it was presented at the instance of the defender Tudhope, who in turn had got it back for this purpose from the other defender Russell. Thereafter the defender Tudhope protested the said bill, and caused it to be recorded and published against the pursuer. Both the presentation of said bill at the time and place specified, and the subsequent publication of the protest by the defender Tudhope, were illegal acts, and were wrongously and maliciously done, with the view of securing the pursuer's detention in the event of the defender Russell failing in his fugæ proceedings. For these acts the defender Tudhope is liable in damages to the pursuer along with the defender Russell." (Cond. 9) "The whole of the proceedings in meditatione fugæ were taken by Russell most wrongously and maliciously, for the purpose of extorting money from the pursuer which he was not actually due, a circumstance known also to the other defender Tudhope, and to his law-agent, Mr Robert Muir, writer, Lanark, who also acted as agent for Russell." (Cond. 11) "The pursuer was, as the defenders well knew, or at all events as the defender Russell well knew, due nothing to them, or either of them, when said proceedings were adopted against him, and the statements on which the defender Russell obtained said warrant for the pursuer's imprisonment were false, and were made by the defender Russell most wrongously, unjustly, and maliciously, and in the knowledge that they were false, for the purpose of securing the pursuer's imprisonment, in the hope that the defender would thereby extort money from the pursuer to which he was not on any ground entitled."

The Lord Ordinary approved of the following issues:—"1. Whether the bill-stamp on which the pretended bill, No. 8 of process, is written was signed by the pursuer when altogether blank, or at least when blank in many of the essentials of a bill, and was delivered to the defender Robert Russell in that condition prior to the sequestration of the pursuer in December 1877? And whether the said bill-stamp was filled up or caused to be filled up by the said defender, and was by him, after the said sequestration of the pursuer, wrongfully indorsed to the defender Alexander Tudhope, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? 2. Whether, on or about 8th March 1880, the pursuer was wrongfully apprehended at or near Coatbridge on an application at the instance of the defender Robert Russell against him as in meditatione fugæ, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? 3. Whether, on or about 8th March 1880, the pursuer was brought before David Davidson Balfour, Esq.,

Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, at Airdrie, under the said application No. 111. at the instance of the defender, the said Robert Russell, against the pursuer as in meditatione fugæ? And whether under the said proceedings in meditatione fugæ, and on the application of the defender Robert Russell (or of another or others for whom he is responsible) the pursuer was wrongfully incarcerated in the prison of Airdrie on said 8th day of March, and detained there as a prisoner till the following day by virtue of a warrant granted by the said D. D. Balfour, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? 4. Whether the bill, No. 8 of process, was indorsed by the defender Robert Russell to the defender Alexander Tudhope 'without recourse,' and whether the defender Alexander Tudhope wrongfully re-delivered the said bill to the defender Robert Russell for the purpose of having the pursuer wrongfully apprehended and detained under said application as in meditatione fugæ, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? 5. Whether the defender Alexander Tudhope, on or about 8th March 1880, wrongfully protested, or caused the said bill to be protested, against the pursuer for non-payment, and thereafter wrongfully caused the said protest to be recorded in the Sheriff Court Books of the county of Lanark, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

M'Meehan v.
Russell and Tudhope.

"Damages laid at £1000 sterling."

Both defenders reclaimed.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—With regard to the first issue I do not think there is any difficulty. The statements of the pursuer are quite distinct. He says that he was in the habit of signing blank stamps for the defender Russell, and in particular that he gave two such bills in July 1877; that these two bills were entirely for the accommodation of Russell, no value being received by the pursuer himself; that one of these bills was filled up and put into the circle, and that when it became due in October 1877 it was replaced by another blank stamp which the pursuer signed and gave to Russell. Now, the pursuer says that one or other of these blank stamps—either the remaining one of the two which he delivered in July, or the one delivered in October—is the blank stamp on which the bill charged on is made; and in confirmation of this he says, that having been sequestrated in December 1877, he did not sign or issue any stamp or bill after that date. Now, the issue which he proposes is in these terms:—"Whether the bill-stamp on which the pretended bill is written was signed by the pursuer when altogether blank, or at least when blank in many of the essentials of a bill, and was delivered to the defender Robert Russell in that condition prior to the sequestration of the pursuer in December 1877? and whether the said bill-stamp was filled up or caused to be filled up by the said defender, and was by him after the said sequestration of the pursuer wrongfully indorsed to the defender Alexander Tudhope, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

Now, I think that this issue is entirely supported by the record, because although the delivery of a blank stamp is undoubtedly an authority to fill the bill up with the amount carried by the stamp, or if the amount is, as seems to be the case here, written on the bill, then with that amount; yet, though that is clear in law, it is also clear that if the bill is merely for the accommodation of the party receiving it, and if the party signing the bill becomes bankrupt and is sequestrated, it is out of the question that the holder can use it after the sequestration. The notion of rearing up after sequestration as a debt a bill signed for the sole accommodation of the holder is entirely contrary to the fundamental

No. 111. principles of bankrupt law. I do not entertain any doubt, therefore, about the first issue. I think we should allow it.

Mar. 9, 1881.
M'Meehan v.
Russell and Tudhope.

With regard to the next two issues I shall postpone what I have to say until I have considered the fourth and fifth issues. These issues are directed against the other defender Tudhope, and he is sought to be made liable for the proceedings taken against the pursuer, on the ground that he was in meditatione fugæ, the debt on which the defender Russell founded the petition being the bill in question. Now, if Mr Tudhope had been acting in concert with Russell, in full knowledge of the circumstances that the bill was given solely for the accommodation of Russell, and that it was delivered before, but was not issued till after, the sequestration, there would be a great deal to say for making Tudhope liable. But there is no averment which comes up to that. What is said is that the bill was indorsed by Russell to Tudhope, and that when Russell proceeded against the pursuer as being in meditatione fugæ "the defender Tudhope gave facilities to the defender Russell by reinstating the latter in the possession of the bill which was founded on and produced in the proceedings." Now, if Tudhope was an indorsee for value—and it is not alleged that he was not—the crucial matter is this, that if the bill is honoured then the debt due by Russell to Tudhope is paid, but, if it is not honoured, the debt due by Russell still exists. Thus it is just as much for the interest of Russell as it is for the interest of Tudhope to get the bill enforced; and if the debtor in the bill is in meditatione fugæ there is an interest both in Tudhope and Russell to prevent that fuga. There is therefore nothing irregular in Tudhope being a party to these proceedings. There is nothing wrong, unless on the assumption that Tudhope was in the knowledge that the whole debt was a sham, and the bill entirely for the accommodation of Russell, which is not alleged. The only other averment which at all tells against Tudhope is in these terms:—"The pursuer never heard of the said bill alleged to be due on 4th March 1880 until he was apprehended as aforesaid, nor was he ever asked for payment of its contents until he was in custody and within the precincts of the Airdrie Court-house, where it was presented to him at the instance of the defender Tudhope, who in turn had got it back for this purpose from the other defender Russell. Thereafter the defender Tudhope protested the said bill, and caused it to be recorded and published against the pursuer." Now, I cannot see that Mr Tudhope has done anything wrong in this. It was quite proper that he should act in this way. Everything would be wrong that he has done if it was done in the knowledge of the prior proceedings by Russell, but if he did not know about these proceedings he was just availing himself of his legal rights as indorsee of the bill.

There is but one other averment of the least importance against Tudhope, and it is contained in condescendence 11. It is there said,—"The pursuer was, as the defenders well knew, or at all events as the defender Russell well knew, due nothing to them or either of them." Now, this is just one of those averments which as in questions of relevancy must be taken as meaning nothing more than the smallest substance which the words will bear—that is to say, in the present case that Russell "well knew," and not that Tudhope "well knew." But the pursuer must go much further than that. He must aver that Tudhope was aiding and abetting the legal wrong of which he says Russell was guilty. I think, therefore, we must disallow the issues against Tudhope. And this makes the question regarding the two remaining issues more simple; and I should propose, if your Lordships should agree with me, that one issue should try the whole questions raised by the second and third issues, which would run in these terms :—" Whether, on or about 8th March 1880, the pursuer was wrongfully apprehended at or near Coathridge on an application at the instance of the defender Robert Russell against him as in meditatione fugæ, and was thereafter brought before the Sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, at Airdrie, under the said application, and wrongfully incarcerated in the prison of Airdrie on said 8th day of March, and detained there as a prisoner till the following day by virtue of a warrant granted by the said Sheriff-substitute, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer ? "

M'Meehin v.
Russell and Tudhope.

LORD DEAS.—As regards the first issue I am of the same opinion. What is said about the bill having been signed when blank cannot of course affect it,—assuming it not to have been filled up fraudulently, which is not alleged. The use subsequently made of it is the question, and is rightly raised by the issue.

The next question is whether any ground of action has been stated against Tudhope ? I am very clearly of opinion that there has not. I took the liberty of mentioning in the course of the discussion the case of Marshall against Dobson,¹ which was debated in a hearing in presence between your Lordship now in the chair and myself a great many years ago, in which the late Lord President Hope observed, quoting the "Antiquary" for his authority, that a fugæ warrant had always been esteemed a very dangerous sort of diligence to deal with. I am not surprised, therefore, that Mr Tudhope should have wished to have nothing to do with it. Even if Tudhope, therefore, had known that Russell wanted the bill back for the purpose of suing out a meditatione fugæ warrant, I think that was not a reason why he should have agreed to indorse the bill, but rather the reverse. In short, I cannot, therefore, see any ground of action against Tudhope. That disposes of what were proposed as the 4th and 5th issues.

As to what will now stand as the 2d and 3d issues, I cannot see why they should not be in one. In some cases there may have been wrongous apprehension and no imprisonment, or there may have been a doubt about the one and not about the other. But here the pursuer has no interest to separate them, as the apprehension and imprisonment are one ground of action. To allow two issues here would be a mere abuse of words.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordships as to the first issue. It is rested on the circumstance that the blank bill-stamp was not filled up till after the date of sequestration ; and as that is distinctly stated in the record the pursuer is, I think, entitled to the issue.

I also agree that the second and third issues should form one issue. But upon the fourth issue I have had considerable doubt. When I first read the record my impression was that Tudhope had been acting in concert with Russell in the full knowledge of the previous proceedings ; and if that had been distinctly averred I should have been of opinion that an issue should have been allowed as against Tudhope. On this the record is rather apt to mislead. In the 6th article of the condescendence it is stated that Russell caused the pursuer to be apprehended on a fugæ warrant, and that in order to accomplish this the defender Tudhope gave facilities to the defender Russell by reinstating the latter in the possession of the bill, which was founded on and produced in the proceedings. In condescendence 8 it is set out that Tudhope, after giving the bill to Russell, got it back again, and presented it for payment, and afterwards "caused it to be recorded and published against the pursuer," and that "both the presentation of the said bill at the time and place specified, and the subsequent publication of the protest by the defender Tudhope, were illegal acts." Then, in condescendence 9, the pursuer says that he believes and avers "that this was done by the said defender, and the whole of the proceedings in meditatione fugæ taken by Russell most wrongously and maliciously, for the purpose of extorting money from the pursuer which was not actually due,—a circumstance also known to the other defender Tudhope, and to his law-agent, Mr Robert Muir, writer, Lanark, who also acted as agent for Russell." And in condescendence 11 it is said that the "pursuer was, as the defenders well knew, or, at all events, as the defender Russell well knew, due nothing to them or either of them, when the said proceedings were adopted against him." Now, when I read these allegations I was under the impression that it was intended to be averred, although it may not be very aptly done, that Tudhope knew that the bill was an accommodation bill, and acted throughout in that knowledge. But, as it is now admitted by the pursuer that this was not intended to be the meaning of the averments, I do not differ as to the fourth issue.

On the fifth issue I have no difficulty in concurring. My difficulty applied only to the fourth issue.

LORD SHAND.—I am clearly of opinion that there is no case against Tudhope.

I shall assume that Russell knew that he had no right to fill up the bill and put it in the circle. He did fill it up, however, and indorsed it. It is not alleged that Tudhope was not an indorsee for value, and, in that state of the facts, I think he was entitled to do diligence on it. Farther, in the view which Tudhope must have taken of the matter, Russell was also interested in diligence being done on the bill, because, unless it was paid, he would still be debtor in £100 to Tudhope. In these circumstances I think it is impossible to say that because Tudhope gave back the bill in the way alleged on the record, and with a view to diligence at the instance of Russell, he incurred any liability to a claim of damage at the pursuer's instance. I approve of the proposed issues in the case against Russell.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor; disallow the fourth and fifth issues; approve of the issues as now adjusted, No. 15 of process, and appoint them to be the issues for trying the cause; remit to the Lord Ordinary to assolzie the defender Tudhope, and find him entitled to expenses."

Judicial Factor—Special Powers—Unworkable Trust—Exhumation of dead body.—By his trust-disposition and settlement the late William Tennant, of Eatonville, Ayr, directed his trustees to erect upon the place of his interment in the New Cemetery at Ayr a mausoleum, which was to cost £500. After his decease he was interred in the said cemetery in a plot of ground belonging to a deceased relative, whose representatives refused to permit the erection of a mausoleum upon it. On a petition by the judicial factor who had been appointed to execute the trust, authority was granted by Lord Fraser to exhume the body and re-inter it in another part of the said cemetery at the sight of the Sheriff-substitute at Ayr, and to erect a mausoleum upon the place of re-interment.¹

Succession—Acceleration of distribution of residue.—The late Mr Thomas Elder, Edinburgh, died on 5th December 1869, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement for the following purposes, viz., first, payment of debts; second, payment of the provision in his marriage-contract in favour of his wife (being an annuity of £300); third and fourth, certain special legacies in favour of relations and charities, amounting to £5050; fifth, "that my trustees shall hold the whole rest, residue, and remainder of my estate remaining after fulfilment of the above written provisions, with the income arising therefrom, until the death of my wife, and shall out of such residue and income make payment of any other legacies or provisions I may leave by any writing to be hereafter signed by me expressive of my will although not formally executed; sixth, that my trustees shall, upon the death of my wife, set aside out of the residue of my estate the sum of £10,000, and shall either hold the same themselves or invest the same in the name of the general trustees for the time being of the Free Church of Scotland and their successors in office, or in the name of any other persons, as my trustees shall think best, in trust, to apply the free interest and profits accruing annually from the said sum, after deduction of all expenses, as a provision or endowment of a Professor of Natural Science in the said New College of Edinburgh in connection with the Free Church of Scotland;" seventh, upon the death of his wife to apply £7000 in building a territorial church, and £3000 as a partial endowment for the minister; and lastly, "after all the above purposes shall have been fulfilled, I appoint and direct my trustees to apply and pay over the whole residue and remainder of my estate, if such there shall be, to and for the use and benefit of such four of the Schemes of the Free Church of Scotland, and in such proportions as to my trustees shall appear most expedient." The residue of Mr Elder's estate as brought out in the residue account, after payment of legacies, but subject to his widow's annuity, amounted to £27,000. A special case was presented in February 1881, during the lifetime of the testator's widow, by Mr Elder's trustees, of the first part, and by the General Treasurer and College Committee of the Free Church, of the second part, for the opinion of the Court, whether the trustees were entitled to pay the £10,000 during the widow's life (she not objecting) under the sixth purpose of the settlement.²

Ship—Charter-party—Cesser clause, effect of—Bill of Lading, Charterer's obligation under.—A vessel was chartered for the voyage from Greenock to Monte Video at a slump freight of £550, and the charter-party bore that £150 was to be payable on clearing at Greenock, and "bills of lading for the balance payable abroad to be taken (sic) by the captain, on receipt of which documents all responsibility of charterer to cease." The vessel was loaded chiefly with coal. The charterer divided the slump freight among the various items of the cargo, and presented bills of lading, together making up the cumulo sum, for the master's signature, the charterer himself being consignee. In that for the coal there was entered 453½ tons, freight 22s. 6d. per ton. This the master signed, but the bill of lading had a note at the foot "weight and contents unknown." On arrival at Monte Video, the master, waiving his lien for freight, delivered the coal, which turned out only 398 tons, as weighed there. The agents for the charterer, in settling for the balance of freight, retained for coal alleged to be short delivered £24, and freight applicable thereto £62.

In an action by the owners against the charterer for the balance of the freight stipulated for in the charter-party, held (1) that the action could not be sustained on the charter-party, in respect that, bills of lading having been granted for the freight, the cesser clause put an end to the charterer's obligation under the charter-party; (2) that the bill of lading only entitled the shipowners to recover the freight of the 398 tons proved to have been delivered; and (3) that as it had not been proved that any part of the cargo shipped had not been delivered, the defender was not entitled to retain the £24.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

A CHARTER-PARTY of the ship "Alice," of Newport, then lying at Greenock, was entered into, on 9th July 1878, between Thomas Beynon & Co., the owners, and James Speirs Kenneth, merchant, Glasgow, the charterer. The vessel was to load at Greenock, and proceed to Monte Video, "and there deliver the said cargo, in the usual and customary manner, agreeably to bills of lading," "on being paid freight, say lump sum of £550 stg. to Monte Video. Clyde dues on cargo to be paid by ship; ship guaranteeing to carry, at least, 500 tons dead weight, the freight being payable as follows, say, at least, £150 sterling on clearing at custom-house, less 6 per cent for all charges. Bills of lading for the balance payable abroad to be taken by the captain, on receipt of which documents all responsibility of charterer to cease."

In pursuance of this charter-party a cargo was shipped, which consisted chiefly of coal and coke. Five bills of lading were prepared by the charterer, dividing the slump sum of freight stipulated for in the charter-party, viz., £550, among the several articles of the cargo. The bill of lading for the coal (which bore that delivery was to be made to the charterer's order or to assigns) stated the quantity shipped at 453 tons 10 cwts., and the freight thereon at 22s. 6d. per ton, that being the rate calculated to produce the necessary proportion of the slump freight. But the bill of lading had a note printed at the foot "weight and contents unknown." £152, 1s. 5d. was paid in advance to the captain at Greenock in terms of the charter-party, and the bills of lading were then signed by him, and transmitted by Mr Kenneth to his agents, Bates, Stokes, & Co., Monte Video. No. 114

Kenneth.

When delivered at Monte Video the cargo of coal turned out only 398 tons 2 cwts., according to the return of the weigher employed by Bates, Stokes, & Co., the consignees. The master did not interfere in the weighing, beyond protesting against the correctness of the machine used, which was a small moveable steelyard, only capable of weighing about 3 cwts. at a time, and placed on the deck.

Bates, Stokes, & Co., in settling the freight with the master at Monte Video, deducted for coal short delivered 55 tons 8 cwts. at 8s. 9d. per ton, which they refused to pay.

T. Beynon & Co., in consequence, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow against Mr Kenneth for the sum of £86, 11s. 3d., and interest.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In terms of the foresaid charter-party the defender is liable, as charterer, for the balance of freight sued for. (2) As consignee of the cargo the defender is liable under the said charter-party and bills of lading, and also at common law, for payment of the said balance of freight. (4) The captain of the said vessel having delivered the said cargo to the agents of the defender on the agreement and faith that the freight would be paid on completion of the discharge the defender is liable for said balance of freight.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having agreed by said charter-party that the defender's responsibility should cease on bills of lading being granted, the defender ought to be assoilzied, with expenses. (2) The pursuers having granted bills of lading for 453½ tons coal, and having failed to deliver 55½ tons thereof, the defender is entitled to set off as against pursuers' claim the value of said coals short delivered, and the freight applicable thereto as fixed by pursuers. (3) The said 453½ tons having been actually put on board, and bills of lading granted therefor, and the pursuers having failed to deliver the same to the extent foresaid, the defender's right to set off the value and freight applicable thereto ought to be upheld, and decree of absolvitor pronounced, with expenses. (4) The pursuers, in any event, are only entitled to freight per bill of lading on the quantity actually delivered.

A proof was led, the import of which was as follows:—

The coal was not weighed on behalf of the shipowners as it was put on board, the master, as the ship was chartered for a slump freight, acting on the footing that he had no concern with the weights shipped.

The evidence as to the true weight shipped was very conflicting. The way-bills of the Merryton Coal Company, who supplied the coal, as sworn to by their clerk and weigher, shewed 468 tons 13 cwts. sent forward from the pit.

In the charge-sheet of the Caledonian Railway Company, as sworn to by their mineral superintendent, the quantity was stated as 462 tons 2 cwts., but by the company's weights at Greenock 24 tons 13 cwts. of that quantity was short shipped, leaving 437 tons 9 cwts. as the quantity actually put on board, as sworn to by their servant in charge of the shipment of coal at that port.

The amount entered in the bill of lading, 453½ tons, did not correspond with any of these figures, and Mr Kenneth's own clerk admitted that he

No. 114. had made a clerical error to the extent of 10 tons in making out the invoice and bill of lading, and that the amount should have been 443½ tons.
 Mar. 10, 1881. Beynon, &c. v. Kenneth.

The Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the defender shipped on board the pursuers' ship 'Alice' at Greenock a cargo consisting chiefly of coals, for which the master granted bills of lading: Finds that, on delivery of said bills of lading, the defender's liability under a previous charter-party libelled on ceased in terms of said charter-party, and that the pursuers are not entitled to sue for the lump sum of freight therein stipulated: Finds that the defender, as consignee and owner of the cargo so shipped, through his agents, Messrs Bates, Stokes, & Co., received delivery at Monte Video of the cargo so shipped, and is liable in payment of freight therefor under the said bills of lading: Finds that the pursuers have proved that the bills of lading are granted for a larger quantity of coals than were, in fact, loaded on board said ship by 10 tons, the freight of which is £11, 5s.: Finds that the balance of freight due under said bills of lading, after making said deduction, and after giving credit for the sums paid to account by the defender as condescended on, is £75, 6s. 3d. sterling, for which decerns against the defender in favour of pursuers: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "NOTE.—. . . The first question is, what quantity of coals was shipped? The master signed a bill of lading for 453½ tons; and this, as was said in M'Lean and Hope v. Fleming (9 Macph. H. L. 38), is prima facie evidence against the shipowner that such a quantity was actually shipped. The shipowners have not rebutted this presumption except to a small extent, for their own case shews that about 443 tons were shipped.

"The next point is whether there was right delivery of this quantity at Monte Video. The captain and the witness Evans say that all the coals shipped were delivered, and they are supported by the other witnesses so far as they are able to speak on this subject, and by the absence of any suggestion of the possibility of the coals shipped being made away with. On the other hand, there is reason to suspect the accuracy of the weighing at Monte Video, upon which the defender's agents relied when they retained part of the balance of freight which was due according to the bill of lading and freight-note in process. I am therefore of opinion that upon the evidence the pursuers have made a right delivery of the goods shipped, and that the consignees at Monte Video were not justified in retaining part of the freight due for these goods.

"The defender, however, maintains that he is free from responsibility for the freight sued for by the clause in the charter-party, 'bills of lading for the balance payable abroad to be taken by the captain, on receipt of which documents all responsibility of charterer to cease.' And it appears that the bills of lading were made out and apportioned to the different parts of the cargo in such terms and at such rates as to bring out the exact amount of the lump freight stipulated for. The clause in question is not very accurately expressed, because the master makes or grants, and does not take the bills of lading; but that inaccuracy may pass, as the meaning cannot be doubtful. Nor does it seem to be material that the cesser of the charterer's liability is to take place upon delivery of the bills of lading, and not, as in all the reported cases relating to clauses of this kind, 'upon the loading of the cargo,' or 'as soon as the cargo is loaded.' It may be more for the ship's advantage that the charterer is not absolved until bills of lading have been adjusted in such terms as to give the shipowners the same rights against the consignees and the cargo as they have against the charterer. But it seems that the construction of the charter-party in regard to the liberation of the charterer must be practically the same as if the clause had been couched in the most familiar terms. The effect of this kind of clause has been the subject of discussion in numerous English cases, from Ogleby v. Iglesias downwards. References to all of them may be found in the two latest cases,

The Sheriff (Clark) adhered on appeal.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

Argued for him;—The cesser clause in the charter-party put an end to his obligation thereunder. The Sheriff was therefore right in holding that the action could not proceed on the charter-party. But he had gone wrong in holding that he was liable notwithstanding on the bill of lading. The charter-party had stipulated that on bills of lading "payable abroad" being granted the charterer's liability should cease. The bills of lading had been granted in conformity therewith. The charterer's name did not appear on them, and he undertook no obligation thereunder. It was indeed an inherent condition of a bill of lading that freight should be earned by the carriage of the goods, but that was also a condition of carriage at common law, enforceable by the master and owners' common law lien for freight. All that a bill of lading in such terms as that in question did was to fix the rate and to give the master and owners a ground which also bear more directly on the present question—French v. Gerber (45 L. J. C. P. 880, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 737), and Sanguinetti v. Pacific Steam Navigation Company (46 L. J., Q. B. 105, L. R. 2 Q. B. Div. 238). These cases have arisen out of the efforts of shipowners to fix upon charterers liability in spite of this clause, and two points have been made clear by the judgments of the Court—(1) that when the clause is expressed with the ordinary generality and clearness all liability ceases whether antecedent or posterior to the loading; and (2) that it ceases (with perhaps an exception in the case of antecedent liabilities, for which no lien is given) without respect to any lien which may or may not be given by the contract. Here it may be remarked the charter-party is peculiar, in so far as it has not the words which generally follow the clause under consideration conferring a lien for freight, dead freight, and demurrage; but as the claim is for freight, which is protected by a lien at common law, no question is suggested by the omission of the lien clause. It was argued, however, that as the defender was owner and consignee of the goods shipped he cannot be absolved by this clause. The answer to this is that the contract declares that his liability ceases in a certain event, which has occurred, and that it is the province of the Court to construe, not to make the contract. This point was distinctly decided by the Queen's Bench Division in the case of Sanguinetti cited, the observations in which conclusively shew what the contract is, and that a charterer may have good reason for being relieved from liability even when he is owner of the cargo and ships it to his own agent. But it is evident that the liability which is thus discharged is only the defender's liability under the charter-party, and no more was determined in the case referred to. That decision expressly left open the question whether by obtaining delivery of the goods through his agent the charterer may not incur a liability to the ship entirely independent of the charter. Now, in this case I am of opinion that the charter ceased to be an operative contract when the bills of lading were delivered. But upon the bills of lading the defender was designated as consignee, the cargo was delivered upon his order to Bates, Stokes, & Company at Monte Video, his agents, who, as the correspondence shews, sold it on his account. In these circumstances it is impossible to dispute that apart from the charter-party, and even if the charter-party had never existed, an obligation to pay freight lies upon the defender in virtue of his receiving the cargo under the bills of lading, unless there be something to shew that no contract to pay freight could be inferred from such receipt. Here there is nothing of that kind, and I can only hold the cesser clause in the charter-party to put an end to the obligations under that contract. It cannot affect the separate and distinct contract created by the shipment of the goods and their delivery under the bills of lading.—See also authorities in Bell's Principles, sec. 421. A deduction from the freight claimed to the extent of £11, 5s., the freight having been calculated upon 453 tons instead of 443, the quantity actually shipped, must however be made."

Kenneth.

Beynon, &c. v.

of action against the holder receiving delivery, if the master happened to part with his lien. The owners had therefore mistaken their remedy, and come against the wrong party. It was for the very purpose of clearing himself of all responsibility for freight that the charterer had required the charter-party and bills of lading to be so framed. It made no difference that the consignees were his agents.¹ But even assuming that the action was well laid on the bill of lading, he could not be liable under it for more than was carried, and the proof shewed that no more than 398 tons was carried. It also shewed that there was short delivery to the extent of at least 45 tons.

Argued for the pursuers;—Though the number of tons alleged to be shipped was entered in the bill of lading, the owners had as little concern with the actual number shipped as with the rate of freight which the charterer chose to insert. The master was particular in signing for weight unknown, and for a good reason. The contract of affreightment was for a slump sum, and the owners' obligation was implemented on carrying the cargo delivered to them, be it more or less. Now, it was clear on the proof that the weighing at one end or other of the voyage, and it might be confidently affirmed at both ends, was erroneous, but it was proved satisfactorily that all that was shipped was delivered. Therefore the slump freight was earned. What the defender sought to do was to ignore the terms of the charter-party altogether, and transform a contract for a slump freight into one at a certain rate per ton carried. He was for ignoring the obligation on him to pay a slump freight. The cesser clause in the charter-party might have the effect contended for, if its conditions were observed. But then the main condition was that bills of lading for the balance of freight were to be granted. Now, the defender was founding on the cesser clause as if this condition were fulfilled, which it was only if he admitted that the bill of lading set forth the freight due, and he was at the same time repudiating the bill of lading, and maintaining that it erroneously set forth the freight due in respect less was carried than was entered in it. But the figures were his own, and were calculated so as to bring out the requisite amount of the slump freight. If the number of tons entered was too great, the rate per ton was too small. The result of the defender's contention was that if he was right on the bill of lading, then bills of lading for the balance of freight had not been granted. Therefore the cesser clause did not take effect, and he was liable on the charter-party. But if, to give him the benefit of the charter-party, the bill of lading was to be held as covering the balance of freight, then he was liable in respect that the consignees, as his agents, received delivery. He could not be allowed by a mere juggle to get rid of his liability to pay a slump freight.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If we were to apply to this case certain strict rules in the construction of charter-parties I should have entertained doubts whether the action could be entertained at all, at least as far as the claim for freight is concerned.

I should have been inclined to hold that the cesser clause, as it is technically termed in this charter-party, with the provision that the balance of freight should be payable abroad, excluded this action altogether. It has been well fixed | No. 114.

 that the effect of such a clause is to leave the owner's security for the balance of the freight to his lien over the cargo, and to his remedy against the consignee ^{Mar 10, 1881.}
 abroad; and in the recent case of Sanguinetti it was laid down that this rule did ^{Heynon, &c. v.}
 not necessarily suffer exception, although the consignees abroad were the agents of ^{Kenneth.} the charterer at home. There might be, as was held in that case, good reasons why the freight should be, in the first instance, recovered abroad, although, if the consignees failed to satisfy the freight, after proceedings were taken, or if the lien proved insufficient to realise the amount, the ultimate responsibility might rest with the charterer.

But this question is somewhat technical, and at this stage of the proceedings in the present case I am unwilling to decide the case upon it. The view I take of it is a very short one. In regard to the claim of £24 for coals alleged to have been short delivered, I am of opinion that the defender has failed to prove that more was put on board at Greenock than was delivered at Monte Video.
 On the other hand, I am of opinion that the pursuers have failed to prove that more was delivered at Monte Video than the 398 tons 2 cwt. acknowledged by the defender. In regard to the loading at Greenock, although the bill of lading acknowledged receipt of 453 tons, it is admitted by the defender that that quantity was in excess of the amount actually put on board by at any rate ten tons. The evidence on this subject is so unsatisfactory as to leave the exact amount subject to the greatest doubt. I am inclined to infer that there must be great laxity in weighing cargoes of this kind at Greenock. The amount sent down to the quay at Glasgow to be loaded on board the barque "Alice" was, according to the Merryton Coal Company, 468 tons 13 cwt. Robert Donald, in the employment of the Caledonian Railway Company at Greenock, says the amount put on board was 437 tons 9 cwt., while the defender's servant, John Stirling, says the real amount was 443½ tons.

It is proved, however, that when the coals were weighed at Monte Video the weights only indicated 398 tons, and I am of opinion that there is no sufficient evidence that any more was delivered; and although criticisms were made on the mode and mechanism employed in the process of weighing at the foreign port there is nothing to set against the results so obtained. I do not doubt that the cargo was faithfully carried by the master, but the freight could only be earned by delivery, and I do not think that it is proved that more than 398 tons were in point of fact delivered.

The result, in my opinion, is that the pursuers must have decree for the £24, 4s. 9d. retained from their freight as value of the cargo said to have been shipped, but not delivered, and that beyond this the action must fail. This opinion of course proceeds not on a determination of the fact, which I do not find sufficient evidence to decide, but upon the burden of proof incumbent upon either party.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The Sheriff-substitute has not entertained this cause as an action on the charter-party, and I think he was right in not doing so. But he holds that the action is well founded as laid on the bill of lading, and here I agree with your Lordship that he has taken an erroneous view. The reason why the action cannot proceed upon the charter-party is that the cesser clause declares "bills of lading for the balance payable abroad to be taken by the captain, on receipt of which documents all responsi-

No. 114. bility of charterer to cease." This clause I interpret in the same manner as your Lordship does.

Mar. 10, 1881.
Beynon, &c. v.
Kenneth.

The charter-party embraces an obligation on the shipowner to receive on board a cargo, proceed to the port of discharge, and there deliver. It involves, therefore, a contract for the carriage of goods. The bill of lading, on the other hand, is simply a contract for the carriage of goods. It has, indeed, by mercantile law, certain important effects in passing the property. These have been introduced by custom and decision, but in its own nature it is simply a contract for the carriage of goods.

The meaning of the cesser clause in the charter-party is that when bills of lading have been granted for an amount sufficient to cover the freight, then the liability of the charterer under the charter-party shall cease, i.e., that there shall not be double contracts to the same end. It is extremely convenient in practice that this should be so. There is always the possibility of dispute as to the due execution of the contract of carriage. Such disputes do not usually arise until the completion of the voyage, when the discharge takes place, and it is obviously convenient that all such disputes should be raised and determined at the port of delivery, and hence that the creation of liability under the bill of lading should discharge that under the charter-party.

In the present case bills of lading were granted to the full amount required by the charter-party. There was a point here, I may say in passing, which did a little perplex me. Agreeing as I do with your Lordship that it is not proved that a larger quantity of coal was put on board the ship than was actually delivered, there was this perplexity arising, that in that view bills of lading had not been granted or should not have been granted for an amount to cover the whole freight stipulated, and that therefore to the extent of the deficiency the cesser clause was not properly brought into operation. But though I agree that it is not proved against the shipowner that the cargo taken in at Greenock was in excess of that delivered at Monte Video, yet I think that the terms of the bill of lading granted by the master are conclusive as against the shipowner. I am of opinion, therefore, that the cesser clause came into full operation, and that the only subsisting and operative contract was the bill of lading, and that under it the rights and liabilities of the parties hinc inde must be ascertained.

If the shipowner gave up his lien on payment of insufficient freight he may have his action against the persons to whom he made delivery, but his having parted with his lien will not diminish the effect of the cesser clause or revive any right under the charter-party.

The only other point in the case is with reference to the £24 retained by the charterer's agents in Monte Video in respect of the value of coal alleged to be short delivered. In that matter Bates, Stokes, & Company were not well founded, and the retention was not justified by the fact. To that extent, therefore, the action may be sustained.

! LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur. I am satisfied on the proof that not more than 398 tons were delivered, and therefore that the party liable in freight is only liable in respect of such 398 tons. I am also satisfied that not more than 398 tons were put on board, and that being so, the counter claim for the defender cannot be allowed. The ground of that claim is short delivery. The burden is on the consignee to prove short delivery, and if the evidence is doubtful the ground of the claim must fail.

Entertaining, to a large extent, the views expressed by your Lordships on the important points of law decided by the Sheriff and argued before us with so much anxiety, I yet do not feel called upon to form and pronounce a decided opinion upon them, as they are not necessary for the disposal of the case. I may say, however, that as regards the cesser clause, it appears to me that once the bills of lading were delivered the charterer was relieved of all liability under the charter-party; were it otherwise the cesser clause could have no effect. But the import of the cesser clause is no more than this, that the charterer shall be no longer responsible under the charter-party. If there is any other ground of liability not resulting from the charter-party there is no inconsistency in that liability continuing, though the liability under the charter-party ceases. Whether or not the bill of lading imports a new contract under which the charterer is liable is the question. The Sheriff-substitute has decided that it does. But the decision of the point is not necessary for the judgment which we are to pronounce. If called upon to decide it I would be inclined to support the view which the Sheriff-substitute has adopted, and I am satisfied that there would be no inconsistency in arriving at that result. But while I think there is no inconsistency in holding that such liability may arise, though that under the charter-party is discharged, I find that the point was expressly reserved in the leading English case of Sanguinetti, where Mellish, L. J., is reported to have said (L. R. 2 Q. B. D., 248),—"Now, in the statement of claim it is alleged that the defendants themselves, by their agent or manager, requested that the cargo might be delivered to them without enforcing the lien. If that is true, that may possibly give rise to a right on the part of the plaintiff wholly independent of the charter, but it would be a contract dehors the charter. Mr Benjamin said he did not claim on the present occasion, or wish for any decision about any right he might have independently of the charter; therefore we give no opinion, one way or the other, in respect of any claim that there may be against the defendants on account of their agent or manager having requested that the cargo should be delivered without the lien for demurrage having been enforced."

Hence, though it may well be that though freed from all liability under the charter-party the charterer is still liable aliunde for freight, I desire on that subject to reserve my opinion.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Find that it has not been proved that the coals shipped at Greenock were not all delivered: Find it not proved that more than 398 tons were delivered to the consignee at Monte Video: Therefore sustain the appeal: Recall the judgments of the Sheriff appealed against: Find the defender (appellant) liable in the sum of £24, 4s. 9d., and decern against the defender for payment of that sum to the pursuers (respondents): Quoad ultra assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find no expenses due by either party to the other, either in this Court or in the Court below."

Arrospe v.

Ship—Clean Bill of Lading—Charter-party.—In a charter-party the ship-master and the charterer agreed that the vessel should load a full and complete cargo to be delivered at the port of discharge on payment of certain rates of freight, “the captain to sign bills of lading as presented at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter-party.” A lien was given over the cargo for payment of freight, dead freight, and demurrage. When the lay-days expired the vessel was short of a full cargo by thirty-five tons. The master intimated a claim for dead freight and demurrage, and refused to sign bills of lading, unless qualified by a reference to the conditions in the charter-party. It was afterwards agreed that the charterer should fill up the ship, and that the captain should sign “clean bills of lading, but under protest for three days’ demurrage incurred here, to be settled at the port of discharge.”

The captain still declined to sign bills of lading without this addition, “and all conditions as per charter-party.” Held that, while prior to the agreement he was justified in so declining, he was thereby bound to sign clean bills, i.e., such as neither contained nor implied any reference to matters previously in dispute between the parties, and was not entitled to insist on the bills of lading containing a reference to the conditions of the charter-party.

Observed that a condition in a charter-party that the captain “should sign bills of lading as presented at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party” imported that the charterer might insert a different rate of freight from that stipulated in the charter-party, but not any farther departure from its provisions.

Observations as to the meaning of the term “clean bill of lading.”

1st Division.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
C.

By charter-party, dated 24th September 1880, Captain Arrospe, the master and managing owner of the Spanish ship “Victoria,” entered into a charter-party with Thomas Barr, coalmaster, Glasgow, the former agreeing to charter his ship to the latter for “a full and complete cargo” of steam coals for delivery at Barcelona. The freight was to be 13s. per ton of twenty cwts. delivered, with six guineas gratuity.

The charter-party further bore,—“The said freighters to have the option of keeping the said ship ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days, at the rate of £8 per day, . . . The captain to sign bills of lading as presented, at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter-party. The captain to take on board sufficient coals for ship’s use. It is agreed that for payment of all freights, dead freight, and demurrage, the owners shall have an absolute lien on the said cargo.”

The lay-days expired upon Saturday 2d October, on which day about 550 tons had been loaded. The master, on Monday the 4th, represented to the charterer that the ship was short of a full cargo to the extent of thirty-five tons, and claimed that amount of dead freight, and also three days’ demurrage. The master accordingly insisted that the bills of lading before being signed by him should be qualified by a reference to the conditions of the charter-party. A meeting accordingly took place between the parties, at which the master wrote out and signed this letter:—“Greenock, 5th October 1880. Thomas Barr, Esq., charterer of ‘Victoria.’ Dear Sir,—Upon condition that you supply the balance of cargo, say thirty-five tons coals, I agree to sign clean bills of lading, but under protest for three days’ demurrage incurred here, to be settled at Barcelona. Coal to be put on board to-day.—I am yours truly, MANUEL DE FRIBIS ARROSPE.”

The charterer sent this answer:—“Greenock, 5th October 1880. Captain Manuel de Fribis Arrospe, of ship ‘Victoria.’ Sir,—I acknowledge receipt of your note to-day, and consent to put thirty-five tons more coal on board your ship, leaving the demurrage claim to be adjusted at Barcelona.—Yours truly, p. pro. THOMAS BARR, DAVID I. URQUHART." No. 115.

On the same day thirty-five tons additional of coal were procured and put on board. On Wednesday the 6th, bills of lading were presented to the master for his signature which contained this clause—"Freight for said goods to be paid by the receivers at the rate of 13s. per ton of twenty cwts. delivered, with six guineas gratuity as per charter-party." The master declined to sign unless the words "and all other conditions as per charter-party" were inserted, to which the charterer would not agree. Mar. 11, 1881.
Arrospe v.
Barr.

The demurrage days were exhausted upon 12th October, and on the 13th this action was brought by Arrospe, the master, in which he craved warrant to discharge and land the cargo, and to deposit it in neutral custody, and further asked damages.

The pursuer averred that by the regulations applicable to vessels trading between British ports and Barcelona the manifest and ship's papers must be signed by the consul at the port of lading before the vessel sails, and these documents, bearing the consul's signature, must be produced at the port of discharge under heavy penalties. Before the consul can sign he must have the bills of lading, which the pursuer would not sign unless a general reference to the conditions as per charter-party was inserted, or any words that would preserve his right to claim three days' demurrage at Barcelona. He further stated that he was not bound to wait longer than ten days on demurrage, and that, as he could not set sail with the cargo because the consul would not clear his ship as above narrated, he was obliged to bring this action.

The defender averred, inter alia, that under the clause in the charter-party "the captain to sign bills of lading as presented, at any rate of freight, without prejudice to the charter-party," the pursuer was bound to sign bills of lading for any cargo which the defender might ship, in such terms as the defender chose to present to him. He further stated that, after completion of the agreement narrated above, he presented clean bills of lading for the whole cargo for the pursuer's signature, but that the pursuer declined to sign these without the addition of the words "and all other conditions as per charter-party." The effect of these words, it was said, would have been to subject an indorsee of the bills to every obligation in the charter-party, and to remove the bills from the category of clean documents such as could be negotiated with bankers and merchants for commercial purposes.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The defender, having loaded on board said ship a cargo for transit to Barcelona, is bound to comply with the regulations applicable to traders with that port. 2. The pursuer having been detained in the port of Greenock, through the defender's failure to comply with said regulations, he is entitled to demurrage, or damages in lieu thereof. 3. The defender having failed within the demurrage days to load said vessel, and arrange for the clearance thereof, he has committed a breach of contract, and the pursuer is entitled to have the cargo discharged at the sight of the Court.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—3. Under the charter-party, the pursuer, being bound to sign bills of lading as presented, was not entitled to refuse to sign the bills of lading presented to him by the defender, his alleged claims against the defender as charterer not being prejudiced thereby. 4. The pursuer having expressly agreed, upon condition of the defender giving his vessel other thirty-five tons of cargo, to sign clean bills of lading for the cargo, was not entitled to refuse to sign clean bills of lading when presented to him by the defender.

No. 115. After a proof the Sheriff-substitute (Spens), on 27th October 1880, pronounced an interlocutor, in which, after finding in fact to the effect narrated above, he found in law "that pursuer was not entitled to refuse to sign bills of lading after the thirty-five tons stipulated by the letter of 5th October to be put on board the ship 'Victoria' had been duly loaded, unless defender adjoined the words 'and all other conditions as per charter-party,'" and he accordingly refused the prayer of the petition.

Arrospe v.
Barr.

The Sheriff (Clark), on 9th December 1880, adhered.

The pursuer appealed.

Argued for him;—1. It was clear that, prior to 5th October, he would have been entitled to have the conditions he asked inserted before signing the bills of lading. (2) By the letter of the 5th October he offered to sign "clean bills of lading" under protest for demurrage. An unclean bill was one under which there were obligations on the consignee which were not to be measured by looking at the bill of lading, nor to be imported by reference to it, i.e., bills with the stipulation "not responsible for leakage, &c." The stipulation "all other conditions as per charter-party," required the exhibition of the charter-party before a banker would negotiate a bill of lading. But such a bill was a clean one, because it afforded the means of settling the obligations of the consignee, the charter-party being forthcoming. Even a condition as to freight might be in gremio of the bill, or be incorporated into it by reference to the charter-party.¹ (3) A reference to the charter-party, such as was here asked, was not unusual, and was as common as bills of lading themselves.² A lien for demurrage was in reality a protection to both charterer and owner.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The pursuer was bound to sign the bills of lading without the addition he wished, before the writing of the letter of 5th October. That followed from the condition in the charter-party, "the captain to sign bills of lading as presented, at any rate of freight, without prejudice to the charter-party." (2) The letter of 5th October obliged the pursuer to sign "clean" bills. A "clean" bill was one which would entitle the consignee to get delivery on payment of the freight set forth in the bill itself.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—The pursuer of this action in the Sheriff Court is the master and managing owner of a Spanish vessel called the "Victoria," and he entered into a charter-party with the defender by which he undertook that the ship should proceed to a berth in the Victoria Harbour at Greenock, and load from the defender a full and complete cargo of steam-coal, and carry the same to Barcelona at a stipulated rate of freight. An advance of freight was to be made to the extent of one-third on signing bills of lading, subject to five per cent to cover charges. The ship proceeded, in terms of that charter-party, to Victoria Harbour, and it was stipulated that the lay-days should expire on the 2d of October. The cargo was loaded, but not completely, when the lay-days expired, and on the 4th of October the captain represented that he had not even then obtained a complete cargo—that thirty-five tons were still required to fill the ship; and he also represented on the same occasion that he had a claim for demurrage for two or three days as the case might be—three days it was mentioned to be, because the additional thirty-five tons could hardly be expected to be obtained before the following day at the earliest—and therefore the master's demand upon the 4th of October was, that he should obtain a delivery of thirty-five tons of coal in addition to what was already shipped, and should have a claim for three days' demurrage at the stipulated rate of £8 per day. Now, this was the subject of discussion between the parties upon the 4th of October, and a good deal of discussion apparently, and I daresay a good deal also of misunderstanding occurred, for the parties who were conducting that discussion spoke different languages, and did not understand each other very well sometimes, and there is in consequence some confusion in the evidence about what precisely took place, but the substance of it undoubtedly was this, that the master made the claims which I have already stated, and that these were not admitted, but resisted, on the part of the merchant. The charterer proposed on that occasion, that as the matter stood the master should sign bills of lading without any special stipulation whatever, but just acknowledging receipt of the cargo, and undertaking in common form to make delivery at the port of discharge. That the master, for the reasons already mentioned, refused to do. Now, had the matter stood there, I think the master was in the right. In the first place, he had certainly not obtained a complete cargo. The ship required to be filled up, in order to complete the cargo, with an additional thirty-five tons—certainly not a very small difference—and there is no doubt also that he had, or appeared to have, a fair claim of demurrage. The defender, however, contends, that whatever the master's claims might be in that respect, he was bound to sign any bills of lading that the merchant presented; that, no matter what his claims might be under the charter-party, he was bound, under a particular clause in that charter-party, to sign bills of lading simply acknowledging receipt of the cargo shipped, and undertaking to deliver it in the like good order and condition at the port of discharge.

The charter-party contains several very important stipulations in favour of the master and owner, and among others he has by express stipulation a lien at the port of discharge upon the cargo, not only for payment of freight but also of dead freight and demurrage. But the defender says that the master has undertaken by the terms of this charter-party to sign bills of lading in the simple form which I have already mentioned. The words founded on are these—"The captain to sign bills of lading as presented at any rate of freight without prejudice to this charter-party." Now, I do not attach much importance to the words "without prejudice to this charter-party," because I think these might be satisfied, if the defender's construction of this clause was otherwise sound, by giving it the meaning merely that the personal obligations of the master under the charter-party were not to be cancelled or abrogated by his signing bills of lading in any form presented to him. But the question appears to me to be, what is meant by the obligation on the captain "to sign bills of lading as presented at any rate of freight"? It is said that that gives the charterer an absolute power to make the bills of lading in any form he likes, not merely that he may alter the rate of freight from that stipulated in the charter-party, but that he may insert condi-lading. Now, I do not so read those words. On the contrary, I think the fair meaning of them is that he is to sign the bills of lading as presented, though the rate of freight shall be other than that in the charter-party. That construction seems to me completely to satisfy the words which are here used; and it would be very unreasonable to construe them in any other way, as I think is illustrated by the circumstances of this case. The master not having obtained a full cargo, was entitled, when he arrived at the port of destination, upon delivery of that imperfect cargo, to demand payment of dead freight, and to retain the cargo until that dead freight as well as the freight for the cargo itself should be paid. It certainly never could be intended by the parties to that original contract of charter-party that one of them, by presenting bills of lading in a particular form, should escape from the obligation which he had thereby incurred, and that the master should be deprived of the security of lien which was there stipulated.

Therefore I think that upon the 4th of October, as matters then stood, the master was in the right, at least as regarded the matter of short cargo and dead freight. Whether he was entitled to claim demurrage as against the consignee of the cargo or the indorsee of the bill of lading at the port of delivery—that demurrage having occurred before the voyage commenced—is a question of more difficulty; and whether he was right or wrong in that respect I do not think it necessary to determine, because at all events I think he was right in one contention, and he had at least a fair claim to have the other reserved. And if the matter had stood there I should have been disposed to say that for what has occurred the defender must be responsible, because he would not allow the master to sail upon the conditions on which I think he ought to have been allowed to sail. He prevented that being done by applying to the Spanish Consul, without whose authority the vessel could not proceed on her voyage.

But then matters were somewhat changed next day—on the 5th of October—because, after a good deal of discussion upon the points in dispute to which I have referred, the parties exchanged two letters, one addressed by the pursuer to the defender, and the other by the defender to the pursuer; and I think the result of these letters is that each party gave up something in order to come to a conclusion and enable the vessel to proceed upon her voyage. The pursuer (the master) writes—"Upon condition that you supply the balance of cargo, say thirty-five tons coals, I agree to sign clean bills of lading, but under protest for three days' demurrage incurred here, to be settled at Barcelona;" and the answer by the defender is—"I acknowledge receipt of your note to-day, and consent to put thirty-five tons more coal on board your ship, leaving the demurrage claim to be adjusted at Barcelona." Now, I think the substance of that agreement is that the two points in dispute were settled so far as to enable the vessel to proceed upon her voyage. The ship was to be filled up so as to complete the cargo. Well, that put an end to the complaint of deficient cargo, and it put an end also to a prospective claim for dead freight. On the other hand, as regarded the matter of demurrage, the captain was satisfied to protest that that claim was not abandoned, but must be settled at Barcelona—"adjusted at Barcelona" is the phrase in the one letter, and "settled" in the other. Now,

I do not think that the meaning of that was that the master was to keep up his claim of demurrage to the effect of giving him a lien for that demurrage upon the arrival of the ship at Barcelona; and the other objection therefore being removed, the question comes to be what the master means by agreeing to sign "clean bills of lading." When the bills of lading are again presented to him in the same form as before, he will not sign them except with the addition of certain words importing into the bills of lading the conditions of the charter-party. Now, if it had not been for the letters which so passed between the parties, I do not say that he might not have been entitled to have that reference to the charter-party. I do not at all agree with the argument that he was bound to sign those bills of lading, leaving the charter-party to speak for itself, and to work out its own conditions. I think that in certain circumstances, and probably in the circumstances as these stood on the 4th of October, the demand of the master to add the words "other conditions as per charter-party" would have been reasonable enough. And there is no difficulty as regards the practical operation of such a demand, because although it is argued that a bill of lading with a reference on the face of it to unknown conditions would not be a negotiable instrument, it would be a perfectly negotiable instrument if a copy of the charter-party were attached to it; and that is the practical answer to the whole suggestion of difficulty arising from the nature of the instrument. But then matters stood in a very different position when the bills of lading were again presented on the 6th of October. The master had reserved his claim for demurrage, and his other difficulty about dead freight had been obviated by the cargo being filled up. What, then, did he mean by agreeing "to sign clean bills of lading"? I do not think that that phrase has any technical meaning, nor do I think it is a legal phraseology at all. On the contrary, I think it is a popular phraseology as amongst mariners. I do not attach any importance to the evidence that has been led before us as to what is called custom or understanding in this matter. I do not think there is any settled meaning of those words applicable to every conceivable case. In short, it appears to me that a clean bill of lading must be construed with reference to the circumstances of each particular case. If there is a matter in dispute between parties as to the conditions on which the voyage is to take place, and the goods are to be carried and delivered, then a "clean" bill of lading will have reference to the subject of that dispute, and the meaning of it will be that the master will not cumber his bill of lading with any allusion to it. Other cases may be imagined in which difficulties are foreseen, not as subjects of regular dispute, but where there are difficulties anticipated, and if these form an element in the discussion between the parties, and the master signs the bill of lading, it will be understood that it is to exclude all reference to such difficulties. That appears to me to be the rational construction of this term. It can have no abstract meaning. It must have a meaning referable to the circumstances of each particular case. The bill is to be made clean of something—of something that is present to the minds of parties, and has either formed the subject of discussion or dispute, or at least has been anticipated as a difficulty. Now, using the phrase in that meaning here, I cannot doubt that the intention of the master in agreeing to sign clean bills of lading was that the bill of lading should not be encumbered with any reference whatever to the matters that had been in dispute between the parties, and had been compromised—compromised by full delivery of a cargo on the one side, and by the reservation by the master

 ARROSPE v.
 BARR.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. The case is special in its circumstances, and has been decided by the Sheriff-substitute with reference to that specialty, viz., the terms of the letters which passed between the master and the charterer on 5th October 1880. These letters have admittedly reference to the dispute which had arisen between the parties relative to the quantity of cargo that had been put into the vessel, and as to the settlement of the claim that had been made relative to demurrage. The parties being at issue upon these points, the letter of 5th October was written, stating that upon condition that the charterer supplied the balance of cargo—35 tons of coal—the captain agreed “to sign clean bills of lading, but under ‘protest for three days’ demurrage incurred here, to be settled at Barcelona.” To that he received an answer from the charterer agreeing to put in the 35 tons of coal, qualifying to some extent the letter of protest by adding, “leaving the demurrage claim to be adjusted at Barcelona;” and upon that footing that particular dispute is settled. Now, this gives rise to the question, What is a clean bill of lading? and there is a great deal of evidence adduced to shew what, in the views of the respective parties, a clean bill is. That evidence is very contradictory, but I think the difficulty may be solved in this case in the view which your Lordship has now expressed, viz., that what the parties intended here was a bill of lading which should contain nothing which could by possibility give rise to a renewal of the points as to which the parties had been at issue, and which were settled by the two letters of 5th October. Any bill of lading, therefore, containing a qualification which could by possibility be held to revive those questions was not a clean bill of lading, in the sense of this arrangement. Upon that special ground the Sheriff-substitute has decided, and has, I think, rightly decided the case.

Upon the general question of a clean bill of lading, it appears to me that the authorities rather tend to this, that a clean bill of lading in ordinary circumstances means a bill of lading of the kind recognised in different countries, and that whenever any special stipulation is made with reference to the cargo in the bill of lading by the captain it can scarcely be held to come within the description of a clean bill. I see that in Bell’s Commentaries p. 542, a description is given of bills of lading, and he says—“The form used in Britain is uniform, and generally printed with spaces left for introducing the names and descriptions of the ship, captain, goods, and voyage.” He gives in a note the style and form, and adds, “special stipulations may, however, be introduced.” In the case of Craig & Rose v. Delargy, there was a special stipulation as to leakage and breakage added by the captain to the ordinary uniform printed style; and there are opinions in that case to the effect that there the bill was not clean because of that special stipulation having been inserted. I am rather inclined to think, if we were forced to decide the general question, that a clean bill of lading must mean a bill in the ordinary uniform style recognised in all ports in this country, and without any special stipulations different from that ordinary style. That, I think, is the import of the decision in Craig & Rose’s case; but in this case the necessity of deciding the general question is obviated by the terms of the letters passing between the parties. No. 115.

Mar. 11, 1881.
Arrospe v.
Barr.

LORD SHAND.—In the discussion before us in this case there were two questions argued, the first being, whether if there had been no special agreement, such as is contained in the letters of the 5th of October, the master was entitled to insert in the bill of lading the words which he proposed, viz., “and all other conditions as per charter?” and the second, assuming that he was entitled to insert these words, whether he contracted to give up his right to do so by the letter which he wrote on 5th October, and what followed upon it? In regard to the first of these questions, which is of general interest, I concur in the opinions that have been delivered. The charter-party contained a number of stipulations in favour of the owner of the vessel, none perhaps of more importance than that towards the close, to the effect that for payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, the owners should have an absolute lien on the cargo. The argument of the shipper is that the captain was bound to sign a bill of lading for the whole cargo, for the case we are now dealing with is one in which the bill of lading was for the whole cargo, which would practically deprive him of the right of lien as against the cargo; and it appears to me that in order to make out that proposition it would require very clear, distinct, and unambiguous language on the face of the charter-party to entitle the charterer of the vessel to say that he had right to have bills of lading so expressed. The clause founded on as operating that effect is this:—“The captain to sign bills of lading as presented, at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter-party.” It appears to me that this clause is limited to one matter, viz., the rate of freight. Notwithstanding that a certain rate of freight is stipulated for in the charter-party, the captain binds himself to sign bills of lading, at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter-party—that is to say, that if he signs bills of lading for a smaller rate of freight, his claim against the charterer shall be good for the rate stipulated in the charter-party. I do not see that the clause goes further to any extent. We were referred to the authority of a case of Gabarron, in which the clause was to this effect—the captain to sign bills of lading as presented, without prejudice to this charter-party. That is a very different clause from the one we have here. If a captain binds himself to sign bills of lading as presented, the ordinary meaning of which would be that whatever be the terms of the bills of lading he is to sign them, and to look to the charterer for his remedy ultimately, then he has contracted to sign bills of lading in any terms; but here it appears to me to be quite clear that the words “as presented” are qualified by the words which follow, “at any rate of freight,” and accordingly that the only obligation on the part of the master was that he should sign bills of lading at a lower or higher rate of freight as he might be asked, but that he undertook nothing else which would deprive him of any other rights under his charter-party. Accordingly, if this case had depended upon the general question, I should be of opinion that the pursuers would be entitled to succeed.

But then there was a very special transaction between the parties, for on the 5th of October their position was this—a dispute had arisen between the charterer and the captain as to whether the vessel had been fully loaded, and a second dispute as to three days’ demurrage. In regard to the loading, as I understand, the shipper maintained that he had sent down all the cargo which

No. 115. the captain had told him his vessel would carry—a quantity which would fill the vessel according to the representation which had been made by the captain, or at all events by the agents for the captain, who were acting with his authority, and that although it might be the vessel might carry more coals, the shipper was entitled to act on the view which had been presented to him, and was not bound to give more cargo. The captain, on the other hand, maintained that he was entitled to a full cargo for his ship, and that she could carry other thirty-five tons. A question was also raised between them which to some extent also depended on the other question, viz., as to three days' demurrage, making in all a sum of £24. In that state of matters the arrangement which was embodied in these letters is, I think, plainly enough expressed. The captain writes,—“Upon condition that you supply the balance of cargo, say thirty-five tons coals, I agree to sign clean bills of lading, but under protest for three days' demurrage incurred here, to be settled at Barcelona.” The reply to that is—“I consent to put thirty-five tons more coal on board your ship, leaving the demurrage claim to be adjusted at Barcelona.” Now, the first question is, what was the effect of that agreement? I think it was plainly a settlement of any question about deficient cargo. But I think it went further than this, for the charterer agreeing to give the thirty-five additional tons of coal, stipulated for something in his favour, and what he stipulated for was that he should get clean bills of lading, leaving the captain to stand upon his protest for three days' demurrage, to be settled at Barcelona. It appears to me to be very plain upon the face of this contract that whether the words “clean bills of lading” would go further or not, at least they were effectual to this extent, that the bills of lading were to be so expressed that they were not to keep open the claim of demurrage against the cargo. The claim of demurrage was to be kept open as against the charterers; there was a protest for it; and the captain said in his letter, I have not only protested, but it is to be settled at Barcelona, and the charterer agreed that should be so. But I think both parties by these letters must be held, from the language used, to have agreed that although that question was to be open as between the charterer and the captain at Barcelona, the cargo was to be clear of that claim. I say the agreement went that length certainly. I am by no means satisfied that it did not go further, and that the true meaning of the agreement was not that the cargo should be clear of everything by way of condition except the payment of the freight stipulated. But certainly I think the agreement did amount to this, that the cargo was to be free of a claim of demurrage.

Now, that being so, the captain, nevertheless, insisted on these words being inserted, “and all other conditions as per charter-party;” and it is desirable to see from the record and the correspondence at the time what his object was in doing so. Turning to the record, I find that in condescendence 6 the captain says—“The pursuer offered to sign the bills of lading provided a general reference to the conditions as per charter-party was inserted, or any other words that would preserve his right to claim three days' demurrage at Barcelona.” As I read that, the meaning of it was—“I mean to claim three days' demurrage against the cargo, and to keep my right open.” I think that is clear by the letter from pursuer's law-agents on 7th October 1880:—“The captain is bound to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight you think proper to insert, but he is entitled to have the words ‘all other conditions per charter-party’ also inserted, so as to keep up his claim of demurrage,” &c. I read that letter and the passage in the record as meaning this, that the captain maintains his right to have his claim of demurrage kept up, not against the charterer only, but against the cargo, and he desires to have these words put in for that purpose. I think it is clear on the authorities that if these words had been inserted they would have had that effect. That is matter of express decision, for in the case of Wegener v. Smith in 1854, 15 Common Bench Reports, it was expressly held that where the words were inserted, "and other conditions as per charter-party," they amounted to an agreement that at the port of discharge the person holding the bill of lading should settle all claims of demurrage which were due by the charterer. It was, no doubt, left as a question to the jury by the learned Judge who tried the cause, but the opinions of the Judges were to that effect, and I agree in these opinions as thus expressed by Justice Maule in the course of the argument:—"The defendant is liable for demurrage if the bill of lading makes it part of the contract. The fact of his receiving the goods, to which he is only entitled under a bill of lading making them deliverable to him on payment of freight and demurrage, renders him liable to pay demurrage. That is putting it at the lowest. His repudiation of liability amounts to nothing." And the same view as to the somewhat serious consequences which may follow from the insertion of these words, "and other conditions as per charter-party," is very well illustrated by the decision in the case of Porteous and Others v. Watney, referred to in the course of the discussion, L. R., 3 Q. B. Div. 534. It was suggested that the law was otherwise on the authority of the case of Chappel v. Comfort—a much earlier case, in which there is a very learned judgment by Justice Willea. But it must be observed that in Chappel's case the only words inserted in the bill of lading were "he or they paying freight as per charter-party,"—not "and all other conditions as per charter-party." In short, the charter-party was introduced into the bill of lading in the case of Chappel simply for the purpose of putting in the amount of freight, but was not referred to or brought into the bill of lading so as to import any condition as to lien on the cargo for demurrage, or anything else. Now, it appears to me, upon the view I have just stated, that the contract between the parties under the letter of 5th October, was that there was to be no claim for demurrage made against the cargo. The bill of lading was to be so far clean. The captain insisted on putting in a clause which would have made the cargo liable to demurrage, and in that I am clearly of opinion that the captain was wrong.

Questions have been discussed at the bar, and even more fully in the course of the proof, by the witnesses, who seem to have given opinions upon legal points with more or less confidence, and with more or less difficulty, as to the meaning of the words "a clean bill of lading." It may not be necessary to decide that question here, but I can very well see that a question as to the general meaning of these words might occur, as for example, if a captain were to sign a charter-party in which he undertook to sign clean bills of lading "without prejudice to this charter-party." Upon that question I shall only say now that it appears to me that the true meaning of that expression is that the captain shall sign bills of lading which from their terms will entitle the holder to delivery of the cargo as there described, on payment simply of the freight, or at least on payment of an amount which may be ascertained on the face of the bill of lading itself. What I mean is this, that even if a sum were stated in addition to freight, but defined, which would let the holder or the acquirer of the bill of lading know that upon presentment of the bill and upon payment of a sum which might be ascertained on the face of the bill, he could get the cargo, that bill of lading would be a clean bill of lading, for it would enable the holder to go into the market, and to transfer the cargo at the current price of the subject of it to a purchaser, who would know precisely what he had to pay in order to get delivery of the cargo. In short, such a bill of lading is properly negotiable. But if you have conditions referred to which can only be ascertained by reference to another document, or which leave the sum which the holder of the bill of lading has to pay in considerable uncertainty, instead of giving him the means of knowing the amount which will ensure him the delivery of the cargo, then it appears to me that in the ordinary sense that would not be a clean bill of lading.

Upon the ground I have now stated, I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that the decision of the Court below ought to be adhered to, and I have only to express my regret and astonishment that in this case, in which the parties were really disputing about a sum of £24, the vessel has been kept lying for months at Greenock during a period in which she might have made I do not know how many voyages to Barcelona and back again, in place of an arrangement being made by which the vessel should sail on her voyage at once, and the question be decided by the Court in the ordinary course.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that on 24th September last the pursuer and defender entered into the charter-party produced, by which pursuer agreed to charter to the defender the ship 'Victoria' for a full and complete cargo of steam coals for delivery at Barcelona: Find, inter alia, it was agreed by said charter, 'the said freighters to have the option of keeping the said ship ten days on demurrage over the said lying days at the rate of £8 per day . . . The captain to sign bills of lading as presented at any rate of freight without prejudice to this charter-party . . . It is agreed that for payment of all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, the owners shall have an absolute lien on the said cargo': Find further, it was agreed that the rate of freight should be 13s. per ton of 20 cwts., with six guineas gratuity: Find that by the said charter-party the lie days expired on Saturday 2d October, on which day 544 tons 15 cwts. of coal had been loaded on the said ship, less some six waggons or trucks which were at the harbour ready to be put on board, probably amounting in all to some 90 tons: Find that said balance of coal was put on board on Monday the 4th, and thereafter the pursuer discovered that what he considered a full and complete cargo was not on board: Find that bills of lading were presented by the defender to the pursuer on Tuesday the 5th October for signature: Find that the bills of lading, as presented, contained the words:—'Freight for said goods to be paid by the receivers at the rate of 13s. per ton of 20 cwts. delivered, with six guineas gratuity': Find that thereafter the words 'as per charter-party' were added by the witness Urquhart on behalf of the defender: Find at this time pursuer was claiming that the cargo to be loaded should be 580 tons, and, that, therefore, there was 35 tons or so of dead freight, and he also claimed three days' demurrage, which claims were disputed by defender, and pursuer insisted that the words 'and all other conditions' should be inserted before the words 'as per charter-party' in the bills of lading: Find a meeting took place on Tuesday the 5th October, at Greenock, at which the pursuer wrote out and signed the letter or agreement of that date, produced in process, addressed to the defender, and which is in the following terms:—‘Upon condition that you supply the balance of cargo, say 35 tons coals, I agree to sign clean bills lading, under protest for three days’ demurrage incurred here, to be settled at Barcelona. Coal to be put on board to-day. MANUEL DE FRIBIS ARROSPE’: Find at the same time the witness Urquhart, on behalf of defender, gave a letter in the following terms addressed to pursuer:—‘Sir,—I acknowledge receipt of your note to-day, and consent to put 35 tons more coal on board your ship, leaving the demurrage claim to be adjusted at Barcelona. p. pro. THOMAS BARR, DAVID I. URQUHART’: Find that thereafter on the same day the said David Urquhart procured 35 tons or more of coal, in implement of the arrangement thus come to, and said coals were duly put on board the ship ‘Victoria’ on the same day or next morning: Find the bills of lading were again presented for pursuer’s signature on the 6th October, after the 35 tons loading had been completed, but he declined to sign said bills of lading unless the words ‘and other conditions as per charter-party’ were inserted therein: Therefore refuse the appeal, and decern: Find the respondent (defender) entitled to the expenses of the appeal: Allow an account thereof to be lodged, and remit to the Auditor to tax, and to report.”

Road—Burgh—Liability of the Magistrates of Royal and Parliamentary Burghs for damages for injury caused by insufficient fencing of road—General Police Act, 1862, secs. 147, 170, and 237.—Leith was originally a burgh of barony, holding of Edinburgh, but after 1832 it became a parliamentary burgh, and there were subsequent Acts dealing with the rights, powers, authority, and jurisdiction of the Magistrates. Ultimately in 1862 the burgh adopted the provisions of the General Police Act, 1862.

In an action of damages against the Magistrates of that burgh for injury sustained in consequence of their alleged neglect to fence and protect a parapet wall at Newhaven, within the parliamentary limits of the burgh, on the road leading by the shore from Leith to Granton, held (dub. Lord Deas) that as the road in question had not been placed by the statutes above referred to under the charge of the Magistrates, but remained under the county turnpike district road trustees, there was no liability attaching to the Magistrates either (1) at common law, or (2) under the General Police Act, 1862.

Observations upon the cases of Innes v. The Magistrates of Edinburgh, M. 13,189; Threshie v. The Magistrates of Annan, 8 D. 276; and Dargie v. The Magistrates of Forfar, 17 D. 730.

ON the evening of the 17th December 1878 James Harris left his home at East Cottages, Granton, to go to Leith. On his way homewards he made a call at Newhaven, and from that proceeded to Granton by a road which lay close to the Firth of Forth, and was separated from it by a stone bulwark surmounted by a parapet wall. At a part of that road where the roadway turned nearly at right angles Harris fell over the wall upon the beach below and was killed. The wall was only two feet high on the side next the roadway, on the other side it was seventeen feet deep.

Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith.

Harris' wife brought this action of damages for the loss sustained through her husband's death against the Provost, Magistrates, and Town-Council of Leith. As police commissioners of the burgh, the defenders, it was averred, were bound to see that the streets and roadways within their district were sufficiently fenced and protected, which had not been done at the place where the accident occurred. It was also averred that the place in question was not sufficiently lighted.

The defenders denied liability, and in their statement of facts averred, further, as follows:—"1. The defenders, the Magistrates and Council of the burgh of Leith, are Commissioners of Police for the burgh under and in virtue of 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,' and 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862, Order Confirmation (Leith) Act, 1877.' [And 'The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Supplemental Act, 1862.']*"

"2. By the 66th clause of the said General Police Act it is provided that 'the monies arising from the assessments hereby authorised to be levied, and all other property acquired by the commissioners in pursuance of the powers hereby granted, shall be, and the same are hereby vested in the commissioners and their successors for the uses and purposes mentioned in this Act, and for no other purpose whatever.' No such purpose as payment of the present or any analogous claim is in any way mentioned or referred to in the Act.

"[The burgh of Leith was originally a burgh of barony, holding of Edinburgh as superior. By the Act 1 and 2 Victoria, chapter 55, Edinburgh and Leith were separated in all the civil and municipal relations thereof. But, so far as Leith has or ever had any separate municipal government, the existence, rights, powers, obligations, and jurisdiction of the Provost, Magistrates, and Council, and Police Commissioners thereof, including the defenders, have always been entirely regulated and defined by statute, and are now regulated and defined especially by the statutes before mentioned. There is no common good in the burgh of Leith, and the defenders have no fund whatever from which to meet such a claim as the present, nor are there assessments which the defenders are entitled to impose available to meet such a claim, or to fence, repair, or maintain the road in question.]*"

"3. The road in front of Trinity Crescent . . . is under the jurisdiction and subject to the control and management of certain trustees acting in and for the county of Edinburgh under the Act 5 and 6 William IV., chapter 62, intituled, 'An Act for more effectually making, repairing, and maintaining the turnpike roads in the county of Edinburgh.' By the 3d clause of the said Act, it is provided that for the better execution of the Act the county of Edinburgh be divided into certain districts. The road leading in front of Trinity Crescent, referred to by the pursuer, and particularly that part thereof at which the alleged accident is stated to have occurred, is in the Cramond district, and subject to the trustees acting for that district."

"4. By the 118th clause of the Act 1 and 2 William IV., chapter 43, intituled an Act for amending and making more effectual the laws concerning turnpike roads in Scotland, it is provided:—"That all civil causes, petitions, complaints, and processes whatsoever, and prosecutions for expenses, tolls, duties, penalties, forfeitures, and fines imposed by this Act or any local turnpike Act, or for any damages incurred or any wrongs done or injuries suffered in any matter thereto relating, or for anything done in pursuance of any of the powers by this or any such Act given and granted, shall be commenced within six calendar months after the penalty, forfeiture, fine, or damage shall have been incurred, or wrong done, or injury suffered, or fact committed, and not afterwards.' No. 116.

"[It is provided by section 94 of the Act 1st and 2d William IV., chapter 43, which is incorporated by the Act 5th and 6th William IV., chapter 62, as follows:—'And be it enacted that the trustees of every turnpike road shall erect sufficient parapet walls, mounds, or fences, or other adequate means of security along the sides of all bridges, embankments, or other dangerous parts of the said roads; and, if they shall fail therein, it shall be lawful for the procurator-fiscal, or any commissioner of supply for the shire in which the part of such road complained of is situated, such commissioner finding security to pay expenses of process if he shall fail in his action, to prosecute the trustees of any such turnpike road before the Sheriff of the shire in which such road is situated, who shall judge and determine therein in a summary manner, and upon finding the complaint well founded, may compel the said trustees to remedy the matter complained of, and allow the prosecutor the expenses of process; but if such prosecution shall be found groundless, the private prosecutor shall be liable in expenses.' There is a toll-bar erected by said trustees within a few yards of where the accident took place, and the money taken thereat is received and administered by the said trustees. Said road, and particularly that portion of it where the accident took place, is not, and never has been, subject to the control or management of the defenders, or the Magistrates, Council, or Police Commissioners of Leith, and the defenders have no power or duty as regards the maintenance, fencing, or repair of the same.] *"

Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith.

The defenders pleaded;—2. The defenders, being in no way responsible for the alleged accident, are not liable in damages. [5. The defenders having themselves no power or duty as to the repairing, maintenance, or fencing of said road, and more than six months having elapsed after the accident before the pursuer commenced the present action, or even made any claim in respect of said accident, and the defenders having thus lost all right of relief competent to them against the Cramond District Trustees, the action cannot be maintained, and the defenders should be assoilzied. 6. The action cannot be maintained, in respect the defenders have no funds or property available or liable to meet the pursuer's claim, and that the only funds and property held by them are specifically appropriated to other purposes. 7. The defenders should be assoilzied, in respect the accident was caused, or materially contributed to, by the fault and negligence of the deceased himself.] *

Originally, an issue was approved by the Lord Ordinary for the trial of the case, confining the action to the question whether the road was insufficiently lighted or not, but, upon a reclaiming note to have the terms of the issue varied, the Court allowed amendments to be added to the record (which have been incorporated in the above narrative), and allowed a proof, which was taken before Lord Shand.

The result of the proof sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court. The clauses of the different statutes founded on are quoted by the Lord President.

It was not further argued that the road was insufficiently lighted.

Argued for the pursuer;—Upon the evidence Harris' death was the result of an accident occasioned by the insufficient fencing of the road. No contributory negligence was proved. Even where a party went out of his direct route, and an accident followed, damages had been held due.¹

* This was added to the record upon amendment in the Inner-House.

No. 116. The Magistrates of the burgh were liable (1) at common law. There was a duty upon them to keep public places safe.¹ The case of Innes was authoritative to that effect. If not at common law, there was (2) a statutory liability upon them, as an examination of the clauses in the Acts applicable to the burgh of Leith would show, particularly the provisions of the General Police Act, 1862 (the Lindsay Act), which Leith had adopted. It was possible that the Magistrates might have an action of relief against the Cramond district trustees, but the former were primarily liable.² The liability of the Magistrates being for culpa was absolute, and it was irrelevant to the present inquiry to consider how far they might hold a third party liable to them. The 118th clause in the General Turnpike Road Act did not bar such a demand as this.* It applied merely to petitory actions.

Mar. 11, 1881.
Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith.

Argued for the defenders;—1. The pursuer had not made out a case of freedom from fault on the part of the deceased. The party suffering could only recover if he had exercised reasonable care himself. The evidence here shewed that the deceased knew the danger, and therefore ran a risk in voluntarily approaching the place, and could not have the claim which a stranger would have.³ 2. There was no duty upon the defenders to attend to the state of this road, either statutorily or at common law. The road was under the jurisdiction of the Cramond Road Trustees. Under their statutes the duties and liabilities of the Magistrates of Leith, at least in a case of this nature, were entirely statutory.⁴ 3. If the defenders were liable, the pursuer's claim had fallen by lapse of time under the General Turnpike Road Act. There could be no action of relief by the Magistrates against them, because in such a case the liability of the party claiming relief must be commensurate with the liability of the party from whom relief is claimed.⁵

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The place where the accident occurred by which the husband of the pursuer lost his life was at a part of the road between Newhaven and Granton which runs close to the sea, on an elevation above the beach of about seventeen feet in height, and having a parapet wall to the front of about two feet. The pursuer contends that the two feet parapet was insufficient protection for pedestrians going along the road, and she also maintains that the place was insufficiently lighted, and to these two causes she attributes the unfortunate occurrence. The allegation of insufficient lighting has certainly not been proved on the evidence. On the contrary, there was a lamp within quite a reasonable distance of the place, and it has not been proved, or indeed alleged, that the lamp was not lighted at the time that the accident occurred. It has been established, certainly, that the parapet wall did not exceed two feet in height, and I think it is impossible to say that that was sufficient protection at a dangerous place. It falls upon the pursuer, however, to establish that that was the cause of the accident that occurred. Now, there was no eye-witness of the occurrence, and therefore we are driven to circumstantial evidence in order to ascertain whether the pursuer's husband lost his life by accidentally falling over the parapet of two feet, and being precipitated on to the sea wall below. After a careful examination of the evidence as regards that matter of fact, I think it has been established that that was the cause of the accident, and of the loss of this poor man's life. It is quite unnecessary to go into any examination of the proof for the purpose of determining that which is merely a verdict upon a matter of fact.

Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith.

Now, prima facie, in these circumstances, the parties who are in charge of the road will be liable for the consequence of this occurrence, and it is apparent by reference to the Acts of Parliament that the road is within the Cramond district of the county of Edinburgh, and that the Cramond District Road Trustees are charged with the working, maintaining, and upholding of it, and among other duties devolving upon the road trustees in these circumstances is the fencing of dangerous places along it, either by parapet walls or other sufficient fences. That is provided for by the 94th section of the General Turnpike Act (1 and 2 Will. IV. cap. 43), which is incorporated by the Act 5 and 6 Will. IV. cap. 62. We therefore see that there is a duty laid upon the body of statutory trustees of maintaining a sufficient parapet wall at this place, and that the parapet wall actually maintained at the time of the accident was insufficient. Prima facie, therefore, the road trustees of the Cramond district are liable for the consequences. But we are not pronouncing any judgment against them, because they are not defenders in this case, and we are not entitled to anticipate that they could have no defence if they were called which would be sufficient as an answer to the pursuer's claim. The only parties called as defenders are the Magistrates of Leith, and the question therefore remaining to be solved is whether they are in any way responsible for this parapet wall being so low as it was.

The history of the town of Leith is very peculiar. It was originally a burgh of barony belonging to the corporation of the city of Edinburgh, and so long as it was in that condition the Magistrates of Leith had no proper municipal jurisdiction at all, and no proper police powers of administration. But a certain change took place in the condition of the Magistrates of Leith, as, indeed, in that of many other towns of the same kind, in consequence of an Act which was passed in 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 77). Leith, like a number of towns in Scotland, had by the Act of 1832 been invested with the privilege of returning, either solely or in conjunction with other towns, a Member of Parliament, and the burghs which were so enfranchised passed under the name of parliamentary burghs. It is matter of fact that the boundaries of Leith were, for the purposes of the Reform Act, so extended as to include the place where this accident occurred. The inhabitants, therefore, of that part of the district where this accident occurred were made electors within the town of Leith by the operation of the Act of 1832. Then by the Act of 1833 it was provided, by section 30, "That the Magistrates and Town-Council to be elected for the said burghs or towns under the authority of this Act shall have such and the like rights, powers, authorities, and jurisdiction as is or are possessed by the magistrates and council of any royal burgh in Scotland, and such rights, powers, authorities, and jurisdiction shall extend equally over all and every part of the limits of such burghs or towns as described in the said recited Act of the 2d and 3d year of the reign of his present Majesty." Now, what might be the precise operation and effect of this clause in every conceivable circumstance it would be difficult to determine. But fortunately it has not the least connection with the present case. It is sufficient to say that the administrators of the burgh, like those of other burghs of the same class, after the year 1833 possessed generally the powers of magistrates of royal burghs.

But a much more important Act (1 and 2 Vict. cap. 55) as regards the burgh of Leith was passed in the year 1838, by which the town of Leith was separated from the city of Edinburgh in regard to all civil and municipal relations. In the words of the statute they were (sec. 26) "separated and dis severed, and all rights of patronage and jurisdiction, and of levying any tax, rate, or assessment, custom, impost, or dues of any description whatever, heretofore belonging or competent to or claimed by the said city of Edinburgh in, out of, or over the town of Leith . . . shall be and the same are hereby abolished." And then there was inserted in the Act this clause (section 31),—"That the said Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the town of Leith shall hereafter be bound to free and relieve the trustees of the middle district of roads of the county of Midlothian of all obligations imposed upon them by an Act passed in the 5th and 6th year of the reign of His late Majesty King William the Fourth, intituled 'An Act for further regulating the statute-labour, and repairing the highways and bridges in the county of Edinburgh,' in relation to the upholding and maintaining certain roads and streets within the said town of Leith, under the said last recited Act; and also of all claim of relief competent to the said trustees against the said Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the city of Edinburgh in relation to such obligation." The meaning of the last words of the section, I confess, is, to my mind, past finding out.

Now, under the operation of this statute, it is to be observed that the Magistrates of Leith were invested with powers with regard not only to the ordinary administration of the affairs of the burgh, but also to a certain extent with regard to roads and streets, and in particular with regard to those roads that lay immediately to the east and south of the proper town of Leith. They were made to come in place of the Middle District Trustees, and accordingly the Middle District Trustees had no farther charge of these roads. But as regards the roads on the west of the burgh along the sea-shore there was no such change introduced by this statute, and the road we are now dealing with remained within the administration of the Cramond Trustees just as completely as it did before the passing of this Act.

Then there is the Act of 1846 for regulating the repair and maintenance of the roads and streets within the town of Leith, and the assessments payable in respect thereof. And here the whole streets and roads in and about Leith, which were formerly dealt with by the Magistrates of Edinburgh, or the Middle District Trustees, or the town of Leith, are to be under the administration of the Provost, Master of the Merchant Company, and certain Town-Councillors of Leith. That Act remained in operation for two years until the year 1848, when another statute (11 and 12 Vict. cap. 123) was passed which abolished the commission that had been appointed in 1846, and provided for the municipal government of the burgh of Leith being in the hands of the magistrates. No. 116.

 They had not, down to that time apparently, possessed any police administration or power. But by the Act of 1848 that was conferred upon them. The Mar. 11, 1881.
Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith. Act proceeds upon the preamble that "it is expedient to unite the municipal and police government and jurisdiction of the said town or burgh of Leith in the provost, magistrates, and council thereof, to transfer to them all the powers and jurisdictions of police, &c. by the said recited Acts; to extend such municipal and police jurisdiction over the limits hereinafter described; to vest in the said provost and magistrates admiralty jurisdiction; and to vest in the said provost, magistrates, and council the powers respecting the roads and streets in and around the said town, contained in the said recited Act of the 9th and 10th years of the reign of her present Majesty," being the Act of 1846 to which I have just referred, and in pursuance of that preamble, it is enacted by section 4 that "the magistrates and other members of the town-council of the said burgh for the time being shall be and are hereby appointed commissioners for executing the police purposes of this Act." And then comes the section regarding roads (section 6), which enacts "that from and after the said first Tuesday in November 1848 the powers vested in the trustees appointed by and elected under the said recited Act of the 9th and 10th years of the reign of Her present Majesty shall cease and determine, and the whole rights, powers, authorities, and jurisdictions, together with the rates and assessments, and all arrears thereof, and all property, of whatever description, now in or under the administration of the said trustees, shall be transferred to and the same are hereby vested in the said magistrates and council, who shall administer the said trust in future in room and place of the said trustees, by levying the rates and assessments by the said Act authorised, and applying the same as herein directed, and otherwise conforming to the whole injunctions, rules, and regulations of the said Act." And then there is a provision as to the extent of the power thereby conferred in regard to the administration and management of the roads and streets. The 12th section specially defines the district within which these powers and rights of administration are to be confined. And it is sufficient to say that there is nothing introduced into this new Act to shew that any change was made in regard to the road with which we are now dealing. Now, the matter so stood, and the administration of the burgh and its affairs, including the streets within that defined district, continued to be, in the same position until another change took place, when the town of Leith adopted the General Police Act of 1862, and the ground on which the pursuer maintains that the Magistrates of Leith are liable under the sections of this Act seems to me to depend mainly upon the construction and effect of this public statute as adopted by the town.

The first portion of the statute which is material begins with section 146, which is under the general heading of "Paving and Maintaining Streets." That section provides that "the commissioners may from time to time cause all or any of the streets within the burgh not under the management of any turnpike road or other trustees, or any part of such streets respectively, to be raised, lowered, altered and formed in such manner and with such materials as they shall think fit, and they shall also repair such streets from time to time: Provided always that nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with any right to have applied to such streets any commutation for statute-labour, or other fund by law applicable to the repair or maintenance of such streets." And the immediately following clause (147) provides that "the commissioners shall, from time to time, place such fences and posts on the side of the footways of streets as may be needed for the protection of passengers on such footways, and they may place posts in the carriage-ways of such streets so as to make the crossing thereof less dangerous for foot-passengers, and they shall, from time to time, repair any such fences or posts, or may remove the same or any obstructions to any such carriage-way or foot-way as they think fit." Now, it seems to me that the 147th section applies to the same streets which are the subject of the 146th section, and they are both under the same general heading of that part of the statute which relates to paving and maintaining streets, and consequently the provision for fences and posts applies to the streets which properly belonged to the police commissioners of the burgh, and not to those which are under the management of the turnpike road or other trustees. The statute plainly contemplates that there may be within the burgh a turnpike road under the management, not of the police commissioners, or of the magistrates, but of the turnpike road trustees of the district adjoining the burgh.

I do not think there is any other clause in that part of the statute that bears upon this question materially. But then we come to another division of the statute, which relates to what is called "laying out new streets," and that begins with the 170th section. The most of the sections in this part of the statute refer to the mode of giving notices, and compelling parties to contribute to the making of new streets who are liable to do so. The only section in that part of the statute to which reference was made on behalf of the pursuer was the last section of this division of the statute, viz., the 181st, which provides that "the provisions of this Act in regard to paving and making streets, excepting foot pavements, as above provided, shall not apply to any roads or streets, which are or may come under the management of turnpike or other road trustees, and this Act shall in no respect repeal, alter, or affect the powers or obligations of such trustees, or the provisions of any Act of Parliament under which they act." Now, this must be read along with the provision with reference to the special heading or division of the Act of Parliament in which it is found, and that is the "laying out of new streets," and, therefore, it has no application to the question with which we are now dealing, which is the case of a turnpike road situated in a town or burgh, but under distinct management.

Reference was made to section 237 of the statute; and here, again, it is very necessary to keep in view what is the subject of that part of the statute in which this clause occurs, viz., "Precautions during repairs, and old and ruinous tenements." There are two subjects, therefore, dealt with in this division, and the division runs from section 233 down to 247, inclusive. Of these the first five refer to the matter of "precautions during repair," and the remaining sections refer to "old and ruinous tenements." It is quite impossible to read these sections in sequence, one after the other, without seeing that that is certainly the meaning of that part of the statute, that these two subjects alone are dealt with. The only question that can be raised, and which was raised, by the pursuer's counsel, was whether section 237 refers exclusively either to the matter of precautions during repairs, or to the matter of old and ruinous tenements. Now, it appears to me that it applies to the former of these subjects. The 1st section of this branch provides that hoards shall be erected across streets while repairs or alterations are being made, and lights put up at night. Clause 234 provides that hoards are to be set up during repairs, so as to enclose the work that is going on. Section 235 imposes penalties for not lighting deposits of building materials, or holes made in the course of carrying on such repairs. The provision is thus made—"When any building materials, rubbish, or other things are laid, or any hole made, in any such streets, whether the same be done by order of the commissioners or not, the person causing such materials or other things to be laid, or such hole to be made, shall, at his own expense, cause a sufficient light to be fixed in a proper place upon or near the same, and continue such light every night from sunsetting to sunrising while such materials or hole remain; and such person shall, at his own expense, cause such materials or other things, and such hole, to be sufficiently fenced and enclosed until such materials or other things are removed, or the hole filled up, or otherwise made secure; and every such person who fails so to light, fence, or enclose such materials or other things, or such hole, shall, for every such offence, be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5, and a farther penalty, not exceeding 40s., for every day while such default is continued." Then comes section 236—"In no case shall any such building materials or other things, or such hole, be allowed to remain longer than may be fixed by the surveyor, under a penalty not exceeding £5 to be paid for every such offence by the person who causes such materials or other things to be laid, or such hole to be made, and a farther penalty, not exceeding 40s., for every day during which such offence is continued after the conviction for such offence." Now, immediately following upon these, comes the section in question (237)—"If any building or hole, or any other place near any public or private street, be, for want of sufficient repair, protection, or enclosure, dangerous to the passengers along such streets, the commissioners shall cause the same to be repaired, protected, or enclosed so as to prevent danger therefrom."

Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith.

Now, I should be sorry to limit that section too strictly, or to construe it with reference to the preceding clause, because its words are very comprehensive, but, on the other hand, we must not extend its meaning so as to make it applicable to a different class of cases altogether, and to different parts of the statute with which it has no connection. If, according to the words of this clause, any building or hole, or any other place, is, for want of sufficient protection or enclosure, dangerous to the public, the commissioners are to put the same right. Now, a building which is in course of repair, or which needs repair, may be within that section of the statute perfectly well, although the provisions of the clauses which I have read do not expressly apply to that. But then, on the other hand, to say that this section 237 is to apply to the case of the erection of a parapet wall along a turnpike road which is not within the management of the magistrates of the burgh at all, but where their right of administration is excluded, and the right is vested in another body of trustees, is to use the section of the statute for a purpose for which it is quite obvious it never was intended, and therefore, I think, the pursuer takes no benefit from this section of the statute. And the matter just reverts to where it was before the Act of 1862 was passed. The magistrates of Leith are vested with the administration and management, paving and maintenance of certain streets and roads within the burgh, but there is expressly excepted from the statutes applicable to these a particular part of a turnpike road, which, although lying within the limits of the burgh, is under the management of a body of trustees, and such is the road in question.

It is plain, therefore, that the erection of a parapet wall such as we are dealing with here is a matter for the road trustees of the Cramond district, and it is those very words which I think I have already read, of the 94th section of the General Turnpike Act, which require the road trustees, and every road trust, to fence dangerous places along a road. If the burgh of Leith, or its magistrates, were to take upon themselves to alter this parapet wall, I rather apprehend they would not only be exceeding their powers, but they would be encroaching on the powers of another body of trustees altogether. They might render themselves liable, perhaps, by doing so, but I do not see how they could possibly render themselves liable by omitting to do that which is not within their duty, but which is within the duty of another body of statutory trustees.

It has been said that this place, being within the burgh, the Magistrates of Leith, if they saw that there was an insufficient fence here, ought to have called upon the road trustees of the Cramond district to make it sufficient. But I do not see any statutory duty on them under any of the various Acts of Parliament to which we were referred. I see in the General Turnpike Act that, if the road trustees of the county fail in their duties about a matter of this kind, the procurator-fiscal is entitled to enforce these against them, and a commissioner of supply of the county may do so, but I see no such power given to any one else, and, therefore, it rather appears to me that it is a very dangerous thing for a public body like the magistrates of this burgh to interfere with the duties of another statutory body of trustees. It might very well be that, as a matter of common prudence, if the magistrates of a burgh saw a danger of this kind, they might call upon the road trustees to see that it was put right. I see nothing against that. But that is not the case here. The question here is, whether by omitting to do so, or by not doing so, the Magistrates of Leith have incurred a legal liability. It does not appear to me that any such liability lies upon these defenders, but that it rests upon another body, unless they have a special defence which will amount to an answer to an action brought to enforce that liability.

I am therefore of opinion that we should sustain the defenders' second plea in law, and assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action.

LORD DEAS.—I have read this proof very attentively, and listened to the very full discussion of the case which we have had.

There can be no doubt at all as to the dangerous nature of this footpath alongside this wall, which—the wall I mean—is only some twenty-one inches, or at all events less than two feet, in height on the side on which people walk, and some sixteen or seventeen feet perpendicular down to the sea-beach upon the other side. That this was a very dangerous footpath, and most inadequately fenced, does not admit of the slightest doubt or dispute. If, therefore, this poor man was lawfully using this footpath, and fell over this wall, as was plainly proved to be the case, it is perfectly clear that the only available answer which could be made to a claim by those in his right would be an answer of contributory negligence. Now, I am clearly of opinion, as I understand your Lordship also to be, that on the face of this proof no contributory negligence can be attributed to him. He was walking along this footpath, which at the place of the accident is very narrow, and it seems his purpose was to make water at a place adapted and used for that purpose. There was no other place of the kind except at a considerable distance, and which is proved to have been totally dark. I have no doubt at all, therefore, that he was fairly entitled to go to the place in question for the purpose stated, and that it was through no fault or negligence on his part that he fell over the wall. The proof all goes to shew that the night was rough and stormy, and that anybody would have been in danger of falling over this wall, however well he knew the road or path, or however carefully he was walking on it. I think it is impossible to say there was contributory negligence No. 116.

The question therefore comes to be, whether anybody is liable for the very dangerous state of this footpath and wall, and, if so, who is liable? Now, I confess Mar. 11, 1881.
Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith. I think the matter is attended with more difficulty than your Lordship seems to have thought it. I must say I have great difficulty in holding that the Magistrates of Leith are not under such liability. I think that the series of statutes which your Lordship has cited may be held to shew that the Magistrates of Leith are not liable to maintain that footpath or that wall; but the question here is, whether they were bound to fence this place or to see it put into a proper and safe condition by those on whom that liability rested.

I do not perceive that the cases in which magistrates have been found liable for obstructions on streets or dangers on streets have turned upon the obligation or even the right of maintenance. The well-known case of Innes, which is to be found in Morrison, p. 13,189, and which arose in connection with an accident that occurred in the course of the erection of the College of Edinburgh, did not, I am satisfied, turn upon such an obligation of maintenance, but rather upon the duty of the Magistrates of Edinburgh to keep the streets clear. In the course of the operations it had been necessary to dig a pit about fifteen feet deep in the lane on the north side of the building, and of course it became necessary to fence that pit. On the night in question this had been neglected, and Mr Innes, on his way from Leith to his lodgings at Bristol Port, fell into the pit and broke his thigh-bone, for which accident the Magistrates of Edinburgh were found liable in damages and expenses, it being observed on the bench that "one of their most important duties was to take care that the streets of the city are kept in such a state as to prevent the slightest danger to passengers." I am not prepared to say, however, that this path is in any fair sense one of the streets of Leith under the care of the magistrates. They are vested undoubtedly by the statutes which your Lordship has mentioned, and by the Lindsay Act, 25 and 26 Victoria, chapter 101, with all the powers and all the liabilities of magistrates of royal burghs. If they were liable I do not think it would be a good defence that the road trustees were also liable. As to a right of relief we cannot deal with such a question in the absence of the party who is said to be liable in relief, and who may have a perfectly good answer to the claim.

But however all that may be, there is a great deal of reason in the views which your Lordship has stated in support of the conclusion you have arrived at. I must say I feel the force of your Lordship's elaborate elucidation of the confused mass of legislation in these Acts of Parliament, and while taking leave to state the difficulties that present themselves to my mind I do not dissent from your Lordship's conclusion. I have only greater difficulty than your Lordship in holding that magistrates of royal burghs, of which the burgh of Leith is one, cannot be held liable in cases like the present. It cannot lessen their liability that these magistrates are also commissioners of police under the local Acts, and also under the General Police Act, with all the powers, maintenance, jurisdiction, assessment, and others conferred on them by these Acts. If they are liable at all, they are liable as much in one capacity as the other. But, as I have said, I am not prepared to hold that they are liable at all. I should have had little difficulty if we had had anybody in the field who was liable for the keeping up of this path and parapet wall. But we

No. 116. have not the road trustees here, and we have no right to say anything about them. If any action is brought against them they may be able to state a good defence; but whether they are liable, or whether they have a good defence or not, is not a question that we can decide here. In these circumstances, I cannot dissent from the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived.

Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith.

LORD MURE.—I am of opinion that the cause of the accident which here occurred is pretty clear, namely, the lowness and consequent insufficiency of the wall as a protection at so dangerous a place. It was originally built at the height of four feet, and remained at that height till it was carried away by the sea in 1876, and rebuilt by the road trustees at the height of two feet. Since this accident occurred it has been again rebuilt by the road trustees at their expense, and raised to its original height.

On the evidence I have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that if the wall, when it was rebuilt or repaired in 1876, had been rebuilt at its original height of four feet, the accident would in all probability never have occurred; and upon the question of contributory negligence I am very clearly of opinion that, upon the evidence, no such defence has been established. So standing the facts upon the evidence, the pursuer's claim would appear to be against the road trustees. But this action is directed not against the road trustees, in whose district the road is placed by section 64 of the Act of 1835, but against the Provost and Magistrates of Leith; and the question for decision is whether these defenders are liable in reparation, in respect either of their powers and obligations as magistrates under the various Acts of Parliament passed since 1832 or at common law.

On the question of common law liability the case of Threshie v. Magistrates of Annan has been referred to, but it appears to me to have no direct application. The place there in dispute was the street of a royal burgh, which was the property of that burgh, and had been under the charge and management of the burgh long before the existence of the Act of Parliament of 1777 constituting the road trust. The onus, therefore, there lay on the burgh to shew that, by the Road Act, their rights and obligations in respect of that street had been transferred to the road trustees. That they failed to do; and the Court had therefore no difficulty in holding that they were bound to keep up and maintain in proper repair the streets of their own burgh. The present case, however, is the converse of that in every respect. The road was under the management and charge of the road trustees before Leith was made a burgh in the sense of the magistrates having any jurisdiction over the streets or roads within it, or within the districts from time to time attached to it under the various Acts of Parliament to which your Lordships have referred. The onus, therefore, is here laid on the pursuer to shew that the road was taken out of the jurisdiction of the road trustees, and placed under the charge of the Magistrates of Leith. This, I think, she has failed to do. It was placed under the jurisdiction of the road trustees under the Road Act of 1835. It is not very clear upon the evidence who it was that built the original wall, but it is not disputed that it was rebuilt in 1876 by the road trustees, who take charge of the keeping up of the surface of the road at the present date. And with reference to the various statutes by which a certain jurisdiction was given to the defenders over roads brought within their district, it appears to me that the jurisdiction so given was of a special and limited description, and did not reach the road here in question, to the extent of subjecting the defenders in the duty of protecting the public from the danger here complained of, and of relieving the road trustees from their obligations in that respect. No. 116.

Upon the construction of those statutes I concur in the exposition given by your Lordship in the chair, and have nothing to add. Mar. 11, 1881.
Harris v.
Magistrates
of Leith.

LORD SHAND.—I think the pursuer in this case has clearly shewn that the part of the road at which her late husband lost his life was a very dangerous place, and it is equally clear the danger was an obvious one. If it had been proved that the accident happened in the precise way in which the witness Banyard and another witness have described, by the deceased Captain Harris stopping for the purpose referred to in their evidence on a slippery path in the darkness, with a wall of two feet in front of him, and a drop of seventeen feet on the other side, I should have had very great difficulty in holding that that was not a case of contributory negligence. The danger was not only obvious, but was fully known to him, and if he thought fit to run the risk, and fell over in consequence, I should hold that he or his representatives were not entitled to be relieved of the pecuniary consequences by recovering damages in such an action as the present. But I do not think that the proof clearly shews that the accident occurred in that way. The argument submitted by Mr Goudy was that it was just as likely that the deceased fell over in the ordinary use of this road, while walking along it, instead of in the way suggested by the witnesses, and, adopting that view, I am of opinion that contributory negligence has not been proved.

As the case came from the Lord Ordinary, his Lordship had adjusted an issue, putting the question, whether the defenders had failed in their duty of lighting this road. But the argument was presented that there was a much wider duty on the defenders at common law, and, looking to the obligations on them in respect of this road, under the series of statutes to which we have been referred; and it became necessary to have the facts as well as these statutes before the Court, and accordingly a proof was allowed and taken. It is not now maintained that the Magistrates of Leith have failed in their duty in lighting the road. It appears that there were lamps at proper intervals along its pathways, and that this place was as well lighted as any in the burgh. Accordingly, there is no case for the pursuer on this point.

But it was said there was liability on the defenders in another way,—that there was a duty on them at common law, as magistrates of the burgh, to see that the wall was of a height sufficient to protect the public in the use of it, and alternatively, that there was a statutory duty under their Acts to that effect.

As to the common law duty, I think the arguments of the pursuer fail, the place in question not having been within the burgh proper. The cases of Innes and Dargie were cases in which the accident had occurred within royal burghs,—within that part of the town which was entirely under the control of the magistrates for maintenance, care, and lighting,—and therefore these cases are quite unlike the present, for the place where this accident occurred was between one and two miles away from the burgh upon a road which was undoubtedly a country road, with which the Magistrates of Leith had nothing to do in the way of ordinary care, maintenance, and repair. The case of Threshie goes no farther than the cases of Innes and Dargie. That was not a question of liability for an accident, but a question between the Magistrates of Annan and the road trustees as to which of them was bound to keep up the High Street of Annan, and the Court held, that as that street was within the royalty, and was proper burghal territory, the magistrates were the persons to maintain it and responsible for the care of it. In all of these cases the locus was within the proper royalty or burgh. In this case it has been proved that the locus was only within the parliamentary boundary, and within that limit only for certain police purposes defined by statute, so far as the magistrates were concerned. I do not think there are any grounds in law to support the argument in favour of the common law liability maintained.

The only question that remains is, whether under the statutes referred to and founded on there is such responsibility? And on that point I think it unnecessary to add anything to what has been already said. I cannot doubt that the duty of providing for the safety of the road lay with the road trustees, against whom, within the statutory time, it was in the pursuer's power to insist in a claim of damages by the proper action.

I am of opinion, with your Lordships, that the defenders should be assoilized.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustain the second plea of the defenders: Assoilzie the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses, and remit," &c.

Agent and Client—Employment—Law-Agents Act, 1873 (Stat. 36 and 37 Vict., cap. 63), sec. 21—Prescription—Reference to Oath.—In an action by Edinburgh law-agents against a person in Glasgow for an account of expenses incurred by them in conducting an action in the Court of Session in his name on the instructions of a Glasgow law-agent, the defender pleaded (1) prescription, and (2) that he had not employed the pursuers. The plea of prescription having been sustained, the pursuers referred the matter to the defender's oath. He deposed that he had not employed the Glasgow agent; that he did not know of the action in the Court of Session until after it had been commenced; that when told of it he informed the Glasgow agent that if he went on with it he must do so on his own responsibility and at his own risk, and that he had not employed the pursuers. Held that the oath was negative of the reference.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
I.

MESSRS T. & W. A. M'LAREN, W.S., Edinburgh, in December 1879, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow against Alexander M'Dougall, pilot there, for £25, being the balance of an account incurred to them, as they alleged, on the employment of M'Dougall in conducting a civil action for him in the Court of Session against two persons—Campbell, a grocer, and Middleton, a Sheriff-officer. The decree had been extracted on 8th November 1876, and subsequent to that date the only entry in the account was for obtaining a fiat of imprisonment against Campbell in January 1877. M'Dougall stated in defence that he had arranged through a Mr Ampleford with Mr Fisher M'Laren, the Glasgow agent who had employed Messrs M'Laren, that though he was to appear as pursuer in the action, he was not to be responsible for any expense incurred, and that Mr Fisher M'Laren was to trust to recovering his charges from the defenders in the action of damages. He denied all employment No. 117. of Messrs M'Laren in Edinburgh, the pursuers.

Pleaded for M'Dougall;—(1) The defender pleads prescription. (2) The defender not having employed the pursuers, and it having been arranged that said action against the said James Campbell and R. Middleton should be conducted free of charge to the defender as aforesaid, the defender is entitled to decree of absolvitor, with costs. Mar. 16, 1881.
M'Laren v.
M'Dougall.

The Sheriff-substitute (Galbraith), on 29th January 1880, sustained the plea of prescription, and on 6th March the Sheriff (Clark), on appeal, adhered to his substitute's interlocutor.

On 2d July the pursuers lodged a minute of reference to oath. The oath was taken on the same day. The substance of the deposition was practically the same as that subsequently emitted before Lord Young in the Court of Session, and printed below.

On 13th July the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) found the oath affirmative of the reference, and decerned against the defender.* On 18th November the Sheriff adhered.

M'Dougall appealed to the Court of Session.

At the hearing on 28th January 1881 the Court appointed the defender's oath to be taken de novo, and remitted to Lord Young to take the deposition. This was done on 10th March 1881. The following deposition was then made:—"I never employed Mr Fisher M'Laren, writer in Glasgow, to raise an action against Campbell and Middleton. I authorised no one to employ him. I did not authorise Mr Ampleford to employ him. I saw Mr Fisher M'Laren after the action was raised. When he told me that an action had been raised in the Court of Session, I told him that it was on his own responsibility; he had no authority from me. He had written me a note to call upon him, and I called, and it was then he told me that an action had been raised in the Court of Session. Mr Ampleford told me he had seen Mr M'Laren previously, and had shewn him the decree against me, and he (M'Laren) thought it was a clear case for false imprisonment. I had not asked Mr Ampleford to consult Mr M'Laren on the subject, but he knew of my imprisonment, and had done it at his own hand. He did not tell me before he saw Mr M'Laren that he was going to see him; it was after he had seen him that he told me he had seen him. He had no authority from me to see him, or to consult

* "NOTE.— . . . The averment on record founded on by defender is that a certain Mr Ampleford made an agreement with Mr M'Laren, writer, Glasgow, that the litigation in question should be conducted without defender being responsible for any charges in connection with it. Defender, however, does not say, and in point of fact in his oath he admits that he had no communication with pursuers to this effect, nor does he assert that Mr M'Laren, Glasgow, made any such arrangement with pursuers. Now, as matter of law it is provided by the 21st section of the Law-Agents Act, 1873, that a law-agent, authorised in acting for a client whom he discloses, shall incur no liability to any other law-agent employed by him, except such as he shall expressly undertake in writing. It seems to follow from this that an Edinburgh law-agent has only in the usual case his client responsible for expenses incurred in an action, and not another law-agent who employs him, and I therefore take it that it is no good defence to an action of this kind to say an agreement was made with a Glasgow agent that a litigant should not be responsible in connection with an action. It seems to me clear that where defender admits that the action was carried on with his knowledge by the Edinburgh agents, and that he himself was examined as a witness in causa, that he must be held to be the client of the Edinburgh agents. Arriving at this result, I think the oath affirmative of the reference." . . .

him on the subject. It was a month or six weeks after Mr Ampleford told me this that I had a note from Mr M'Laren asking me to call upon him. I did not say to Mr M'Laren when I saw him either to go on or not to go on, but I said to him that if he did go on it was at his own risk. He said the case was in already. He did not say that anybody was acting for him in Edinburgh, and I did not know that anybody was until I went to Edinburgh. The conversation began with Mr M'Laren's clerk, but he was present at the end. . . . He precognosced both my daughter and me as witnesses to the false imprisonment on the first occasion. I saw a young man whom I understood to be a clerk to the writers in Edinburgh that were conducting the case for Mr Fisher M'Laren of Glasgow. I told the clerk it was a speculation case of Mr M'Laren in Glasgow, and that I was not responsible for the expenses. He said he thought it was a good case; he knew well enough I had no means to give them. I don't think I ever saw the writers themselves—only the young man that I believed to be their clerk, and he knew that it was a speculation case of Mr M'Laren in Glasgow. I have paid nothing to Mr Fisher M'Laren in Glasgow. I did not know there were any agents in Edinburgh at all till I went through at Mr Fisher M'Laren's request and saw the clerk, and then I told him it was a speculation case of Mr Fisher M'Laren's, and that I was not to be liable for any expenses. Interrogated for the defender.—The first time Mr Ampleford told me he had been at Mr Fisher M'Laren's and had explained the case to him, he said that Mr M'Laren was going to raise an action against Campbell and Middleton, and was not to hold either me or him (Ampleford) liable for the expenses. I was quite willing to let him do what he liked with it on these terms, and I said that to Ampleford. I had never seen or heard of Mr Fisher M'Laren before Ampleford told me that. Ampleford stayed on the same stairhead with me for many years—was a great friend of mine, and is now married to my daughter. He was not married to her at that time. He was a debt collector, and was acquainted with Mr Fisher M'Laren. The first time I saw Mr Fisher M'Laren he told me he was not to hold me responsible for any charges. I did not know that any Edinburgh agent was required at all, and I did not know that any one was employed. It was two days before the trial that Mr Fisher M'Laren sent me to Edinburgh, and I first saw the clerk of the agents that were conducting the case there. I never saw themselves."

Parties were then reheard.

Argued for M'Dougall;—There having been no employment in the ordinary sense here the defender was not liable. He had expressly stipulated that though the Glasgow agent might use his name he was not to be liable in expenses. As regarded the pursuers he had never heard of them till shortly before the trial. Their remedy was against their Glasgow correspondent, if, indeed, they had any remedy at all, as they had been warned through their clerk that the case was a purely speculative one.

Argued for Messrs M'Laren;—The oath was affirmative of the reference. There could be no private limitation of employment as a general agent as regarded third parties, unless the knowledge of such a limitation was brought home to them,¹ which was not the case here.

Under the provisions of the 21st section of the Law-Agents Act, 1873,² the Edinburgh agents were entitled to look to the client, and not to their country correspondent, for payment. The defender knew that the action was going on in his name in the Court of Session and conducted by the pursuers, with whom he had no special agreement, and yet he never objected. No. 117.

Mar. 16, 1881.
M'Larens v.
M'Dougall.

LORD YOUNG.—I am very clearly of opinion that this oath is negative of the reference, and I cannot assent to the view on which the Sheriff proceeded, or to the view of the oath submitted by the pursuers' counsel.

The Sheriff-substitute is of opinion that if it is established by the deposition on oath that the action was raised, and the defender was aware that it was, then no more is necessary to make him liable. I do not think that is maintainable. It may be sufficient in the case of a party raising his action for his account within the period of prescription to say that the defender knew that the action had been raised in his name, and that he did not disapprove of it. That, I say, may be sufficient to infer liability when the action is raised in time, but we are not in such a case here; the action has been delayed beyond the period of prescription, and the question of employment so as to establish liability has been referred to the defender's oath. Now, in a reference to oath, it must be proved that the debt sued for was incurred and is resting owing. The deponent, after saying that he was aware that the action was raised in his name, and that he did not disapprove of it, is entitled to go on to explain—as he has done—the circumstances under which the action came to be raised. It seems he had been put in gaol under circumstances which a friend thought would found a claim for damages, and this friend told the affair to a Mr Fisher M'Laren, an agent, who was of opinion that there was a clear case for an action of damages for wrongous imprisonment. The defender himself had no idea of going to law, but the agent sent for him and asked him his story. He told it, and he has now sworn that he added that the agent might raise an action if he liked, but it would be at his own risk, as he himself had no money. That is all the authority he gave, and upon that authority the agent proceeded. I assume that the story is true, as it was given on oath. The agent, not being able to conduct the case in the Court of Session himself, employed Edinburgh agents. He did not communicate that to the defender at the time, and the defender says he did not know any such employment was necessary, and that he never heard of the Edinburgh agents until he was sent through to Edinburgh, and that when he did go there he told the clerk who met him that it was well known that the case was a speculative case of the Glasgow agent's. These being the facts of the case the pursuers have raised their action for their expenses, but they have delayed it so long that this story of the defender's is all the evidence we can get, and such as it is I must hold it negative of the reference.

I cannot assent to the argument founded upon the section of the Law-Agents Act, in which it is provided that where a law-agent, acting under the authority of his client, employs an agent in town, the client, and not the country agent, shall be responsible. The point of that provision is that the country agent must be acting with the authority of his client. If he exceeds his authority he will himself become liable. It is conceded that if he have no authority he is liable. But to exceed his authority is the same. An agent exceeding his authority will bind himself. He may sometimes bind his principal, but he always binds himself if he fails to bind his principal. If the pursuers here understood this case to be a totally different one from what it truly was their remedy is to hold the Glasgow agent liable. Unfortunately speculative cases do exist, but in a case which is really of that character there is no claim against

No. 117. the client. If the one agent has deceived the other then he will be liable personally. I must assume this to be a case of that character, as the deposition on oath, which is the only evidence we can have, is to that effect.

Mar. 16, 1881.
M'Larens v.
M'Dougall.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion, and for the reasons assigned by your Lordship. There is no satisfactory explanation of the employment, and the defender on oath denies any employment. The question having been referred to the defender's oath we must now consider whether his deposition is affirmative or negative of the reference.

It is plain enough that this Glasgow agent took up the case as a speculation. The pursuers, however, say that they were never told that it was a speculation, and that they are therefore entitled to come upon the client. If the condition mentioned in the deposition really was communicated, then the Edinburgh agents are in no better position than the Glasgow one. It appears to me that if the deposition is correct it was communicated, at all events, to the clerk of the Edinburgh agents.

I entirely concur in the construction put by your Lordship on the section of the Law-Agents Act.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur. The judgment must proceed upon the deposition on oath. The pursuers have perilled their case upon that, and I am clearly of opinion that it is negative of the reference.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, find the oath of the defender negative of the reference; therefore sustain the appeal; recall the judgments appealed against; assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decern: Find the defender entitled to expenses in the inferior Court and in this Court, and remit," &c.

Public Company—Winding up—List of Contributories—Constitution of Membership.—In the winding up of a joint stock company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, to entitle the liquidators to place the representatives of a deceased person upon the list of contributories they must prove that before his death he was a registered shareholder, or was bound to the company to become so.

A person who had been a chief originator and adviser in the formation of a company, and who, along with others, had signed a paper agreeing to subscribe £1000 towards the capital of the company if it were started, died the day after the memorandum of association was registered, and previously to the allocation of the shares. Further, he had been one of the seven signatories required for the memorandum of association, where his name was entered for the statutory single share. Held that the deceased had incurred no liability to the company except as a party to the memorandum of association, by which he became bound to take one share.

ON 16th October 1876 the Inverkeithing Foundry and Shipbuilding premises, belonging to John Scott & Son's sequestrated estate, were purchased for £4400 by James Cruickshanks, Inverkeithing, for himself, Mr William Fraser, town-clerk of Inverkeithing, and two other persons. No. 118.

Thereafter the following memorandum, holograph of Mr Fraser, was drawn up:—"Inverkeithing Foundry and Shipbuilding Yard.—This foundry having been purchased at the low price of £4400, which is considered to be not nearly half its value, it has been proposed to form a joint stock company to carry the works on. The proposed capital to be £20,000, the half of which, it is expected, will be sufficient, leaving the half uncalled up. On the company being formed, the works will be made over by the purchaser to the company." It was signed by Fraser and the other three purchasers of the works, and also by about a dozen other persons. Against their names were the amounts (in toto £5650) which they severally subscribed. Opposite Fraser's signature there was entered—"£1000. Paid £500."

Meetings of persons interested in the proposed scheme were thereafter held to consider whether the works should be resold or a company formed to carry them on.

On 23d January 1877, in view of the formation of a company, two persons were appointed a committee "to get the capital so far up privately, and thereafter to issue a prospectus, which Mr Fraser was authorised to prepare." Fraser accordingly prepared a prospectus, in which he was designed as "secretary and solicitor," and it was set forth that "£6000 of the capital has been taken." Of that £6000 Mr Fraser's £1000 and the other sums subscribed by the promoters formed a part.

It was shortly afterwards resolved that a company, with a capital of £25,000, divided into 2500 shares of £10 each, should be formed and registered, and on 28th February the memorandum of association was approved by the promoters, and ordered to be printed. On 1st March it was signed, in terms of the Companies Acts of 1862 and 1867, by seven of these gentlemen, including Mr Fraser, each for one share of £10. The company was registered upon 3d March 1877, the statutory notice which had been sent to the registrar of joint stock companies being signed by two of the directors, and by Fraser as "secretary and solicitor of the company."

Mr Fraser died upon the next day, viz., the 4th March.

The first meeting of the company was held on 10th March 1877, when Mr Hall Grigor was appointed "secretary and solicitor" in Mr Fraser's stead, and subsequently, on 4th June, the directors allotted shares to those who had applied, and to fifteen others, also named, "who had agreed to become shareholders of the company, in terms of the prospectus and articles of association of the company." In the latter list was the name—"William Fraser, Inverkeithing (dead), 100 shares," and the names of the others who had signed the original memorandum which followed upon the purchase of the property, with the exception of two, who declined to join.

A share register of the company was thereafter made up in terms of that allotment.

At a general meeting of the company, held upon 23d December 1878, it was unanimously resolved to wind it up voluntarily, under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, and joint liquidators were appointed for that purpose. A list of contributories was made up, and the names of the trustees and executors of William Fraser were placed on the second part of it, in respect of a holding of 100 shares, the half of which, amounting to £500, had been paid.

No. 118.

Mar. 17, 1881.
Molleson and
Grigor v.
Fraser's Trustees.

This was a petition brought, under the 101st and 138th section of the Companies Act, 1862, to enforce payment of calls, the call alleged to be due by Fraser's representatives being the remaining £500 upon the 100 shares.

In the answers it was stated that Mr Fraser had subscribed the memorandum and articles of association to the extent of one share only, and that the petitioners had no authority to place his name upon the register for more than the one. There were these further averments:—"The deceased never became, and never agreed to become, a shareholder of the said company except to the extent above explained, and the petitioners have failed to produce any evidence to the respondents of his having done so. . . . The respondents submit that, if the petitioners conceive they have any just claim for the calls now sued for, they should proceed to constitute the same in the usual way, and that there is no call, in the circumstances, for any extraordinary procedure, or for the exercise by the Court of its summary powers under the statute. In any view, the petitioners are called upon to condescend on the evidence, if any, on which they rely, as establishing an agreement by the deceased to take 100 shares in the said company."

A proof was led, the result of which sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

Argued for the petitioners;—1. It was not essential that Fraser should have been a shareholder in order to make him a contributory. It was enough that he had agreed to take shares.¹ This case was not distinguishable from Sharpus's and Lord Mansfield's cases in England. What was narrated by 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 110 in England, as these cases shewed, was the common law of Scotland. There was here an agreement by certain parties to become partners and to take shares in a company to be formed, which was enough without any formal contract of copartnery.² 2. The company was not a separate persona from the promoters.³ The latter brought it into existence, and it took benefit by their actings. They were parties to the contract which eminently promoted the interests of the company, and was therefore binding upon it.⁴ It was absolutely necessary for the formation of the company, for it was through it that the company was floated. It was laid upon the company's table by the promoters, which surely bound them, whether the company were bound or not. 3. If the contract was binding, and Fraser had agreed to become a member of the company, the agreement did not fall by his death.

Argued for the respondents;—1. This was a voluntary liquidation, and the liquidators represented the company alone, and neither creditors nor contributories. Fraser had not agreed to become a member of the company. The "agreement" specified in the 23d section of the Companies Act, 1862, was one with the company. Both parties must be bound, or neither. Membership of a company was usually constituted (1) by application for shares, and (2) by allotment, and communication of allotment to allottee.⁵ The directors had an absolute discretion in the allocation. 2. A company was not bound by the contracts of its promoters, where these were not found in the memorandum or in the articles of association. The cases of Sharpus and of Cookney belonged to a distinctly recognised class, which fell under the Act of 1844 (7 and 8 Vict. cap. 110), and did not apply. Palmer's case was decided upon the footing that after the formation of the company he had admitted that there was a contract binding on him. 3. This was like the case of an abortive company, where the promoters were not even bound as partners inter se, and were not liable to contribute.¹ 4. Fraser did not bind himself with the promoters to get up the company; it was only inchoate, and all might resile. At the best, it was only a conditional acceptance of shares, upon the footing that the capital was subscribed. 5. All mandates fell by death, except such as were protected by statute.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this voluntary liquidation the liquidator has placed upon the second part of the list of contributories the names of the trustees and executors of the late William Fraser. In the ordinary case that imports that they are so entered as the representatives of a deceased shareholder. I do not say that, in order to entitle the liquidator so to enter parties in such a representative character, the deceased shareholder must, during life, have been entered upon the register of shareholders. But, in order to justify such an entry, it must be proved that the deceased had agreed to become a member of the company, and by that I mean that he had agreed with the company to become a member. The liquidator represents the company, and no one else. He represents neither the individual shareholder nor the creditor, and therefore, unless Mr Fraser was bound to the company to become a member, the liquidator cannot succeed in this application.

The history of this company is not very remarkable, and resembles that of a number of others which we have seen. It started with the purchase of the Inverkeithing Foundry in 1876. Four parties were the purchasers, and they bought the works at a price which they thought very much below their value, thus considering that they were entering into a profitable transaction. They induced others to take shares, their proposal to form a company being expressed in the following memorandum :—"This foundry having been purchased at the low price of £4400, which is considered to be not nearly half its value, it has been proposed to form a joint stock company to carry the works on. The proposed capital to be £20,000, the half of which it is expected will be sufficient, leaving the half uncalled up. On the company being formed the works will be made over by the purchaser to the company." That memorandum or note was written by Mr Fraser, and was signed by a number of other persons, who indicated after their signatures the sums they were prepared to subscribe for the purpose of paying for the works. These figures were also intended to represent the interest which each was to have in the joint stock company when it was ultimately formed.

The question is, what is the effect of this memorandum, in the first place, as between the parties who subscribed it. I think it is no more than that they are liable for the sums opposite their names with a view to provide the funds requisite to vest them in the property of the foundry works and to entitle them to deal with them as their own. The memorandum does not explain, and I do not think it at all follows from it, that in the event of a company being formed the subscribers will take shares in it. That is not implied as a matter of contract or of undertaking between the parties, although, at the same time, I do not doubt that it was agreed that if the money was subscribed the subscribers would take shares. It was not certain that a company would be started. There was obviously this alternative present to the minds of the subscribers, viz., that the foundry works might sell at a greater price than had been paid for them. At the meeting which took place in November 1876, after the purchase of the foundry, that was adopted as the view of the meeting. That course recommended itself not merely because it might be found difficult to subscribe the capital, as indeed was actually the case, but also because the owners thought they would be able to sell at a larger profit than they could otherwise make. The case of the petitioners, in so far as it is rested upon the memorandum, cannot be advanced further than this, that there was a general undertaking that the parties named had entered into a speculation to the extent of the funds opposite their names, but they were not bound by any mutual contract beyond that.

The company was thereafter formed, not without difficulty, but the capital was subscribed by persons outside, though, judging from the allocation of the shares, only a very small amount of it was got from the general public. The company did not start under the most favourable auspices, but Fraser had got so much encouragement that it was resolved to launch it, and accordingly a memorandum of association was subscribed and registered. It was subscribed by seven persons, of whom Fraser was one, and the other six were all parties to the original memorandum of October 1876. They were each subscribers for one share, which was all that was necessary under the Act of Parliament. The effect was to make these seven persons, representing £70 of stock, the joint stock company. The memorandum of association bears that—"We, the several persons whose names and addresses are subscribed, are desirous of being formed into a company, in pursuance of this memorandum of association, and we respectively agree to take the number of shares in the capital of the company set opposite our respective names."

The company was registered upon 3d March 1877. Mr Fraser died the next day, and it certainly cannot be assumed, and it was not the case, that anything happened after the registration of the memorandum of association which could in any way affect Mr Fraser's position. The company so formed had also articles of association drawn up, which (art. 83) provided that—"The first directors shall be Douglas Donald Cameron Menzies, Inverkeithing, James Ross, shipowner, Inverkeithing, Thomas Law, farmer, Boreland, Inverkeithing, Peter M. Thomson, Inverkeithing, Daniel Duncan, shipowner, Rothesay, Robert Slimon, merchant, Leith, with power to add to their number;" and it was further provided that each of these parties, in order to qualify him, should hold ten shares in the company. So soon as they began to act in the capacity of directors they thereby undertook to take ten shares in the company. That was in addition to the £70 in the memorandum of association. They had an important duty to perform upon coming into office. It fell to them to allot the shares at the meeting held upon 4th June 1877. The secretary intimated that he had received applications for shares from certain parties, and forty-four shares were thereupon allotted to these parties by the directors. They then proceeded to allot to those who had subscribed the memorandum of October 1876. But the list of those to whom allotments were made does not contain the whole of the names appended to that memorandum. Mr Daniel Duncan declined to take shares, and his name is not inserted, and accordingly no shares were allotted to him. Mr Strachan, too, had withdrawn, and none were allotted to him. But shares were allotted to Mr Fraser. That seems to have been a blunder. It is impossible to regard Mr Fraser as upon the register of shareholders. Still that is hardly of importance as affecting the question raised in the present case. No. 118.

Mar. 17, 1881.
Molleson and
Grigor v.
Fraser's Trustees.

The question is, whether the circumstances which happened during Mr Fraser's lifetime constituted him a member of the company, and subject to liabilities as such. In order to that result it seems to me that it will be necessary for the company to shew that he had contracted with them so as to make him a member. Even supposing he were bound by the contract into which he entered under the memorandum of October 1876, that would not have been a contract with the company. I do not think the company would have been bound to give him shares. Still less was he bound to the company to make an application for shares. His brother promoters who signed the memorandum might have a claim against him. I do not think so; but assuming that he was bound to them, they might enforce the obligation against him to make good the terms and stipulations of the memorandum. But the binding character of that contract would not regulate in any way his position as regards the company.

I think it is unnecessary to go over more in detail the circumstances of this case. I do not find that there exists what I hold to be indispensable in order to make Mr Fraser's representatives liable to be placed upon the list of contributories, viz., an undertaking by Mr Fraser, their constituent, during his lifetime, to take shares in this company.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—It is impossible to read the evidence in this case without coming to the conclusion that most of the shareholders were induced to take shares in the company by Mr Fraser, and that, too, upon the footing that he was himself to take £1000 of stock, for which amount the liquidators now seek to make his representatives liable. It is quite true that in the original memorandum the parties to it were not committed to any particular form of joint stock company. But the proposal was made which ultimately led to the formation and registration of the company. Between the date of the original memorandum and the date when Fraser indorsed the printed private prospectus of the company, there were several meetings of the promoters which shew distinctly that Fraser was to hold £1000 of stock. No doubt he was registered for one share only, but we have Mr Cruickshanks' evidence in regard to that, that when Mr Fraser's attention was drawn to it, and he was asked "what was meant by one share," he (Mr Fraser) replied, "Oh, that is a mere form. You know I have £1000 and you have £500. That putting one share is a mere form. It makes no difference. It is known what you have and what I have." So that, if I had seen legal grounds upon which I could have proceeded, I would have held Mr Fraser's representatives liable to be put upon the list of contributories.

But, upon consideration of the evidence, I cannot see any good grounds for

No. 118. holding that Mr Fraser agreed to become a partner of this company. It was maintained by the Dean of Faculty that the company were bound to give Mr Fraser shares, because the incorporators had arranged amongst themselves that he should take shares. But that contention is unsound, because the company were not bound by any such agreement, which was not part of the articles of association. Besides, as was pointed out by Mr Asher, there is a clause in the articles of association to the effect that the directors shall have an unfettered discretion in the allocation of the shares. On the other hand, there was an agreement between the promoters binding Mr Fraser to take shares as between themselves. But the point in which the case of the liquidators fails is that, if there was an agreement between the promoters themselves, there never was any with the company. I do not think that Mr Fraser ever undertook such an obligation to the company itself after it was registered. Such an undertaking would have required writing as between him and the company, or, at least, an unequivocal mandate entitling the other promoters to take shares upon his behalf. But Fraser having died immediately after the registration of the company, and nothing having been done to allocate the shares before that time, I do not think the company were entitled to allocate any to him, as they subsequently did. And therefore I do not think the liquidators of the company are now entitled to place his representatives upon the list of contributories in the liquidation.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the petition.

 Mar. 17, 1881. Ainslie, &c. v. Murrays. JAMES MURRAY AND JOHN MACKIE MURRAY, Defenders.—J. Burnet—R. V. Campbell.

Foreign—Contracts—Locus solutionis.—The pursuers and defenders of an action in the Court of Session, who were themselves resident in Scotland, entered into a compromise of it, by which the defenders became bound (1) to grant a power of attorney to the pursuers' firm in Rangoon to sell certain property there, and to the extent of £4250 to retain the proceeds on behalf of the pursuers, and (2) in the event of the properties not realising the said sum then to pay the deficiency. The property was sold, and the price, which did not amount in any view to £4250, was paid in rupees. The value of the rupee in Rangoon was 2s.; at the current rate of exchange with this country it was only 1s. 8d.

A question having arisen whether the payment in rupees was to be credited as of its value in Rangoon or its value in England, held (diss. Lord Deas) that the payment was to be credited at its value in England—the Lord President and Lord Mure holding that Scotland was the locus solutionis—Lord Shand holding that although Rangoon was the locus solutionis, the payment fell to be made in English money in terms of the contract.

1ST DIVISION. B. THIS action was raised by John Dodds Ainslie, sometime merchant in Rangoon, now in Glasgow, and residing there, and who at one time traded at Rangoon under the firm of Murray, Ainslie, & Company, of which firm he was the sole partner, and also by the said Murray, Ainslie, & Company, against James Murray, of Callands, in the county of Peebles, and John Mackie Murray, his son, who was at one time in business in Rangoon, but afterwards resided in Edinburgh.

In an action raised in the Court of Session in 1878 by the firm of Murray, Ainslie, & Company against the defenders this agreement or compromise was entered into upon the narrative that certain claims had been made upon both sides,—“1st, The second parties” (the defenders) “shall grant a power or powers of attorney to each and either of Messrs Ainslie, Warren, & Company of Rangoon,” of which firm the pursuer Mr Ainslie was a partner, “and Alexander Dixon Warren, merchant there, partner of that firm, to realise by public sale or otherwise, to the best advantage, the whole properties in Rangoon belonging to the second parties or either of them; 2d, the proceeds of sale of the said properties, to the extent of £4250, are to be paid to and retained by the said Ainslie, Warren, & Company on behalf of the first parties (the pursuers) in satisfaction and discharge of their claims; any surplus above that sum is to be accounted for and paid to the said James Murray; and in the event of the said properties not realising the said sum of £4250, then the deficiency shall be made up and paid by the second parties, jointly and severally, to the first parties; 3d, failing payment being made to the said first parties of the said sum of £4250 within one year from the date hereof, any right which the first parties may have to payment of the whole sums sued for and interest will in their option revive, and if this option is exercised, then the second parties’ objections thereto will also revive; 4th, all claims on the first parties at the instance of the second parties are hereby discharged, subject, however, to the declaration that if the first parties proceed with the said action then this discharge shall not be effectual, and the said claims shall revive. The rents of the said properties in Rangoon down to this date shall belong to the first parties, and shall be paid to or retained by Messrs Ainslie, Warren, & Company on their behalf, over and above the said sum of £4250. From and after this date the said rents shall belong to the said James Murray; 5th, upon payment to the first parties of the said sum of £4250, . . . their whole claims will be discharged.” This agreement was dated in May and June 1879.

Murrays.

A power of attorney was executed in terms of the agreement, and the property was realised by Ainslie, Warren, & Company. The amount of sales and of rents collected, as stated in the accounts which were rendered, was Rs. 32,099 : 15 : 6. At 1s. 8d. per rupee, the current rate of exchange between Rangoon and this country, that sum amounted to £2675 sterling. The defenders contended that the value of each rupee recovered under the power of attorney fell to be taken at 2s., its value in Rangoon.

The defenders had paid a part of the £4250 to the pursuers, and this was an action for the remainder. The only question ultimately contested by the parties was that raised upon the subject of the standard of value at which the Rangoon properties fell to be estimated. It was dealt with in the defenders’ first plea in law, which was—“The minute of agreement betwixt the parties having stipulated that the price of the properties sold under the power of attorney should be paid to or retained by the pursuers’ firm of Ainslie, Warren, & Company, merchants in Rangoon, the defenders are entitled to have the value of each rupee so recovered estimated as at the value of 2s., its value in Rangoon.”

The Lord Ordinary decerned against the defenders.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The agreement dealt with real property situated in Rangoon. There was nothing said about sending the money to England. The locus solutionis was Rangoon.¹

Argued for the pursuers;—They had bargained to be paid in English money, and were entitled to get it. This was a Scotch debt being sued for in a Scotch Court. It was not the same case as that of a bill being granted payable in India.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—The sum here sued for is said to be due under an agreement between the pursuers and defenders, which was concluded for the purpose of settling a previous action of accounting between these parties. The sum agreed to be paid was £4250, and it was also a part of the arrangement that to provide that sum, or a portion of it, certain house property belonging to the defenders was to be sold in Rangoon.

It is stated that, a power of attorney having been sent out to Rangoon by the defenders, the property was brought to sale, and the amount of the sales and the amount of rents collected realised the sum of Rs. 32,099 : 15 : 6. "This sum," the pursuers state, "at 1s. 8d. per rupee—which is the current rate of exchange—amounts to £2675 sterling. This sum," it is further stated, "includes Rs. 17,800, being the price at which part of the property mentioned in the said power of attorney has been sold, and which represents, at the same rate of exchange, £1483, 6s. 8d., but this sum has not yet been paid, and it thus falls to be deducted from the said £2675 sterling."

The answer is, that the properties specified in the power of attorney have been sold, with one exception. The defenders' explanation is, that they have always been willing to settle with the pursuers upon the footing of the rupee being estimated as of the value of 2s., which is its value in Rangoon. The ground upon which the defenders maintain that contention is, that under the contract the locus solutionis was India. I do not think the defence rests upon any other basis than that. So that a question is raised upon the construction and effect of the contract between the parties, What is the locus solutionis? If it be not India, the defenders are wrong.

Although, at first sight, I had an impression that as regards the proceeds of the sale at Rangoon, the contract was one which fell to be performed in India, I am now satisfied, upon a review of the clauses of the contract, that Scotland is the place of performance. The subject of the contract is a settlement or compromise of an action in this Court, and the subject-matter of it is that for a discharge of their liabilities the defenders shall pay the sum of £4250. If that sum be not paid within a year, it is stipulated that the former claims shall revive and may be again insisted in. But if it be paid within a year, then the defenders are to be entitled to a discharge, and all imputations made against them upon record are to be withdrawn. There is a further point which I think is ancillary or subsidiary. It consists in the stipulation that the defenders shall give a power of attorney to the pursuers' agents in Rangoon to bring certain properties to sale, to realise these and impute them, pro tanto, in payment of the sum in question. It is contemplated that the properties may sell for a sum large enough to meet the whole debt, but that it may also fall short of it. But in either event the

The settlement of the accounts under that agreement must be in Scotland, and consequently Scotland is the locus solutionis. Mar. 17, 1881.
Ainslie, &c. v.
Murray.

LORD DEAS.—The facts of this case assume a somewhat complicated appearance from the way in which the agreement, which is not itself before us, is narrated in the record.

They may be simplified by keeping in view that John Dodds Ainslie, for himself and his partners, is the sole creditor and pursuer, and James Murray of Callands is substantially the sole debtor and defender, so that the names of Ainslie as the first party, and of Murray as the second party, may be held to represent all interested.

Adopting this abbreviated phraseology, an agreement was entered into, dated in May and June 1879, between Ainslie of the first part, and James Murray of the second part, who had each of them formerly been resident in Rangoon, but were both then in Scotland, to the effect that certain claims which Mr Ainslie and his partners had against Mr James Murray (the amount, but not the existence, of which was disputed) should be settled in this way, viz., that Murray should grant a power or powers of attorney to each and either of Messrs Ainslie, Warren, & Company, of Rangoon, and Alexander Dixon Warren, merchant there, a partner of that firm, to realise, by public sale or otherwise, to the best advantage, the whole properties in Rangoon belonging to him, “the proceeds of sale of the said properties to the extent of £4250 to be paid to and retained by the said Ainslie, Warren, & Company on behalf of the first parties (viz., Ainslie and his partners), in satisfaction and discharge of their claims; any surplus above that sum is to be accounted for and paid to the said James Murray; and in the event of the said properties not realising the said sum of £4250, then the deficiency shall be made up and paid by” Murray to Ainslie and his partners. The only additional words which it seems necessary to quote from the agreement to elicit the question now to be decided are the following:—“The rents of the said properties in Rangoon down to this date shall belong to the first parties” (viz., Ainslie and his partners), “and shall be paid to or retained by Messrs Ainslie, Warren, and Company on their behalf over and above the said sum of £4250. From and after this date the said rents shall belong to the said James Murray.”

The stipulated power of attorney was executed by James Murray in July 1879, authorising the attornies to manage, sell, and dispose of all lands, hereditaments, mortgages, and other subjects, effects, and chattels of what kind soever, real or personal, which belonged to him, or in which he was interested, in or near the town of Rangoon, or in British Burmah, and particularly to sell and absolutely dispose of, first, a piece or parcel of land in the town of Rangoon, situated and measuring as therein mentioned; second, the house therein described; third, another house also therein described; fourth, certain pieces of ground situated on the right bank of the Pan Hlang Creek, at its junction with Hline or Rangoon River, with the buildings thereon; “and to apply the proceeds of the sale or sales in terms of and for the purposes of the said agreement,—in the first place, in payment of the said sum of £4250 sterling; and to render a just account, reckoning, and payment of the balance, if any, to the said James Murray, or those empowered by him, of his or their intromissions,” under deduction of expenses and commission as therein mentioned.

Ainslie, &c. v.
Murray.

The property, except that at Pan Hlang (which was agreed to be retained), was sold under the power of attorney, and the price, together with rents collected, amounted, after deducting commissions and other charges, to within a trifle of 33,000 rupees. Accounts were rendered on this footing, as to which the only, or at least the main, dispute appears to have been, what it still is in this action at the instance of Ainslie and his partners for the balance due to them, namely, whether the rupee, as they contend, is to be estimated at 1s. 8d., which is said to be its value in this country, or, as Mr James Murray contends, at 2s., which it does not seem to be disputed is its value in Rangoon.

I am humbly of opinion that Mr Murray's contention is well founded. Every principle, both of law and equity involved, appears to me to favour it.

Rangoon was the place where the contract was to be performed, and where its performance took place accordingly. The subject-matter of the contract consisted wholly, or all but wholly, of land and houses in Rangoon. So soon as the stipulated power of attorney was executed and delivered the sole right and interest in such land and houses, subject merely to an accounting for the proceeds, passed irrevocably from the debtor, Mr James Murray, to the creditors, Mr Ainslie and his partners. The sole object of the contract was the payment of a debt due by Mr Murray to them. The locus solutionis of that debt was Rangoon, and when the property was sold at a price (including past-due rents) of 33,000 rupees or thereby, and this sum paid to Mr Ainslie and his partners, the debt due by Mr Murray to them was to that extent extinguished.

The important fact is not to be overlooked that although Mr Ainslie happens to be at present in this country he and his partners are still carrying on business in Rangoon, which is the locus solutionis of the debt stipulated for by the contract. This appears distinctly from article first of the pursuers' condescendence in the present record, the commencement of which is in these terms : — "The pursuer, John Dodds Ainslie, who at one time carried on business at Rangoon under the firm of Murray, Ainslie, & Company, is at present residing in Glasgow, and he now, along with others, his copartners, carries on business in Rangoon under the firm of Ainslie, Warren, & Company." The power of attorney stipulated for by the first article of the agreement was, it has been seen, "a power or powers of attorney to each and either of Messrs Ainslie, Warren, & Company, of Rangoon, and Alexander Dickson Warren, merchant there, partner of that firm," to sell, &c. The power of attorney actually executed, as stated by the pursuers, in the outset of the fourth article of their condescendence, was a power of attorney whereby Mr James Murray "constituted and appointed the said Alexander Dixon Warren, merchant in Rangoon, and the said Ainslie, Warren, & Co., jointly or separately, his true and lawful attorney or attorneys," for the purposes already mentioned, so that the money not only might have been, but actually was, available in Rangoon for the purposes of the trade carried on there by Mr Ainslie and his partners, and I can find nothing in the agreement or condescendence entitling him or them to deduct from the current value of the rupees received and appropriated by them in Rangoon the exchange which would have been payable in this country. I had occasion to study the authorities on this branch of the law on being put forward by my senior counsel, the then Dean of Faculty (Hope), upwards of half a century ago, to plead the important question raised in Glyn v. Johnston & Co., 8th June 1830, Vac. Coll., also 8 S. and D. 889, and more fully, 3 Deas and Anderson's Reports, 105. I have no intention of resuming the authorities which I then had fully before me, but they left an impression on my mind favourable to the views I have now expressed. In the case of Glyn & Co. the Judges were all against my argument except Lord Craigie. That case is not itself in point. But the judgment of the House of Lords delivered by Lord Brougham 21st May 1837, 2 Shaw and Maclean, 682, in which the authority of Glyn's case was repudiated, and Lord Craigie's opinion approved of, will be found to contain matter deserving of attention in connection with what I have now said.

Ainslie, &c. v. Murray.

I am of opinion that the defender's first plea in law ought to be sustained.

LORD MURE.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to. We are here dealing with a Scotch contract, the place for enforcing which is Scotland, and the pursuers are therefore, I think, entitled to be paid in Scotch currency. The grounds on which it appears to me that the agreement should be so construed are that it was made in Scotland between parties who were resident in Scotland at the time, and that it related to the settlement or compromise of an action depending between them in the Scotch Courts, and which is in one view still in dependence here; because provision is made in the agreement for a revival of the action in the events mentioned in the agreement. Now, when this is done in Scotland, with reference to an action depending in the Scotch Courts, it is natural to expect that the locus solutionis of such an agreement would be in Scotland; and if nothing had been said in it about Rangoon I do not suppose that any doubt could have been entertained on that question. But the provisions as to realising certain properties in Rangoon, the proceeds of which were to be applied in part-payment of the sums due, are said to have the effect of making Rangoon the place of payment. I am unable to adopt that view. By the second clause of the contract, no doubt, a power is given to sell certain properties in Rangoon, the proceeds of which, to the extent of £4250, are to be paid to and retained by certain parties there on the pursuers' behalf. But in the event of the properties not realising the £4250, the deficiency is to be made up by the defenders and paid by them to the pursuer. Now, supposing the proceeds had not realised the required sum, it is quite clear that the deficiency would require to have been paid here in the current coin of this country. I cannot, therefore, hold that Rangoon is the locus solutionis of this contract, and that the defence rested on that ground is well-founded.

LORD SHAND.—In the view I take of this case it is immaterial whether the place of payment under the contract be this country or Rangoon, for I think in either case the result is the same, and the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right. I agree, however, with Lord Deas in thinking that, so far as regards the sums realised from the Indian properties, Rangoon is the place of payment—while if these sums proved insufficient to extinguish the amount of £4250 payable the place of payment of the balance is this country.

This is, it appears to me, the true meaning of the simple language of the contract. The defenders placed their properties in the hands of the pursuers' Rangoon firm, not only in security, but for realisation in payment and extinction of the debt admitted to be due to the pursuers. These properties were in Rangoon, and to be sold there, and the proceeds of sale were to be there paid to and retained by the pursuers' firm on behalf of the pursuers, to use the words

No. 119. of the contract, "in satisfaction and discharge of their claims." It seems to me to be very difficult to hold that this country is the locus solutionis of a debt the payment of which is stipulated to be de facto made and received in Rangoon, and there accepted by the creditor, a merchant trading in Rangoon, in satisfaction of a debt due to him; and I am unable to agree with your Lordships who have expressed an opinion to that effect.

Mar. 17, 1881.
Ainslie, &c. v.
Murrays.

But, taking Rangoon as the place of payment, to what is the pursuer entitled? £4250 of sterling money. If the defenders do not pay this sum in sovereigns or in Bank of England notes they must give money which is equivalent in value. It is not disputed that at the time when the payment was made twelve rupees was the equivalent of £1 at the current rate of exchange; and I confess I can see no good reason for holding that the pursuer must take ten rupees to the pound, being less than an equivalent for each pound sterling of his debt to the extent of 3s. 4d. It would, I think, require a very clear stipulation to that effect in the contract to support the argument for the reclamer, for the obvious result of the argument would be that if the properties had realised Rs. 9,500 more, or a sum sufficient in the reclamer's view to meet the debt, the actual sum paid would leave the pursuer with a deficit of upwards of £700 on his debt of £4250, with a corresponding advantage to the defenders, who would be in the fortunate position of having paid a debt of £4250 with £3550, or its equivalent in value.

A practical illustration of the result of the defenders' argument was suggested in the course of the debate. If one of two persons on the point of leaving this country for Rangoon should lend the other £100, to be repaid in Rangoon a short time after their arrival there, I presume there could be no doubt that Rangoon would have been the locus solutionis. It appears to me there could be equally little doubt that the lender would be entitled to payment of the £100 lent in gold or notes of legal tender, or the equivalent in Indian money. According to the defenders' argument the claim would be met by repayment of ten rupees for each £1, although the value of the rupee at the time, according to the current rate of exchange, was 1s. 8d. only, making twelve rupees the equivalent of £1, and in this way the borrower would be able to repay his debt of £100 by rupees of value equivalent to £83, 6s. 8d. only, and the lender must be content to accept that sum. The borrower would thus, in addition to the accommodation, be a gainer of £16, 13s. 4d. It appears to me that the statement of this illustration in a case in which the locus solutionis is India, with such a result, is sufficient to demonstrate the unsoundness of the defenders' argument, and I am unable to distinguish this case from the one now supposed. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is sound.

Agent and Principal—Election—Ship—Owner and Master.—Shipbrokers having made certain disbursements for a German vessel took bills for the amount from the master drawn upon the owner. The owner returned the bills unaccepted. The brokers then sued the master on the bills in the German Courts, but failed in obtaining decree, on the technical plea that the action was not brought within three months. They then raised an action in the Court of No. 120. Session against the owner on the original debt. The defender pleaded that the pursuers, by electing to take the master as their debtor, were barred from suing the owner. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) that the doctrine of election did not apply, as the pursuers had not obtained a judgment. Priestley v. Fernie, June 23, 1865, 34 L. J. Exch. 172, commented on.

MESSRS R. MEIER & Co., shipbrokers in Newcastle-on-Tyne, raised this action against Paul Küchenmeister, of Rostock in Germany (against whom arrestments had been used in Scotland ad fundandam jurisdictionem), as registered owner of the vessel "Jacob Rothenburg," for payment of an account of £90, odds, with interest. They averred (Cond. 2)—"In the end of 1878 and beginning of 1879 the pursuers made on the defender's employment and behalf various disbursements, and earned a certain commission as agents for the vessel 'Jacob Rothenburg,' of which the defender was then owner," and that the defender refused or delayed to pay them for the same. Küchenmeister defended the action, and stated in explanation that the "Jacob Rothenburg" had been stranded in November 1878, near Shields, and that Captain Wilde, the master, had entered into a contract of salvage with the pursuers, the sums under which had been duly paid by the owner, but that subsequently the pursuers had made on the authority of the master, and without the owner's consent or knowledge, other disbursements for the ship, which were those now sued for, and for which they induced the master to grant bills drawn on the owner. These bills he had refused to accept. He then added that the pursuers had sued Captain Wilde in the German Courts on the bills, and obtained a favourable judgment in the lower Court, which, however, was reversed on appeal. On this statement the following plea was founded:—(2) The pursuers having elected to take the said Captain Wilde as their debtor are barred from suing the present action. 2D DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford Clark.
R.

The following minute of admissions was adjusted by the parties with a view to getting a judgment on the above plea:—"Admitted that in respect of the disbursements mentioned on record the pursuers received from Captain Wilde, the master of the 'Jacob Rothenburg' two bills drawn by the said Captain Wilde in favour of the pursuers, under the name of R. Meier (being a name occasionally used by the pursuers' firm in their business) upon Küchenmeister & Völling, Rostock, for £200 and £26, 4s. 6d. respectively, both dated 23d January 1879, and both payable at three months after date. The said bills were duly presented to the drawees, who refused acceptance, and the bills were thereupon protested at the pursuers' instance against the drawees for non-acceptance, and the drawer for non-payment. That on 11th February 1880 the pursuers arrested the said ship, and took proceedings in Admiralty against the shipowners, which were unopposed. Under said proceedings the ship was sold on or about 19th May 1879, by order of the Court of Admiralty in London, and the pursuers placed to the credit of the account sued for the sum of £85, 4s. 11d. derived from the proceeds of the sale, and the further sum of £60 which they entered as a payment received from Captain Wilde, as on 1st May 1879. That the said bills having matured and been dishonoured on 23d April 1879 the pursuers thereafter raised an action against Captain Wilde, as drawer of said bills, in the German Court of his domicile, for the alleged balance thereon, being the sum now sued for, and obtained judgment against the said

No. 120. drawer in the lower Court; but on appeal the judgment was reversed, and the action dismissed on the ground that by German law the suit against the drawer should have been brought within three months from the date of the bills falling due.”

Meier & Co.
v. Küchen-
meister.

On 3d February 1881 the Lord Ordinary assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the summons.*

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued;—The doctrine of election did not come into this case. It only applied when the claim had been sued out to judgment.¹ The action in Germany was only on the bills, not on the debt, and it having been dismissed on a purely technical ground, did not bar the pursuers from insisting in this action. Priestley's ² case, which was founded on for the defender, was a different one altogether, and did not go so far as the defender contended.

Argued for the defender;—In a question of election successful judgment was not necessary;³ the intention of the creditor was enough, if sufficiently indicated.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The stake involved in this case is not large, but the question argued is of considerable importance. The action is by a Newcastle firm of shipbrokers against a shipowner in Rostock, for furnishings said to have been made to a vessel by order of the master. Jurisdiction has been founded by arrestments in Scotland. The answer to the claim is that the master granted bills of the amount to the shipbrokers, and that they have sued him on them in Germany. It is not denied that the master is liable along with the owner, but the master is said to have been successful in the German Courts. This action is now brought against the owner, and he pleads that there cannot be an action both against him and the master, and that the shipbrokers having sued the master, although without success, must be held to have elected to accept him as the debtor, and cannot now sue the owner. The Lord Ordinary has sustained this plea upon the authority of the case of Priestley, but I think he has erred in doing so.

Election is no doubt recognised in our law. In the case of a shipmaster and shipowner, where the master is sued on his own obligation and decree is given against him, he having relief against the owner, there is no doubt that the owner

* “NOTE.—The parties requested that the case should be sent to the Procedure-roll, in order to a decision on the defender's second plea in law. They stated that the first plea for the defender involved an inquiry into German law, which they were both desirous to avoid until the question raised by the second should be determined.

“The Lord Ordinary heard the defender, but no appearance was made by the pursuers. He has, nevertheless, thought it better to decide the case rather than give decree by default.

“In the opinion of the Lord Ordinary the pursuers elected to take the master as their debtor. They sued him to judgment on the bills which he had granted, and which were binding on him alone. It does not matter that they were ultimately unsuccessful. They took judgment in a question with him, and though they were defeated on a plea which seems to resemble our plea of prescription, they may still sue him for the debt. The principles recognised in the case of Priestley, 34 L. J., Exch. 172, seem to the Lord Ordinary to sustain the plea of the defender.”

cannot be sued also for the same debt. That is common sense. But where the master has not been sued to judgment, or the action fails from some technical reason or another, the case is different. The fact of the pursuer having sued the wrong man will not bar him from suing the right one. And the same rule must apply if he have failed to recover. That rule seems to be clearly laid down in the case of Curtis, which has been referred to. It is clear from the language used by Bramwell, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, that it was considered that whilst judgment against the agent, even without satisfaction, would constitute a conclusive election, yet that no legal proceedings short of judgment would have that effect, for he distinctly pointed out that by the word "sue" he means "sue to judgment." I apprehend that means successful judgment.

Meier & Co.
v. Küchen-
meister.

On the whole matter it seems to me that here we have no case of election truly, and that no plea has been stated to exclude the action. I think the process should therefore go on.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. Indeed, the only difficulty I have had is whether the pursuers should not be left to their remedy in the German Courts. It seems inconvenient to have one end of the case in Rostock and the other end in Newcastle, neither coming near Scotland. We must, however, obey the law, and arrestments having been used here the case can competently be decided in this Court.

In other respects I entirely agree with your Lordship. I do not think that in this case the questions raised and decided in Priestley's case arise. According to the pursuers' averments their ground of action implies no liability on the part of the master. They say they have a good claim against the owner. It may be that they may make out in point of fact that the master is liable also, but on the case as stated I cannot assume the master to be liable at all. The averment made is (Cond. 2)—"In the end of 1878 and beginning of 1879 the pursuers made on the defender's employment and behalf various disbursements, and earned a certain commission as agents for the vessel 'Jacob Rothenburg,' of which the defender was then owner." That is a very good ground of action. It is that, on the employment of the owner, the pursuers made these disbursements. It may afterwards appear that it was on the employment of the master, but it is not so stated. I cannot infer here that any other than the owner was trusted or is responsible.

It is then stated in answer that the master drew bills on the owner to pay these furnishings. But that is quite consistent with the view that the owner alone is liable. The master may incur a liability not previously on him by drawing a bill, but that is quite consistent with his being under no previous liability. The shipbrokers now sue on the original debt and not on the bills. They tried to enforce the bills against the master in Germany, but failed, and they now bring an action on the debt and not on the subsequent obligation. I cannot throw out that action on the ground that they had a choice between suing the master or the owner and have exercised it. I must therefore hold, irrespective of the decision in Priestley's case, that this action is not to be dismissed upon the doctrine of election.

There is one point on which I have considerable difficulty. I was under the impression that the master of a ship was in a different position from an agent with an undisclosed principal, and that in every relation.

Meier & Co.
v. Küchen-
meister.

The general rule is that if a person really acting for another goes into the market and buys as if for himself, he binds himself; but if the party from whom he buys finds out his true position then he can treat him as an agent only. He cannot have two principals to deal with, and no double remedy is allowed. The only other rule is that an agent acting for a disclosed principal does not bind himself at all.

The case of a master of a ship is exceptional; he is an agent acting for a known and registered owner, and yet he incurs personal liability. Now, I am not prepared to assent to the doctrine that a person who furnishes supplies to a ship on the order of the master must elect to sue either the master or the owner. I should have thought it was a joint liability, and that the creditor could sue both.

In this case, however, this point does not arise, as there was no proceeding to judgment, and I only referred to the other ground because your Lordship had exhausted this part of the case. I do not think that suing to judgment means to judgment of absolver. I am of opinion that the Judges in Priestley's case never contemplated that their language should be construed to mean only a judgment on a technical plea. The true meaning is if the creditor has converted the liability of the master into a "judgment debt" then his claim against the owner shall cease, as he will be liable in relief.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion, and have very little to add.

As regards the plea sustained by the Lord Ordinary, I confess his decision came upon me with surprise, because I shared very much the impression stated by Lord Young, that the owner and master were liable together for goods supplied to the ship on the master's order. Until the case of Priestley was quoted I had no doubt that both were liable as principals. I do not, however, need to give an opinion upon that point. I am of opinion that what was here done by the pursuers is not of the same nature as what took place in Priestley's case. The result of their litigation was that instead of getting a judgment it was found that the bills, in consequence of the lapse of time, had no effect. It therefore appears to me that the case of Priestley is no authority here.

I entirely concur in the proposed judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor reclaimed against: Repel the second plea in law stated for the defender, and remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause, reserving all questions of expenses."

THOMAS LUCAS PATERSON, Pursuer.—Asher—Jameson.

Superior and Vassal—Feuar bound to make a road in front of his feu when road is made through adjoining ground is not bound to make the road by becoming proprietor of the adjoining ground.—In August 1863 a proprietor feued a piece of ground (part of the estate of D), bounded on the north by a proposed road, on the east by the adjoining estate of K, belonging to a different proprietor, which lay between D and the city of Glasgow, subject to the condition that, in the event (which was then improbable) of a street being formed through K in connection with the proposed road, the feuar should be bound to form and maintain one-half of the said road in front of his feu. No. 121.

In February 1864 the feuar, to take advantage of a wall which had been built by the proprietor of K four and a half feet within his boundary, bought from him the strip of ground lying between his feu and the wall, extending northwards from the south-east corner of the feu, the whole length of the feu and twice that distance beyond. Paterson v.
M'Ewan's
Trustees.

In 1872 the proprietor of D bought a part of the estate of K, which would have enabled him to form a street through K in connection with the proposed road, had it not been for the intervening strip acquired by the feuar.

In an action brought by the proprietor of D, against the feuar, concluding, inter alia, for declarator that the defender was bound to form a road forty feet wide over the strip, upon payment of such compensation as the Court should fix, held by seven Judges that the defender was under no obligation, express or implied, to make, or allow to be made, a road over the part of K acquired by him.

By feu-contract, dated 1st December 1863, Thomas Lucas Paterson, 1st Division, proprietor of the estate of Dowanhill, near Glasgow, feued to James M'Ewan a portion of these lands, amounting to 1 rood and 30 poles or thereby, adjoining the estate of Kelvinside, which bounded Dowanhill on the north-east, and which then belonged to Messrs Montgomerie & Fleming. At that time there was no communication between the properties, which were separated by a mutual fence, consisting of a feal dyke, surmounted by an old hedge, and supported on the Dowanhill side by a stone retaining wall. Mr Paterson was very desirous that a road on his property of Dowanhill, called the "Victoria Circus Road," should be connected with roads on Kelvinside, so as to secure a direct access between Dowanhill and the Great Western Road, which lay on the other side of Kelvinside. Messrs Montgomerie & Fleming, however, had positively declined to allow any such connection to be made. with three

The ground feued by Mr Paterson to Mr M'Ewan was on the south side of the contemplated prolongation of Victoria Circus Road, along which it extended 108 feet 3 inches or thereby, and in the hope that eventually the system of roads on the two properties might be connected, this obligation was inserted in the feu-contract:—"The said James M'Ewan and his foresaids shall be bound and obliged, if required by the first party, as soon as a road shall be opened up and completed through the lands of Kelvinside to the Great Western Road in connection with the said road or street called Victoria Circus Road, to open up, make, and continue one-half of Victoria Circus Road, so far as the said road bounds the said plot or area of ground above disposed on the north, and to maintain the same in good order in all time thereafter for mutual communication between the lands of Kelvinside and the first party's lands of Dowanhill." A declaration was added, to the effect "that the said second party, and his foresaids, shall in the meantime, and until the said road or street is opened and continued as aforesaid, be entitled to the use and privilege of that portion of said plot of ground above disposed, intended for the one-half of the said road or street as a garden or pleasure ground, and to enclose the same with such ornamental fence as the said second party may, with consent of the said first party, erect, until said space is required for the formation and continuation of said road, as above mentioned."

Four and a-half feet east of the mutual fence above referred to as separating Kelvinside from Dowanhill Messrs Montgomerie & Fleming, the proprietors of Kelvinside, had erected a stone and lime wall, and the original missive in which Mr M'Ewan offered to take the feu expressly mentioned that wall as the boundary of the feu, and contained a stipulation that the feuar should have right to the stones in the old wall free of charge. This offer was accepted by Mr Paterson. The price offered was £35 per acre. M'Ewan for some months treated the strip of ground between the new wall and the old as his own, and removed the old wall. Ultimately, and when interrupted by Montgomerie & Fleming he, to save litigation and the expense of building a boundary-wall, leaving a waste space between the walls, purchased not only the strip on his eastern boundary but a continuation of the strip northwards (in all, 590½ feet, the proprietors refusing to sell less) for £142. This bargain was completed in February 1864, but the disposition was dated September and October, 1864. He was thus enabled to carry his garden ground attached to his house (called Thorncliffe) up to the wall and up to the centre of the plot intended ultimately to form the continuation of Victoria Circus Road.

In 1873 Mr Paterson purchased from the then proprietor of Kelvinside an area of ground, being part of that estate called Horslethill. He was thereby enabled to form a road up to the Dowanhill march, which communicated with the roads in Kelvinside leading to the Great Western Road. So that all that was then required to complete the connection of the Victoria Circus Road upon the Dowanhill estate with that leading through Kelvinside to the Great Western Road was that they should meet across the strip of ground purchased from Kelvinside by M'Ewan.

In February 1880 Paterson brought this action against M'Ewan and his marriage-contract trustees, to whom he had conveyed both subjects, for declarator that the defender "is bound forthwith to open up, make, and continue, and that the other defenders are bound to permit him to open up, make, and continue one-half of Victoria Circus Road, of 40 feet in breadth, so far as the said road bounds the plot or area of ground now or lately belonging to him, called Thorncliffe, . . . and that the defenders are bound to permit the pursuer to open up, make, and continue the said road of 40 feet in breadth through the adjoining strip of ground, about 4½ feet wide, . . . so as to form a continuation of said Victoria Circus Road, until it joins a road of 40 feet in breadth, already formed, from the Great Western Road, through the estate of Kelvinside, near Glasgow, the south-west termination of which last-mentioned road immediately adjoins said strip of ground, upon payment to the defenders, or one or other of them, of such compensation . . . as our said Lords may fix :—" And also for decree ordaining the defender, James M'Ewan, "forthwith to open up, make, and continue, and the other defenders . . . to allow him to open up, make, and continue one half of said Victoria Circus Road, in so far as the said road bounds the said plot or area of ground called Thorncliffe ; and to permit the pursuer to open up, make, and continue the said road, 40 feet in breadth through the said adjoining strip of ground, so as to form a continuation of said Victoria Circus Road, until it joins said road, which runs to the Great Western Road, and that upon payment to the defenders, or one or other of them, of such compensation, if any, as our said Lords may fix and determine in the course of the process to follow hereon."

The pursuer averred that M'Ewan's purchase of the strip in question "was made in fraud of the contract" between them, and without his knowledge, and "for the sole purpose of enabling Mr M'Ewan to attempt to prevent the road contemplated in the said feu-contract being made, and to evade his obligations to give ground for and to make, so far as passing through the ground feued to him by the pursuer, one-half of the said road."

There was also this averment,—“The defender was called upon by the pursuer and the parties who had by that time become co-owners with him in Dowanhill to form the continuation of Victoria Circus Road through his land, in terms of the provisions in his feu-contract, and to allow said road to be formed across the said strip of ground purchased by him as before mentioned, full compensation being made for the right of passage over said strip of ground. This Mr M'Ewan refused. He also refused an offer by the proprietors of Dowanhill to pay him for the said strip of ground, so far as required for the said intended road or street, and extending to the north-west thereof, the sum of £400. This sum was more than the cost to him of the whole strip, with compound interest at five per cent per annum, and all expenditure by Mr M'Ewan. It was a condition of the said arrangement that Mr M'Ewan, in addition to said payment, should retain, free of cost, so much of the said strip of ground as lay south of the said intended road, and on the east of the plot of ground feued by him from the pursuer. This offer, which was made to avoid litigation, Mr M'Ewan also refused." No. 121.

Paterson v.
Trustees.

The defenders denied that the purchase of the strip of ground in question was made fraudulently or without the knowledge of the pursuer, and averred, inter alia,—"As regards the pursuer's demands in the present action, the defender M'Ewan, without admitting any legal obligation on him to do so, is ready and willing, and has never refused, to open, make, and continue one-half of Victoria Circus Road, so far as the road bounds on the north the plot or area of ground disposed by said feu-contract, and the other defenders are ready and willing, and have never refused, to permit this to be done. As regards the portion of Kelvin-side acquired by the defender M'Ewan as aforesaid, and now belonging to the other defenders, their titles thereto do not contain any restriction or obligation on them as regards the formation of any road, and they have refused to recognise any right on the part of the pursuer to compel them to make, or permit to be made, any such road, although they are, as they all along have been, ready and willing to negotiate for the formation of a road on such reasonable terms as may be mutually agreed on."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The event having happened, or falling to be held as having happened, on which the defender M'Ewan undertook to make and continue the road in question, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved. (3) The defender M'Ewan, and the other defenders, so far as their concurrence is necessary, not being entitled to defeat without just cause the foresaid obligation undertaken by M'Ewan, or to prevent said road from being opened up, made, and continued from the Victoria Circus Road to the Great Western Road, by any act of theirs, and the only obstacle to the said road being opened up, made, and continued being the unreasonable and unjustifiable refusal of the defenders to continue said road through said strip, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) As regards the conclusion which relates to the strip of ground libelled,—1. The pursuer has no title to sue. 2. The pursuer's averments are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the action. 3. The defenders are entitled to absolvitor, in respect they are under no legal obligation to comply with the pursuer's demands. 4. The pursuer is barred by his actings from complaining of the defender M'Ewan having acquired a right of property in said strip of ground, unfettered by any restrictions or obligations as to the formation of a road. 5. The defenders are entitled to absolvitor, in respect the pursuer's averments, so far as material, are unfounded in fact. (2) As regards the opening up, formation, and continuation of the Victoria Circus Road, so far as the line of said road bounds the defenders' feu foresaid,

No. 121. the conclusions of declarator and ad factum præstandum are nimious and unnecessary.

The Lord Ordinary, after proof, both documentary and oral, the import of which is given in the Lord Ordinary's note, dismissed the action.*

The pursuer reclaimed.

After being argued before the Judges of the First Division, the case was re-heard before them along with the Judges of the Second Division.

Argued for the pursuer;—By the feu-contract the defender had undertaken to prolong the Victoria Circus Road through his feu upon fulfilment of a condition precedent. That condition was the completion of a connection from the Great Western Road through Kelvinside to the Dowanhill march. The defender, by now refusing to carry the road through the strip of 4½ feet wide which he had purchased, was illegally preventing the fulfilment of the condition, and seeking to relieve himself from the obligations of his feu-contract. As the non-fulfilment was due to the defender's own act, the condition must be taken as fulfilled against

* "NOTE.—(After stating the facts)—It must be borne in mind that the obligation on the defender to form the road on his Dowanhill feu was conditional on a road being opened to the Dowanhill march by the proprietors of Kelvinside. But the purification of that condition depended entirely upon the will of the proprietors of Kelvinside for the time. They might never make the road, and it is certain neither the pursuer nor the defender could compel them to do so, and until such road was made on Kelvinside the defender's obligation could not take effect. But if so, are the rights of parties altered by the fact that the defender is now proprietor of that part of Kelvinside which immediately adjoins Dowanhill? I apprehend that, prima facie, the defender is under no obligation to allow a road to be formed through his ground into Dowanhill. If, instead of acquiring this isolated strip of Kelvinside by purchase, he had succeeded to it as heir, or if he had in any lawful way acquired the whole of Kelvinside estate, I think it is clear that the pursuer could not have for a moment maintained his present demand.

"The mere fact, therefore, that the defender has acquired the property of this strip of ground since he acquired his Dowanhill feu is not of itself sufficient to render his obligation operative. Something more is necessary, and accordingly, in order to make his action relevant, the pursuer alleges in his condescendence, art. 6, that this piece of ground was purchased 'in fraud of the contract between the pursuer and the said James M'Ewan, without the knowledge of the pursuer; and it was made for the sole purpose of enabling Mr M'Ewan to attempt to prevent the road contemplated in the feu-contract being made, and to evade his obligations to give ground for and to make, so far as passing through the ground feued to him by the pursuer, one-half of the said road.' Now, it was in consequence of that statement that a proof was allowed, and the question, and the only one, is, whether the pursuer has succeeded in his proof? I think he has failed. I am quite satisfied, on the evidence of the defender, of his agent Mr Macleod, and of Mr Alexander, taken in connection with the letters referred to in the proof, that the pursuer was, between August and December 1863, aware that the strip of ground might be had from Montgomerie & Fleming on moderate terms; that the defender was not himself anxious of having the ground, unless perhaps the part immediately adjoining his own feu, but that he was desirous that the pursuer should purchase the whole; and that the pursuer might have purchased it when the defender did if he had been so inclined. Indeed, I think the evidence shews that the purchase was in a measure forced upon the defender, and that it was not made for the purpose of enabling him to evade his obligations in the feu-contract.

"The pursuer having thus failed to prove his allegations of fraud, the relevancy of the action falls, and the result is that the action must be dismissed, with expenses."

him, and he was bound to make and continue the road.¹ The terms of the obligation imported a potestative condition, for it was one in the power of either party.² The defender was at least bound to sell to the pursuer at a price to be fixed by the Court whatever part of the ground was necessary for the execution of the road. No one who was a party to a contract was at liberty to do anything at variance with it.³

Argued for the defender;—On the facts: When the feu-contract was entered into it was not contemplated that the stipulation would ever come into operation. It was a distant as well as a contingent obligation. The defender did not buy the strip for the purpose of obstructing the pursuer. The pursuer had himself had an opportunity of acquiring the ground. The arrival of the contingency was dependent upon the will of a third party. The action was of an unprecedented kind. It sought to have the defender ordained to do something in order that specific performance of an obligation might follow.

On the law: The rule of law that where a party himself prevented the fulfilment of a condition which was binding upon him, it is to be held as fulfilled, had no place in this case. The condition was not a potestative one, binding upon both sides. It was a casual one, and depended upon a contingency. It did not arise under the deed.⁴ The pursuer had therefore failed to establish an obligation by contract, either express or implied. The Court could not impose an obligation which was never undertaken. There could be no specific performance unless there was a contract. The only remedy was one of damages.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the year 1863, when the parties made the feu-contract which has given rise to the present question, the pursuer Mr Paterson was the proprietor of certain lands called Dowanhill, and immediately adjoining these lands, and lying between Dowanhill and the Great Western Road, there lay the lands of Kelvinside, belonging to Messrs Montgomerie & Fleming. Both of these properties were in the immediate neighbourhood of Glasgow, and were adapted and laid out for building purposes; and the pursuer, as the proprietor of Dowanhill, was very anxious to establish a connection by road between his lands and the Great Western Road through the adjoining lands of Kelvinside. But the proprietors of Kelvinside, on the other hand, were quite against any such communication being made, and positively refused to entertain any proposal to that effect. There seemed to be no prospect at all at that time of such a communication being made. But the pursuer, as proprietor of Dowanhill, did not altogether give up the expectation that such a communication might at some time be established, and therefore when he feued out to the defender M'Ewan the feu called Thorncliffe, which immediately adjoins the boundary between Dowanhill and Kelvinside, he inserted a condition in the feu-contract which provided for the possibility of such a communication being made hereafter. The subject itself is described as being part "of the lands of Dowanhill situated on the south side of an intended continuation of Victoria Circus Road, to measure 40 feet in breadth, within the parish of Govan and shire of Lanark," containing so many poles, "in which measurement both parties acquiesce"; and it is described as "bounded on the north by the central line of said intended continuation of Victoria Circus Road, along which it extends 108 feet 3 inches or thereby; on the west by the central line of the mutual wall"—which part of the description is immaterial; "and on the east by the lands of Kelvinside, along which it extends 263 feet 9 inches or thereby to the centre of the said intended continuation of Victoria Circus Road, following the bend and taken along a line at a mean distance from the west face of the old retaining wall or stone facing and the centre of the thorn hedge, as the said plot or area of ground is delineated on a plan or sketch thereof." Now, this Victoria Circus Road was intended to go up to the march between Dowanhill and Kelvinside, and in the event of a road being made through the lands of Kelvinside so as to join with the Great Western Road this part of the Victoria Circus Road lying to the south-west of Kelvinside would have immediately connected with the road leading through Kelvinside to that Great Western Road. Accordingly, the feuar is taken bound, "if required by the said first party, so soon as a road shall be opened up and completed through the lands of Kelvinside to the Great Western Road, in connection with the said road or street called Victoria Circus Road, to open up, make, and continue one-half of Victoria Circus Road, so far as the said road bounds the said plot or area of ground above disposed on the north, and to maintain the same in good order in all time thereafter, for mutual communication between the lands of Kelvinside and the first party's lands of Dowanhill, and also to defray a rateable proportional part of the whole expenses of making, keeping up, and maintaining in good order in all time coming the drains or sewers formed or to be formed in said road."

The other clauses of the feu-contract appear to me to be immaterial in the question which we are now to determine. But this condition, or rather conditional obligation, which was imposed upon the feuar depended upon the fulfilment of a condition which was not within the power of either of the parties to the feu-contract. It was simply a casual condition, depending for its fulfilment upon an accident or upon the will of some third parties. As matters stood at that time, it was impossible that that condition could be fulfilled except with the consent of the proprietor of Kelvinside, and that consent was not at all likely to be obtained. It certainly could neither be fulfilled nor prevented by anything to be done by either the one party or the other to this feu-contract. The subject which Mr M'Ewan obtained possession of under this feu-contract was ground sufficient to build a villa upon, and he was entitled, in terms of his feu-contract, to occupy one-half of the width of Victoria Circus Road, as contemplated to be prolonged, in so far as it lay opposite to his grounds. Indeed, one-half of the solum of the road lay within the description of his feu, and therefore until he could be required to make that road he was entitled to occupy the solum of that part of the road as pleasure ground, which he accordingly did.

But there was another part of his feu—the eastern part—about which there was a misunderstanding. I do not think it is in the least degree of importance to inquire to whose fault that misunderstanding was attributable; but Mr M'Ewan was led to believe that his feu went up to a dry-stone wall on the east, which had been erected by Montgomerie & Fleming, apparently with the purpose of shewing their determination that there never should be any communication between the two properties of Dowanhill and Kelvinside. But they had built that wall $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet within their own boundary, and the actual boundary between Dowanhill and Kelvinside was an old retaining wall and hedge, which lay $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet west of the wall they built. Now, Mr M'Ewan, the defender, was under the impression that that dry-stone wall was his boundary, and he was proceeding to deal with the ground within that wall and to the west of it as part of his feu. He was interrupted in so doing, and it then became a question how this matter should be settled, and consequently he became very desirous, not unnaturally, if he could, to obtain that $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet in breadth within what he conceived to be the boundary of his own feu from Messrs Montgomerie & Fleming. But Messrs Montgomerie & Fleming were not willing to sell to him the part opposite to his own feu only, but would sell only the whole length of it as it is shewn on the plan before us coloured green; and the strip of ground, as there shewn, extends not merely along the east side of the defender's feu, but across the line of the intended road, and still further on to the north. In short, the portion opposite to Mr M'Ewan's feu is not much above one-third of the whole in length. Mr M'Ewan in the end bought $590\frac{1}{2}$ feet of that strip of ground from Montgomerie & Fleming, and obtained a conveyance to it upon payment of the price of £142. It seems to be suggested—but I think there is no ground for the suggestion—that this property was acquired by Mr M'Ewan without the knowledge of the pursuer Mr Paterson, and that it was done with the intention of preventing the possibility of the fulfilment of that condition, viz, the making of the road through Kelvinside, or the junction of it with the Victoria Circus Road, which would have brought into operation the obligation that lay upon Mr M'Ewan under his feu-contract.

After full consideration I have come to be very clearly of opinion, in the first place, that Mr Paterson, the pursuer, might himself have acquired this ground, if he had chosen. The sale was not gone about in a hurry. He was made aware of it, and he had an opportunity of purchasing it if he had chosen; and I am just as clear, in the second place, that Mr M'Ewan did not acquire it for any sinister purpose—that his great object in buying it, to begin with, was to make his own feu complete up to the dry-stone wall, which bounded it on the east. I mention this circumstance, because I think it only fair to the defender to do so; but I am not by any means sure that even if the fact were otherwise it would at all affect the question of law which we have to decide.

Now, what has happened is this, that the pursuer has acquired as much of the estate of Kelvinside as would enable him to fulfil the condition under which Mr M'Ewan's obligation stands in the feu-contract,—that is to say, he is in a condition now to obtain a road through Kelvinside from the Great Western Road down to the margin of the Dowanhill estate, but for the green strip of ground which has in the meantime been acquired in property by the defender. But so long as that green strip belongs to Mr M'Ewan, the defender Mr Paterson cannot make the junction between the road through Kelvinside and the Victoria Circus Road, unless he can compel the defender

No. 121. to consent to that road being made through the green strip. This action is brought for the purpose of compelling that assent on the part of Mr M'Ewan, and the question comes to be, whether he is entitled to prevail in that demand?

It is contended that the case falls to be decided by the application of the well-known rule of law, that where a condition is prevented from being fulfilled by the party who is bound in the conditional obligation it shall be held as fulfilled, and the doctrine of potestative conditions has been largely dwelt upon in the argument. I am of opinion that that rule of law has no application to the present case. It is quite true that if a man has it in his power to perform conditions the fulfilment of which gives rise to a binding obligation against himself, then he is not entitled to refuse so to do; and still further, if he obstructs or prevents the condition from being fulfilled, the condition will be held in law as being fulfilled. But that relates only to the subject-matter of the contract in which the conditional obligation is contained, and I am not aware that the rule has ever been extended thus far, that whatever other rights or properties he may have the use of which might conduce to the fulfilment of the condition, he is bound in law to make that use of those independent rights and properties. And yet that seems, in truth, to be the contention of the pursuer here. It was put in argument against the pursuer—Supposing that the defender had acquired the entire estate of Kelvinside, whether by purchase or succession, would he have been obliged in that case to consent to the making of a road through that estate, so as to join the lands of Dowanhill to the Great Western Road?—and I do not think that the pursuer's counsel faced that question or gave it an affirmative answer. And yet, unless that could be maintained, I cannot see how he can prevail in the present case. Surely the accident of a man's property being more or less will not make the rule more or less applicable. It is said that this is a very narrow strip of land, and that the possession of the whole estate of Kelvinside would have been a very different matter. So it would, in point of fact, but is it a different matter in point of principle? Is a man bound, in order to enable a condition to be fulfilled, the fulfilment of which brings into operation a binding obligation against himself—is he bound to give or sacrifice another property which he has acquired? I think that must be answered in the negative, whether the property be large or small. And therefore it appears to me that the doctrine which is founded upon is quite inapplicable to the present case.

But if it were otherwise, I do not think it would benefit the pursuer. What is the obligation that would be brought into operation by holding this condition as fulfilled? It is an obligation to form the part of the road which is represented by the yellow colour upon the plan. That is the whole obligation in the feu-contract. But suppose that were done to-morrow, it would not serve the pursuer's purpose unless he could also force his way through the green strip. To hold a condition as purified or fulfilled is a very different thing from the condition being purified or fulfilled in point of fact, and in this case the condition cannot be fulfilled in point of fact without the green strip being placed at the disposal of the pursuer; and therefore it always comes back to the same question—Is the pursuer entitled to deal with this green strip as if it were his property instead of being the property of the defender, and is he entitled to compel the defender, the absolute and unqualified owner of that strip of ground, to submit either to sell it to him or to have a servitude constituted over it in this way? I apprehend there is no doctrine of law that can possibly reach a case of this kind. No. 121.

It is said, no doubt, in another view of the case, that there is an implied obligation in this feu-contract to do everything that is necessary to lead to the fulfilment of this contract—an obligation that whenever it comes to be within the power of the defender to further the fulfilment of this condition which is to lead to the conditional obligation being operative against himself, he is bound to do so. Now, I can only say that that is an implication of a very startling kind indeed. I do not doubt that a man may so contract as to bind himself to sell a property that he may afterwards acquire at a price to be fixed by arbitration. Such a thing is possible; but it would be a very anomalous contract, and I think it would require to be very clearly expressed in order to be binding. That such an obligation should be implied in any contract is to me a very novel idea. I know of no way in which a man can be bound beforehand to sell or submit to a servitude being created upon a property that he shall afterwards acquire, unless it shall be either by express contract or by force of an Act of Parliament; and as we have neither the one nor the other in this case, I am very clearly of opinion that that argument on the part of the pursuer fails also.

Trustees.

I am therefore for adhering to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—Divested of many details, and interminable correspondence, the important facts in this case are few, and, as I think, not doubtful. In 1863, the pursuer was proprietor of Dowanhill, M'Ewan held a feu of a part of Dowanhill from the pursuer, and Montgomerie and Fleming were the proprietors of all the ground, namely, the lands of Kelvinside, to the north-east of that feu. The feu in favour of M'Ewan was dated in December 1863, and in the feu-contract in his favour occurs the following clause (reads the clause importing the obligation as above quoted).

The road here contemplated was one intended to open from a more important thoroughfare, called the Great Western Road, some way to the north of M'Ewan's feu, and running at right angles to the proposed line of road. No part of the intervening land, through which the intended roadway was to be formed, belonged to the pursuer.

It is thus clear that the formation of the road depended entirely on the will of the proprietors of the intervening ground. It is also clear that either the pursuer or M'Ewan was free to purchase any part of this ground, and that if he did so he was as free to make or not make the road as were those from whom he might purchase it.

What happened was this: Shortly after his purchase, M'Ewan got into a dispute with Montgomerie and Fleming, as to the boundary of his feu to the north; and in the end, in order to avoid a law-suit, he agreed to purchase a strip of ground, $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet in width, lying, as it appeared, outside his northern boundary, and extending for some distance beyond the limits of his feu. This strip lay across the line of the proposed road. This ground he acquired in 1864. At this time the pursuer had no property north of this strip.

A matter of fact, which, however, seems to me to be immaterial, has been controverted as to this transaction. It is said that the motive which induced this purchase, on the part of M'Ewan, was to enable him to prevent the making of the road up to his original boundary, and so evade the fulfilment of his obligation. But I am quite satisfied that this is not the fact. M'Ewan made the purchase for the purpose of avoiding a law-suit with the coterminous proprietors, Montgomerie & Fleming, and with no other object. The whole course of the correspondence makes this clear; and the fact, which cannot be disputed, that M'Ewan, before his purchase, was desirous that the pursuer should acquire the ground, and asked Alexander, a coterminous feuar, to ascertain the pursuer's views, is conclusive on this subject. The pursuer, no doubt, denies that Alexander ever made the proposition to him, but that is of no consequence on this head. The only matter of any importance is that M'Ewan made this proposal to Alexander, which is entirely inconsistent with the idea that his object in making the purchase was to avoid fulfilling his obligation to make the road. I do not, however, doubt that M'Ewan was induced to give the price he did for this otherwise useless strip of $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet, by the knowledge that it would enable him to part with it on his own terms. Before the road could be made, if it was ever made, the pursuer or any one else would have had to buy him out, as he would have had to buy out Montgomerie & Fleming. There could be no reason why the pursuer should obtain his wayleave from M'Ewan more cheaply than he could have got it from Montgomerie & Fleming. He was not injured by the transaction, and had no concern with it whatever.

So stood matters in 1864, and so they continued for nearly ten years, during which the pursuer had no right to the ground over which the projected road had been intended to be made, and no steps had been taken towards its construction. During this interval, M'Ewan was the unrestricted owner of this strip, and might have sold it, or built over it as he pleased. In 1873, the pursuer at last bought up the proprietary interests in the ground to the north by a series of conveyances, the details of which are immaterial; he has made the road to the margin of the strip, and he now contends that he is entitled to a wayleave over this property without payment. I am of opinion that there is no foundation whatever for the demand.

It was attempted at the debate to bring this case within the well-known category of law, expressed by the 161st regula juris, on which the civil law and our own law on this subject is founded. The whole of this important branch of our jurisprudence was fully considered in the case of Pirie, 11 Macph., 941, and I do not propose to enter on any general discussion in regard to it now, because I am of opinion that the rule can have no application here.

But some distinctions must be attended to. The rule in question only applies to conditions which qualify contracts which are capable of being specifically performed independently of the condition. But when a contract relates to a subject-matter, the existence of which depends on an uncertain and future contingency or event, then, if the contingency or event never happen, the only result is, that there is no obligation. It is plain that, in such a case, there is no room for holding the condition as fulfilled, because, unless the contingency or event happen, the contract becomes incapable of the only implement the parties intended.

The rule contended for is that, if the condition is prevented by the party bound, it is to be held as completed. But suppose that rule were applied here, and the road were held as completed. The only effect of that would be to bring the contract into operation before the event occurred on which alone it was capable of fulfilment, and to oblige the defenders to make the road on their own feu, which when made would be useless. But this never could have the effect of entitling the pursuer to make a road through property which never belonged to him, and in regard to which the contract is absolutely silent. No. 121.

I am therefore inclined to think that this is not a condition annexed to an obligation otherwise complete, but a causa sine qua non, something outside the contract altogether, an event without the occurrence of which neither party was under any obligation or responsibility, and which was left to take place or not as the proprietors of the ground for the time might see fit. Nor will it escape observation that, while on one hand the contract gives no right to the pursuer to perform any act on the ground which he feued out, on the other, if his present demand succeeds, he will have all which his contract provides for him in the most favourable event, and, in addition, a right of way through land which was not within the contract, and without giving for it any consideration. Mar. 18, 1881.
Paterson v.
Trustees.

But, secondly, this rule or brocard of the civil law has no application in cases in which the act done is an incident of other transactions in the exercise of a separate and independent right. This was laid down in the case of Pirie, and is the teaching of the civil law in all the authorities referred to in that case—See especially the passages in Pothier's work on Obligations which are there referred to. This is an allowance of common sense; for it is too plain to require illustration that, if in 1863 M'Ewan had bought all the intervening ground between his feu and the Great Western Road, he might have made the road or not made it as he pleased, and that the pursuer could not have interfered with any use to which the property might be placed. I think the plea of the pursuer is a misapplication of a very sound and important principle of law to a state of facts lying entirely outside of it. It seems to fall within another and much more simple category. The pursuer wishes to have the use of the defender's land without paying for it, although he can shew neither title nor contract to support his demand. If he wishes it, he must acquire it, as M'Ewan did, on the usual terms.

LORD DEAS.—This action bears to be founded upon the clauses of a feu-contract entered into between Mr Paterson and Mr M'Ewan, dated 30th November and 1st December 1863, and registered on 3d December in the same year. I will shortly notice the clauses which are chiefly founded on. (After referring to the clauses quoted above, his Lordship proceeded):—

Now, it will be observed that this contemplated junction of the two roads so as to make a continuous passage between Dowanhill and the Great Western Road could not be effected without the consent of the proprietors of Kelvinside—then Messrs Montgomerie & Fleming—whose boundary with Dowanhill included what is now called the green strip, or at least that part of it which Mr M'Ewan acquired. It will further be observed that by the clauses in this feu-contract now relied upon by Mr Paterson, neither he nor Mr M'Ewan are expressly taken bound to acquire from the proprietor of Kelvinside the necessary ground or the necessary consent for carrying the Victoria Circus Road through Kelvinside so as to join the Great Western Road. Mr M'Ewan could not be said to be bound by the clauses of his contract to do so, for he is not bound to do anything till the road had been opened up and completed through Kelvinside in connection with the Victoria Circus Road, and his obligation then was conditional on Mr Paterson requiring him to implement that obligation. His

No. 121. obligation was "to open up, make, and continue one-half of Victoria Circus Road, so far as the said road bounds the said plot or area of ground above disposed on the north, and to maintain the same in good order in all time thereafter for mutual communication between the lands of Kelvinside and the first party's lands of Dowanhill." It is difficult to find in this anything beyond an obligation on the part of M'Ewan to be at the expense of making and maintaining a specified portion of road when Mr Paterson should find himself in a situation to require this to be done, and then only if Mr Paterson should require him to do it. This leads me very strongly to the result that if Mr Paterson meant to enforce against Mr M'Ewan his obligation to pay the expense of forming and maintaining the specified portion of the road, it was incumbent on him (Paterson), as a condition precedent, to find the means of making that condition prestable by transacting with those without whose consent that portion of the road could not be made at all.

If, however, in this state of matters M'Ewan, without the knowledge of Paterson, or without his having the ability to interfere, had purchased the property of the green strip, and pleaded that purchase against his obligation to make a portion of the road, I should certainly have thought that this was not according to good faith, although even then there might have been a legal difficulty as to the principle on which it was competent for Paterson to claim redress. But the decision in the case of Pirie, and the citation of authorities as to conditional obligations given in the voluminous opinion in that case by the Lord Justice-Clerk, and rightly applied to the circumstances that occurred there, would certainly not suffice to solve the present case, unless the circumstances under which M'Ewan purchased the green strip were those which I have just supposed. In Pirie's case the rule applied was that if he who is under a conditional obligation himself renders the accomplishment of the condition impracticable the condition shall be held as fulfilled. But the soundness of this rule can carry us no length at all in solving this case. I shall not follow out the supposed case of a purchase of the ground in bad faith any further, because it cannot be said to have occurred in the present case. The case which actually occurred is, that when the solum of the strip came into the market, although no offer of it was made to Paterson, he was made quite aware that it was for sale, and it was not till after Paterson had expressed his intention not to become the purchaser that M'Ewan came forward and made an offer, which the seller, after a correspondence on the subject, accepted. Circumstances known to your Lordship in the chair prevented me from reading the somewhat voluminous papers in this case till after Mr Asher had concluded his very able argument for Mr Paterson, which had been briefly replied to by the Dean of Faculty, who had more encouragement than Mr Asher had to be brief. I have now, however, read the whole of these papers, and particularly the parole evidence bearing upon the point to which I have just alluded, viz., the knowledge of Paterson that the strip in question was for sale. Paterson does not admit that he even knew that the strip of ground in question was in the market, or that M'Ewan might immediately purchase it if he did not. So far there is an apparent conflict between his evidence and the evidence of some of the other witnesses. But I am satisfied it is a conflict of memory rather than a conflict of testimony. I see no reason to think that Mr Paterson stated other than what he believed to have occurred. But we have a want of recollection on his part to an extent which ought to satisfy himself that his defective memory ought not to be put against the distinct recollection of other and impartial witnesses, such as Mr Alexander, who evidently is as favourable to Mr Paterson as he is to Mr M'Ewan, and who, in a letter of 11th November 1863, gave the import of a conversation he had had with Mr Paterson the day before, to the effect that Mr Paterson would decline to purchase the solum of the strip if it were offered to him. At the date of that letter the contract with M'Ewan had not been executed. Its terms were adjusted in February 1864, and it was signed by M'Ewan two days thereafter. Now, I cannot say I am satisfied that one of the objects or prospective objects of acquiring this strip of ground had relation to the obstruction it might make to this road.

But even though the preventing of the continuation of the road had something to do with the purchase, I do not see that that will entitle the pursuer to succeed in this action. It was for the pursuer to find the means of continuing that road, and without that it is plain that M'Ewan could not be called upon to fulfil the obligation of making his portion of the road. And even if there had been more to the same purpose, I do not see that that in point of law would enable the pursuer (whose obligation, as I read it, was all along to find the ground), to succeed. If he let that ground slip through his fingers, I do not see that that gives him any right now to the specific kind of relief that is concluded for in this action. It was Paterson's duty to acquire the ground for the making of the road, and he could not have understood that it was to be got for nothing. And then M'Ewan comes forward and purchases it. Whatever may be said about it, it is exceedingly unreasonable to suppose that he would allow this road to be made at the rate of the price of £142 which he paid for the ground. We cannot give any power to compel the defender to part with it except upon his own terms. It is admitted on all hands that if the pursuer wants this strip of ground he must pay for it—either the price of the land or compensation for a servitude over it. But how are we to fix the sum that is to be paid either as the price of the land or the price of a servitude? There is no arbitration practicable. I am not aware that we have any power to compel the parties to go into an arbitration in order to fix this price. In short, I cannot see any power that we have, upon any principle or practice known in our law, to fix a price for this ground or servitude, or to compel the parties to agree to it. That appears to me to be an obstacle to the success of this action.

I am of opinion, therefore, that in point of law we have no power to decern in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

LORD MURRAY.—On the question of fact raised in this case I have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived, viz., that the pursuer has entirely failed to prove the allegation of fraudulent acquisition of the ground in question on the part of the defender, upon which the pursuer's case as laid appears to me mainly to rely. The allegation is very distinct as put in the sixth article of the condescendence, and it appears to me that there is not only no proof of this allegation, but that it is, on the other hand, very clearly proved—(1) That the defender was obliged to buy the ground in question in 1864 in order to avoid a lawsuit with the proprietors of Kelvinside, into which he was likely to be led through the mistake of the pursuer, in giving a wrong description of the boundary of the defender's feu in the disposition of the property ; and (2) that the pursuer might at that time have himself acquired the ground in question, but declined to do so; and that it was only after the pursuer had so declined to acquire the ground that it was purchased by the defender. That, I think, is clear upon the evidence of Mr Alexander and Mr Macleod, and the correspondence which passed between the parties at the time—particularly Mr Alexander's letter of 11th November 1863, in which he narrates in writing, to the agent for the defender, the import of a conversation he had had with the pursuer on the previous day, in which the pursuer positively declined to acquire that property, and he depones to that in his evidence.

The ground therefore having been fairly acquired in open market, and being absolutely necessary for the defender in the position in which he had been placed, through the act of the pursuer, relative to the misdescription of the boundary, the question of law arises, whether the defender is bound to give up the use of that ground to the pursuer, in order to enable him to open up a road through Kelvinside to the boundary of the Dowanhill ground. On that question I entirely concur in the result at which the Lord Ordinary and your Lordships have arrived, and substantially on the same grounds. I think the doctrine of law upon which the pursuer relies has no application to the circumstances of the present case. It was next to conceded at the discussion that that doctrine would have had no application if the whole property of Kelvinside had been acquired by the defender either by succession or by purchase, and I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that it would not; and that being so, I can see no grounds in law upon which the pursuer can maintain that it can be held to apply to a part of that property. For the plea would in effect come to this, that in a possible event the ground in question was to be made subject to a servitude of road, in favour and in the option of the pursuer, of which there is no mention in the titles, and to which it would not be subject in the hands of any other party. I think that there is nothing in the circumstances of this case to lead to such a conclusion in law, and I cannot hold that the defender was debarred from purchasing the property except under an obligation to make it subject to a servitude of having a road made through it, at the request of the pursuer, when it suited the convenience of the pursuer to have that done. I see no foundation for such a claim on the part of the pursuer, and I accordingly concur in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD SHAND.—The defender, Mr M'Ewan, by the feu-contract of 1863, bound himself to open up and make and maintain one-half of a public road through the ground of his feu, if required to do so by the pursuer, so soon as a road should be opened up and completed through the lands of Kelvinside to the Great Western Road, in connection with Victoria Circus Road on the pursuer's lands of Dowanhill. It may be assumed, and it was no doubt the fact, that the defender obtained his feu at a rate of feu-duty considerably lower than he would otherwise have paid if he had undertaken no such obligation; for the performance of the obligation inferred not only the giving up of a part of the ground feued, but the expense of making and maintaining a road and footpath, and an ornamental railing of a particular description specified in the feu-contract.

The defender's obligation was conditional. He became bound to make the road only when a road of communication was opened up directly with the lands of Kelvinside, adjoining his feu on the east, towards the Great Western Road, No. 121. and now when he is asked to perform his obligation it is maintained on his behalf that the condition which alone can make the obligation enforceable has not been purified. It appears to me that, so far as regards the ground of the defender's feu to which the obligation applies, this defence cannot be successfully maintained, because the defender is himself the party who, by his voluntary act, has rendered the fulfilment of the condition in his own favour on which he now insists impossible. The right of ownership acquired by him in the strip of the ground of Kelvinside, on the eastern boundary of his feu, prevents the pursuer from opening up a road through the lands of Kelvinside to the Great Western Road, without the defender's consent, though he is otherwise now in a position to do so, and that consent is withheld. I am of opinion that on principle, and in accordance with the authorities cited by the pursuer, the defender cannot plead the non-fulfilment of the condition as a ground for freedom from his obligation—the fulfilment of the condition having been rendered impossible by himself.

Mar. 18, 1881.
Paterson v.
Trustees.

But this observation applies only to the obligation which the defender undertook, and that obligation in its terms refers only and exclusively to that part of the lands of Dowanhill which the defender acquired by his feu-right. The projected road cannot be made without passing over the strip of the lands of Kelvinside which the defender has acquired, and he refuses to allow the road to pass over this ground. The pursuer maintains his right, on payment of reasonable compensation, to make the road over this strip of the defender's property also, on the ground that it was an implied condition or obligation of the feu-right of 1863 that the defender should do nothing voluntarily for the sole purpose of frustrating the making of the road in question on the Kelvinside end of his feu, and that he cannot be allowed in violation of this obligation to prevent the road being made over ground which he now holds, for the purpose only of enabling him to defeat an implied condition of his contract, which, I may observe, is a totally different case from that of an acquisition or possession of part of the estate of Kelvinside for some other object or purpose.

The decision of the case really turns on the question whether there is such an implied condition in the feu-contract, for if there be not, and if the pursuer cannot insist on his right to make the road over the strip of Kelvinside belonging to the defender, and so cannot open up a communication between his property of Dowanhill and the estate of Kelvinside, he has no interest and no right to have the road made through the defender's feu. The defender denies that there is any implied condition or obligation on him of the nature contended for which could prevent his acquiring an independent right to ground on the Kelvinside boundary of his feu, and using that right in the same way as any other proprietor, and he contends that even if the contract could be construed as containing the implied obligation contended for his violation of that obligation would give rise to a claim of damages only, but would not entitle the pursuer to insist on the road being made through his property, not forming part of his feu. On this latter point I shall only say that if it could be shewn that, according to the sound construction of the feu-contract, the defender had undertaken not to do any act by which the pursuer's purpose of making the road through Kelvinside should be frustrated or prevented, it appears to me to be clear that his acquisition or possession of a strip of ground now held in violation of his obligation could

No. 121. not prevent justice being done between the parties, and that the pursuer would be entitled to the remedy he asks, and not limited to a claim of damages, to which he should only be driven if it could be shewn that the defender could not still fulfil his obligation by suffering the road to be made.

Mar. 18, 1881.
Paterson v.
Trustees.

On the question whether, according to a sound construction of the contract, there was an implied obligation on the defender of the nature contended for, I confess I was throughout the argument, and till its close, disposed to think the pursuer was right in his contention. It is, I think, impossible to read the feu-contract, with its careful provisions which relate to the subject in dispute, without seeing that it was in the contemplation of both parties that the road in question would be opened up, at least would in all probability be opened up, though some time might elapse before the pursuer would be in a position to have this done. It was obviously of much importance to the pursuer that he should have the road opened up sooner or later for the benefit of his unfeued lands of Dowanhill, and in order, as the contract expresses it, to make a "mutual communication between the lands of Kelvinside and the first party's lands of Dowanhill." The defender was, of course, well aware that it was to secure this object and advantage that the pursuer stipulated that a part of the feu should form one-half of the breadth of the road as soon as he could arrange with the owners of Kelvinside to have the communication made, and there can, I presume, be no doubt that the defender obtained his feu on lower terms than he would otherwise have done, because of his obligation to give up a part of it, and to make the road in dispute through it. These considerations point at least very strongly to this, that it must have been the understanding of parties that the defender should not by his voluntary act seek to defeat the pursuer's purpose of opening up the communication contemplated. This purpose was avowed on the face of the contract. It was recognised in the terms of the defender's obligation, and in consequence the defender got his feu at a lower rate or price than he would otherwise have done; and for my part I would willingly, in the circumstances, have construed the contract as containing the implied obligation on the defender for which the pursuer contends. But on full consideration, I feel constrained to agree with your Lordships in holding that the deed cannot be read as having this effect, and that whatever may have been the understanding of parties, or either of them, the defender was left free, if he thought fit, by the purchase of a piece of ground on his Kelvinside boundary practically to secure that the road should never be made, and that in this way he should thus virtually become free from the obligation he had undertaken. In the case of M'Intyre v. Belcher (14 Scott's C. B. Reps., N. S., 654), referred to in the discussion, Mr Justice Williams is reported to have said that "the Court should be careful not to infringe the golden rule that contracts are to be construed not by what one feels would be right, but by what is expressed in, or is necessarily to be inferred from the language of the parties," and applying that rule to the present case, I have come to the conclusion that the legal obligation on the defender which, it is said, is implied from the terms of the contract, is unfortunately neither expressed nor necessarily to be inferred from the language of the deed. I have only to add, that if such an obligation had been made out, I should have held that the defender was not relieved of it by the circumstances which immediately led to his purchase of the strip of ground in question, for I think it is proved that one of the objects he had in view was that he would thereby acquire the key to Downhill at this point. He says in his evidence, "I knew quite well No. 121. that the acquisition of the strip made me master of the road." Apart from this, confessedly the only value to him of the $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet of ground ex adverso of his feu is to enable him to block the road, and avoid his obligation to the defender, for, again referring to the evidence, when the defender is asked in regard to the strip in question, "Apart from the power it gives you of blocking the road, has it any commercial value?" he answers, "I cannot say; it has a commercial value, but I have not gone into that question." I must farther say that I should not hold the pursuer barred from making his present demand on account of his failure to buy the ground when the defender purchased it, for it appears to me that the only ground offered to the pursuer was a much larger extent than that which the defender got, and of no possible use to him at the time, and I think he was fairly entitled to believe from the terms of the feu-contract of 1863, that if the defender became the purchaser, he would not use his acquired right to defeat entirely the obligation he had thereby undertaken by putting a prohibitive price on the privilege of using the ground. But the pursuer's case fails on the question of legal obligation on the defender, under the deed of 1863, to refrain from acquiring the independent right he now pleads, and on that ground I agree, with regret, in thinking the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

Paterson v.
Trustees.

LORD YOUNG.—In the view which I take of this case it is a very short and clear one, depending exclusively upon the clause in the feu-contract between the parties, Mr Paterson and Mr M'Ewan, being the only passage to which we were referred in the argument. The material—I think the only material—conclusion of the summons—there are formally four—but I think the only material conclusion, is that which I am going to read. It is for declarator that the defenders are bound to permit the pursuer "to open up, make, and continue the said road of forty feet in breadth through the adjoining strip of ground about $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, also now or lately belonging to the said James M'Ewan"—I omit words superfluous, and proceed—"upon payment to the defenders, or one or other of them, of such compensation, if any, for the said permission as our said Lords may fix and determine." There is to that a corresponding decerniture concluded for—that is to say, to enforce the right by the conclusion which I have read sought to be declared. The only other conclusion of declarator, with the corresponding conclusion for decerniture, is, I think, of no significance in the case. It relates to the formation of the road through the feu which the defender—I speak in the singular, for convenience omitting all notice of the trustees—holds of the pursuer Mr Paterson. The conclusion with regard to it is of no significance, for a reason which I pointed out at an early stage of the debate, viz. that the defender by his averments and pleas says he is not concerned about it at all. He says that "as regards the pursuer's demands in the present action, the defender M'Ewan, without admitting any legal obligation on him to do so, is ready and willing, and has never refused, to open, make, and continue one-half of Victoria Circus Road, so far as the road bounds on the north the plot or area of ground disposed by said feu-contract, and the other defenders are ready and willing, and have never refused, to permit this to be done." And the plea with reference to that conclusion—for the pleas are divided into two heads, and this is the second head—is, "As regards the opening up, formation, and continuation of the Victoria Circus Road, so far as the line of said road bounds the defenders' feu foresaid, the conclusions of declarator and ad factum prestandum are nimious and unnecessary." I repeat, therefore, that the material, and the only material, conclusion is that which I have read, seeking to have it declared that the defender is under an obligation to the pursuer to permit him to acquire, at a price to be fixed by this Court, a servitude over a piece of ground, admittedly the defenders' property in fee-simple. Well, if such an obligation exists—and it conceivably might—this Court undoubtedly has jurisdiction to enforce it. If the fee-simple proprietor of any piece of ground, whether it be $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide or $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles wide, is under an obligation to anybody to permit a servitude of road to be constituted over it, and the road to be formed, upon being paid such price as the value of the road as this Court should appoint, we might enforce that obligation, though perhaps we should think it was taking some little liberty for the parties so contracting to appoint this Court as referee to determine the price.

 Paterson v.

Now, I put it at a very early stage of the argument to the pursuer's counsel—Is the defender under any obligation to the pursuer except that which is expressed or implied in the feu-contract? and he said—"No, there is nothing else." There is plenty of printing here, but there is nothing else to impose any obligation upon the defender in favour of the pursuer except what is expressed or implied in the clause of the feu-contract to which I have referred. Then the question is, Does that clause express or imply an obligation upon the defender in the event—then a future and unknown event—of his acquiring a portion, greater or less, of Kelvinside, to sell a servitude over it at such a price as the Court may appoint? That is really the whole question in the case. It is admitted that it does not express any such obligation. It is admitted that it does not imply any such obligation if the whole of Kelvinside had been acquired, or even a considerable part of it. But it is said that as the strip of ground is only $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide there is implied an obligation to sell a servitude over the $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet. I asked Mr Asher to formulate the obligation under this head, not expressed, but which, he said, was implied by this clause, that if the feuar shall hereafter acquire a strip of Kelvinside $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet wide, or perhaps of somewhat but not much greater width, or anything less he shall then be under an obligation to sell a servitude of way over it to the superior of his adjoining feu upon such terms as this Court should fix. Now, that is reducing it to absolute extravagance; and that is the whole case. There is nothing else in it. If the obligation is not in that clause, expressed there—which it is not—or implied there—which it just as clearly is not—it is nowhere to be found at all.

I should like only to add this, that I think a proof ought not to have been allowed here. I think there was no room for evidence at all. I think there was no relevant allegation of any obligation to the effect sought to be declared, for it appears upon the record that the pursuer can found upon nothing except this clause of the feu-contract, and it is for the Court to read that and determine the import and effect of it; and I do not think that the averment of the pursuer is of any relevancy at all. Of course nobody is entitled to act in fraud of an obligation which he has come under, and he is not entitled to plead anything which he has done voluntarily, even although quite honestly, as a reason why he shall not fulfil his obligation. But what is sought to be enforced here is an obligation arising in respect of the purchase of a piece of Kelvinside. He could be under no obligation to grant a servitude of road over that until he bought it. If after he bought it he was under the obligation, why, the pursuer would prevail by force of the obligation which he established to that effect. But if he was not under the obligation, and refused to allow the thing to be done voluntarily, what in the world can it signify that he had it in his mind when he made the purchase that he would not be under the obligation and would refuse to do the thing voluntarily?—that is to say, when he made the purchase he intended to do the thing which he is doing, and which we find he is entitled to do. I do not see any significance in that at all.

I am of opinion that the action should be dismissed. That is the form in which the Lord Ordinary has put the interlocutor, and it is probably not necessary to interfere with it. I should myself rather have assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the summons.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I agree with all the members of the Court in thinking that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to. I have come to this conclusion without any hesitation, because it appears to me on a consideration of that which is to be found in the printed papers and of the argument and of the authorities which we have had from the bar, that the case is not attended with any difficulty. The defender M'Ewan is the vassal of the pursuer Mr Paterson, the ground forming the feu of Thorncliffe being held of the pursuer, and the purpose of the present action, as I understand, is to enforce an obligation said to have been undertaken by the pursuer in this feu-contract, which is the ground of action.

There are two conclusions, with reference to one of which there is, in truth, no controversy between the parties, that conclusion having reference to the opening up of the road so far as that road was to be a boundary of the defender's feu. The other conclusion, strange to say, is a conclusion which relates to a piece of land which is no part of the feu, and which, so far as I can discover, is not made matter of obligation or of contract between the parties. The only thing, so far as I can discover, about which there is a contract between the parties is this feu held by the defender of the pursuer; and as regards the formation of roads, the only obligation imposed upon or undertaken by the defender is that relative to the opening up of the Victoria Circus Road in so far as that road is ex adverso of the defender's feu. The condition upon which the defender became bound to open up this part of the road was that there should be a connection formed through the lands of Kelvinside from the Great Western Road to Dowanhill. At the time this feu-contract was entered into these lands of Kelvinside did not belong to the pursuer, and they did not belong to the defender, and we look in vain in the contract for any obligation undertaken by the pursuer to acquire these lands, or, if he acquired them, to open up a road through from the Great Western Road to his lands of Dowanhill. He might have acquired them, and yet, for anything the feu-contract contains, he might have dedicated these lands to an entirely different purpose from that to which reference was made in the feu-contract. It is not said that the pursuer was under any obligation to get these lands. It is not said that if he got them he was bound to form a road through them; and certainly, even if it were said, I should think we should look in vain through the feu-charter for anything by which such an obligation would be constituted. Now, is there anything by which an obligation not imposed by the pursuer is imposed upon the defender,—was he bound to acquire these lands? It is not stated. If he did acquire these lands, was he bound to use them to any extent in opening up a road from the Great Western Road to the march of Dowanhill? There is nothing in the contract about that—nothing whatever. The only thing about which he entered into a contract with or undertook an obligation to the pursuer was this, that once there was a road opened up through Kelvinside to the march of Dowanhill, and once he was called upon by the pursuer to open up this Victoria Circus Road so far as opposite to his feu, then that obligation would be upon him. But the parties made no reference to Kelvinside. There was no obligation undertaken by the one to the other with reference to the acquisition of these lands or with reference to the use to which these lands were to be put once they were acquired.

It appears to me that the reasons which were urged on the part of the pursuer for asking decree in terms of the second conclusion of the summons are reasons which are not supported, in so far as fact is concerned, by the proof which has been led; and in so far as legal principle is concerned, they are not supported by those principles and those authorities to which reference was made in the argument. It would be in vain for me to go over or bring forward the reasons by which I am influenced in coming to this conclusion as regards this last point, because I think those reasons have been made plain in the opinions that have already been given.

Expenses—Jury Trial—Fees to Counsel.—In a jury trial relating to a right of way, which lasted from 10 a.m. till 6.30 p.m. of each of three days, the Court refused to allow as charges against the losing party more than the usual fees to counsel, viz, twenty, fifteen, and ten guineas to senior counsel, and fifteen, ten, and seven guineas to junior counsel.

Vide, ante, p. 497.

The defender in this jury trial, which had lasted three days, objected to the Auditor's report on his account of expenses, in so far as it taxed off and disallowed the following items:—(1) £5, 5s. each from fees to junior counsel of £21, and £15, 15s. for the first two days, and £8, 8s. from a fee of £15, 15s. for the third; and (2) £5, 5s. from a fee of £15, 15s. to his senior counsel for the third day. He argued that the case being one of right of way was difficult, and involved intricate questions of law as well as of fact. Farther, the Court had sat to 6.30 on each day.

The pursuers replied that there was no reason why the rule laid down in the cases of Hubback v. North British Railway Co., June 25, 1864, 2 Macph. 1291, and Neilson v. Barclay, July 19, 1870, 8 Macph. 1011, should not be applied to this case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—As to the amount of fees, I think that this case is just an ordinary jury trial, and that we are bound to follow the rule which was laid down No. 122. in the cases which have been cited by Mr Campbell. It is a rule which has Mar. 18, 1881. been acted upon in both Divisions of the Court, and the reasons for which are Black v. carefully set forth by the late Lord President in the case of Cooper and Wood Mason. v. The North British Railway Co., Dec. 19, 1863, 2 Macph. 346.

Poor's-Roll—Time of stating objections where admission applied for.—Held, Mar. 18, 1881. following Allan v. Allan, Feb. 28, 1872, 10 Macph. 510, that objections to Douglas v. admission to the benefit of the poor's-roll (on grounds other than the want of M'Veigh. probabilis causa) should be stated when the application is moved in the Single Bills, and before a remit is made to the reporters on probabilis causa.

THIS was an application for admission to the poor's-roll. The appli-1st DIVISION cant, James Douglas, in compliance with the provisions of the Act of C. Sederunt of 21st December 1842, had appeared before the minister and elders of his parish, and made the requisite declaration. Notice was thereafter given in the minute-book, and the Court remitted to the reporters "to state whether there was a probabilis causa litigandi."

M'Veigh then, for the first time, appeared to object to the application for admission to the poor's-roll, on the ground that the applicant had means of support which he had not disclosed.

The reporters declined to consider the objection, on the ground that it came too late, and reported that the applicant had a probabilis causa.

M'Veigh now urged the same objection to the Court.¹

The petitioner argued that it came too late.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the rule laid down in the case of Allan in the Second Division on the construction of the Act of Sederunt of 1842 is the sound rule, and I am not for disturbing it. The Act of Sederunt provides that the applicant cannot come here at all until he has got a certificate from the kirk-session, and in order that he may obtain this certificate the 4th section requires "that ten days' previous intimation, by letter post-paid, shall be given to the adverse party of the time and place fixed for making the said declaration or statement before the minister and elders." The 5th section provides "that the said declaration of the party and certificate of the minister and elders, with the certificate of intimation to the adverse party, shall be transmitted free of expense, to one of the agents for conducting the causes for the poor for the time, and shall, at the distance of not more than three months from the date of the declaration, and as much sooner as circumstances will

Mar. 18, 1881.
Douglas v.
M'Veigh.

It is quite plain that the meaning of these sections is that the adverse party, as he is called, is to have abundant notice, first, of the time when the declaration is to be made before the kirk-session, in order that he may, if he pleases, attend there; and secondly, of the time at which the Court are to be moved to remit the application to the reporters on the probabilis causa, in order that he may attend on this second occasion, and state objections. The Act then goes on to provide that, "on moving which, the Court may, on hearing any objections, either refuse the application de plano, or remit to the reporters, who on considering the party's case, and hearing all objections, shall report whether the applicant has a probabilis causa litigandi, and otherwise merits the benefit of the poor's-roll." It appears to me that the reporters will report either simply on the probabilis causa, or on other matters relating to the merits of the application for the benefit of the poor's-roll, according to the terms of the remit which is made to them. It is not intended that they shall go beyond the terms of the remit when the remit is merely to inquire into the probabilis causa. The adverse party has had ample opportunity to state his objections when the case was first moved in Court, and it would be highly inexpedient to go back upon these objections after the reporters have taken the trouble—and no small trouble it is in many cases—of considering the merits of the applicant's case, and his chance of success.

I think the rule laid down in Allan's case is not only in perfect consistency with the Act of Sederunt, but is also in accordance with the practice, which was well settled even before the case of Allan, for in that case the reporters on the probabilis causa in their report to the Court stated—"An objection was stated to the reporters that the circumstances of the applicant do not entitle him to the benefit of the poor's-roll; but the reporters, following what they understood to have been the practice for many years, declined to consider it, as such an objection is usually stated and disposed of by the Court before the remit to the reporters is made." Now, taking that report, and the Act of Sederunt, and the practice, the Judges expressed themselves thus:—Lord Neaves observed—"This objection comes too late. Notice is given in the minute-book for the express purpose that objections may be stated when the case appears in the Single Bills. The change in the Act of Sederunt of 1842 from that of 1819 was made in order to alter the system formerly pursued." And Lord Cowan observed—"I think it very important that the present practice should be adhered to. According to it an opportunity for objecting on the ground of the poverty not being established is always given when the case is in the Single Bills, notwithstanding the power which the adverse party has under the Act of Sederunt to appear before the minister and elders. . . . But when no appearance is made, and no good ground stated to account for this, I am very clear that the objection on the ground of poverty not being proved comes too late." It is quite true, as Mr Gibson has observed, that parties have been heard in other cases after the remit to the reporters, but these were cases in which the objection does not seem to have been taken, and the Court did not advert to the matter. It must now, however, be distinctly understood that objections must be stated at the first stage when the applicant comes to the Court.

Railway—Judicial Factor—Powers—Management—Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 126), sec. 4.—Held that a judicial factor appointed under the Railway Companies Act of 1867 has under and by virtue of his appointment the sole and exclusive power of management of the undertaking of the railway company, and of the whole works and property connected therewith.

ON 3d July 1879 Mr James Haldane, C.A., Edinburgh, was on the petition of creditors appointed judicial factor on the undertaking of the Girvan and Portpatrick Junction Railway in terms of the fourth section of the Railway Companies Act of 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 126), with the usual powers. The Girvan and Portpatrick line was then being worked by the Glasgow and South-Western Railway under a working agreement. Under this agreement there had since the date of Mr Haldane's appointment been a large, though to some extent diminishing, excess of expenditure over revenue. The position of the Girvan and Portpatrick Company was otherwise very embarrassed. No interest had been paid on the debentures since Martinmas 1878, and the debentures as they fell due could not be renewed. In these circumstances it appeared to the judicial factor necessary that the working agreement with the Glasgow and South-Western Company should be brought to an end. He therefore gave notice to that company that it would not be renewed after the 31st January 1881, and this notice the working company accepted; but in consequence of difficulties as to the respective powers of the judicial factor and the directors of the Girvan and Portpatrick Company to enter into a new agreement with the working company, and generally as to the management of the Girvan Company, the factor found it necessary to present this note, in which he prayed the Court "to grant power to and authorise the judicial factor to manage the undertaking of the Girvan and Portpatrick Junction Railway Company, and whole works and property connected therewith, or otherwise to find and declare that under and by virtue of his appointment as aforesaid the sole and exclusive power of management of the said undertaking, works, and property is vested in the said judicial factor."

No. 124.

Haldane v.
Girvan and Portpatrick
Junction Railway Co.

The note was opposed by the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway, and by T. L. Rushton and James Ormrod, two of the original petitioners for the appointment of a factor. Both sets of respondents maintained that under the Act 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 126, sec. 4, it was not competent to appoint a judicial factor to undertake the actual management of the company's undertaking, and that if it was competent to do so in some circumstances, the present was not a case in which the directors should thus be superseded by a factor. The Railway Companies (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 126), sec. 4, provides that "the engines, tenders, carriages, trucks, machinery, tools, fittings, materials, and effects constituting the rolling stock and plant used or provided by a company for the purpose of the traffic on their railway, or of their stations and workshops, shall not, after their railway or any part thereof is open for public traffic, be liable to be attached by diligence at any time after the passing of this Act and before the 1st day of September 1868, where the decree on which diligence proceeds is obtained in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of this Act, or in an action not on contract commenced after the passing of this Act, or on a protested promissory-note or bill of exchange, or a deed containing a clause of registration registered after the passing of this Act; but the person who has obtained any such decree may obtain the appointment of a judicial factor on the undertaking of the company, on application by petition in a summary manner to the Court, and all money received by such judicial factor shall, after due provision for the working expenses of the railway and other proper outgoings in respect of the undertaking, be applied and distributed under the direction of the Court in payment of the debts of the company, and otherwise according to the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein, and on payment of the amount due to every such person who has obtained decree as aforesaid, the Court may, if it think fit, discharge such factor."

The corresponding English Act (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 127) contains a similar provision (sec. 4), the only important difference being that instead of a "judicial factor" it authorises "the appointment of a receiver, and, if necessary, of a manager of the undertaking of the company."

The 56th section of the Companies Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act of 1845 (8 Vict. cap. 17) provides that "where by the special Act the mortgagees of the company shall be empowered to enforce the payment of arrears of interest, or the arrears of principal and interest, due on such mortgages, by the appointment of a judicial factor, then, if within thirty days after the interest accruing upon any such mortgage or bond has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the same be not paid, the mortgagee may, without prejudice to his right to sue for the interest so in arrear in any competent Court, require the appointment of a judicial factor by application to be made as hereinafter provided; and if within six months after the principal money owing upon any such mortgage or bond has become payable, and after demand thereof in writing, the same be not paid, the mortgagee, without prejudice to his right to sue for such principal money, together with all arrears of interest in any competent Court, may, if his debt amount to the prescribed sum, alone, or if his debt does not amount to the prescribed sum, he may, in conjunction with other mortgagees whose debts, being so in arrear after demand as aforesaid, shall, together with his, amount to the prescribed sum, require the appointment of a judicial factor, by an application to be made as hereinafter provided."

The 57th section of the same statute provides that "every application for a judicial factor in the cases aforesaid shall be made to the Court of Session, and on any application so made, and after hearing the parties, it shall be lawful for the said Court, by order in writing, to appoint some person to receive the whole or a competent part of the tolls or sums liable to the payment of such interest, or until such principal and interest, as the case may be, together with all costs, including the charges of receiving the tolls or sums aforesaid, be fully paid; and upon such appointment being made, all such tolls and sums of money as aforesaid shall be paid to and received by the person so to be appointed; and the money so to be received shall be so much money received by or to the use of the party to whom such interest, or such principal and interest, as the case may be, shall be then due, and on whose behalf such judicial factor shall have been appointed; and after such interest and costs, or such principal, interest, and costs, have been so received, the power of such judicial factor shall cease, and he shall be bound to account to the company for his intromissions or the sums received by him, and to pay over to their treasurer any balance that may be in his hands."

Haldane v.
Girvan and Portpatrick
Junction Railway Co.

The corresponding English Act (8 Vict. cap. 16, secs. 53 and 54) contains similar provisions, except that the officer to be appointed is styled "a receiver," not "a judicial factor," and his appointment is to be made by two Justices of the Peace, not by the Court of Chancery.

The Companies Clauses Act of 1863 (26 and 27 Vict. cap. 118), secs. 25 and 26, confers upon debenture-holders similar privileges to those conferred by the Acts of 1845 upon mortgagees. As in that Act, the officer is, as regards Scotland, termed a judicial factor, as regards England a receiver; and in the former case the appointment is to be made by the Court of Session, in the latter by two Justices.

Down to the date of the decision in the present case the line of the Girvan and Portpatrick Company continued to be worked by the Glasgow and South-Western Company, but under reservation of their rights to have the contract terminated as at 31st January, in terms of the notice sent by the judicial factor.

Argued for the petitioner;—The English Act of 1867 expressly conferred on the Court of Chancery the power of appointing a receiver, "and if necessary also of a manager." That was an alteration of the common law of England, for it had been held—Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway, infra—that for the Court to appoint a manager of a railway was ultra vires. Such a decision had never been pronounced in Scotland, but it was the obvious intention of the legislation of 1867 to put the two countries on the same footing in this respect. Creditors of railways in both countries were deprived of their common rights of diligence, and that obviously in the public interest, and in return they received the remedy of a judicial factor in Scotland, and of a receiver, and if necessary also of a manager, in England. When then would a manager be appointed in England? Whenever there was a business to be managed, as the necessary result of appointing a receiver only on an undertaking was to stop the business—Manchester and Milford Railway, infra. There was in the present case a business to be managed; it followed therefore (unless the Scotch Act was to have a radically different effect from the English) that the judicial factor here must have the powers of a manager. The directors were by his appointment entirely superseded. The earlier Acts had obviously a different object, and probably officers appointed under them had smaller powers. This was by no means certain, however, as regarded factors under the

No. 124. Scotch Acts—Primrose v. Caledonian Railway, infra, per Lord Fullerton.¹

Haldane v.
Girvan and Portpatrick
Junction Railway Co.

Argued for the respondents;—To decide what was meant by “factor” in the Act of 1867 it was necessary to compare that Act with the earlier Acts. In them “factor” was plainly used as equivalent to the English receiver. In the Act of 1863, which applied to both countries, the words were used as synonymous. In the last of this series of legislation—the Act of 1867—judicial factor must therefore be taken as equivalent to the English receiver, not to the English receiver and manager. But even if the factor might have power to manage in some cases, that was not a necessary consequence of his appointment, and in the present case was inexpedient. He had had no experience of railway management, however excellent an accountant; indeed, the nature of his profession shewed what the Court had in view when they appointed him. Against the directors’ business qualifications nothing had been alleged. They ought not, therefore, to be superseded.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case Mr Haldane was appointed “judicial factor on the undertaking of the Girvan and Portpatrick Railway mentioned in the petition, with the usual powers, he finding caution before extract in common form.” The application was presented and the appointment was made under the 4th section of the Railway Companies Act of 1867, and the factor now presents this note, in which he craves the Court “to grant power to and authorise the judicial factor to manage the undertaking of the Girvan and Portpatrick Junction Railway Company, and whole works and property connected therewith, or otherwise to find and declare that under and by virtue of his appointment as aforesaid, the sole and exclusive power of management of the said undertaking, works, and property, is vested in the said judicial factor.” The Girvan and Portpatrick Railway at the time of Mr Haldane’s appointment was under a working agreement with the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, and in consequence was not actually working its own line; and the duties of a judicial factor under the Railway Companies Act of 1867 depend very much upon what is the condition of the company in respect of its being in the course of working its own line, or of having it worked by another company. But the appointment of a factor under the Act of 1867 is a very different thing from an appointment under the Companies Act of 1845. It is quite clear from the terms of this earlier statute that it was not intended that a judicial factor appointed under its provisions should have any greater power than that of merely receiving the surplus proceeds of the railway company, whether working its own line or getting it worked by another, and of applying these funds in payment of creditors according to their preferences. Nor does the succeeding statute of 1863 make any difference in this respect, because it merely extends to a different class of creditors—to debenture-holders—the same remedy which the earlier statute had conferred on mortgagees. But in the statute with which we are now dealing it appears to me that it was intended to confer a very different class of powers on the factor at his appointment. The section begins by depriving creditors of a right which they had at common law—the right, namely, to attach the moveable effects of the company. The provision is in these terms:—

 “The engines, tenders, carriages, trucks, machinery, tools, fittings, materials, and effects constituting the rolling-stock and plant used or provided by a company for the purpose of the traffic on their railway, or of their stations and workshops, shall not, after their railway or any part thereof is open for public traffic, be liable to be attached by diligence at any time after the passing of this Act and before the 1st day of September 1868, where the decree on which diligence proceeds is obtained in an action on a contract entered into after the passing of this Act, or in an action not on contract commenced after the passing of this Act, or on a protested promissory-note or bill of exchange, or a deed containing a clause of registration registered after the passing of this Act.”

Now, the effect of this provision, which by a subsequent statute was made perpetual, is that no creditor could thereafter do diligence against the moveable property of a railway company. This is a very important right, of which all creditors were by force of this statute deprived. Indeed, it is almost the only kind of diligence that can very well be available against the peculiar corporation and property of a railway company. It is only to be expected therefore, and it is only just, when the Legislature deprives creditors of this right, and that purely in the public interest, and for the sake of preventing a going railway from being stopped by a creditor using diligence against the plant, that something should be given in return. And accordingly the right which the creditor gets in return appears to me to be a right which it would be very difficult for anyone to interfere with. It is itself a kind of diligence which is conferred on the creditor in place of that of which he is deprived. Now, the right which is thus conferred on the creditor is described in these terms:—“But the person who has obtained any such decree may obtain the appointment of a judicial factor on the undertaking of the company on application by petition in a summary manner to the Court, and all money received by such judicial factor shall, after due provision for the working expenses of the railway and other proper outgoings in respect of the undertaking, be applied and distributed under the direction of the Court in payment of the debts of the company, and otherwise according to the rights and priorities of the persons for the time being interested therein, and on payment of the amount due to every such person who has obtained decree as aforesaid, the Court may, if it think fit, discharge such factor.” This is the right which is given to the creditor in place of the right to use diligence, which is taken away; and, therefore, it appears to me that it would require a very strong reason indeed to induce the Court, when a properly qualified creditor applied for a factor, to refuse to make that appointment.

The next question is, what is the effect of the appointment? It is, I think, tolerably plain that the powers of a factor under the provision I have just quoted are very different from those of factors appointed under the two earlier statutes. He is to be appointed “on the undertaking of the company,” and by the undertaking of the company is meant the railway and its works. Now, whenever a judicial factor is appointed on any estate or interest, the meaning is that he is to undertake the management of the estate or interest, whatever it may be. If it is a partnership, then the factor must either be appointed for the purpose of winding up the business if it falls to be wound up, or, if it is not in that condition, his duty will be to undertake the management of the partnership estate in terms of the contract of copartnery—that is, to continue the business. When, therefore, a factor is appointed on the undertaking of a company, that can mean nothing else than that he is thereby invested with the charge and management of the undertaking. But this is made still clearer by the provision that “all money received by such judicial factor shall, after due provision for the working expenses of the railway and other proper outgoings in respect of the undertaking, be applied and distributed under the direction of the Court in payment of the debts of the company.” There is thus to be an allowance made for the working expenses, and also a fixing of the other proper outgoings in respect of the undertaking. Who is to determine what the working expenses ought to be? Certainly the factor, under the direction and superintendence of the Court. And who is to determine what outgoings are proper? Certainly not the company, but the factor, who is in the direction and management of the company. I think, therefore, that the meaning of the provision we are here dealing with is that a creditor properly qualified, whose debt is unpaid, is entitled to come to the Court and to ask the Court to supersede the existing management of the railway, and to put it into the hands of a person or persons appointed by the Court under the name of judicial factor or factors, who shall for the future take the place of the directors, and who shall regulate the expenditure, determine what is necessary to pay working expenses and other proper outlays, and ascertain the balance divisible among creditors, and distribute that balance under the direction of the Court.

It is said that in many circumstances it may be extremely inconvenient to the gentleman appointed judicial factor to take into his own management a great railway concern. That may be so. For aught I know, this may not be the best possible remedy that can be devised to come in place of the creditors' right to do diligence against the moveable property of the company; but it is the remedy which the Legislature has given to the creditors, and it is quite clear that it may be worked out in a way not so inconvenient as the respondents have represented. The railway may be placed in three different positions. It may be working its own line. That is the most difficult case; but even here the factor would be able to give the proper superintendence, while he employed all the usual officials in the actual working of the concern. In the second place, the railway may be leased to another company. This is a very simple case, for all that the factor would have to do is to draw the rent which is paid under the lease. Then, in the third place, the company may have entered into a working agreement with another company; and this was a more complicated position—one of a mixed character—intermediate between the other two. But in all these cases there is no distinction in the powers which the judicial factor possesses. In the one form and in the other he is appointed to undertake the management of the company, whatever that may involve.

It is very possible, indeed, if there be no objection to their appointment, that one or more of the directors or other officials may be chosen to undertake the management under the control of the Court. That is quite a possible case. On the other hand, the directors may be unsuitable; and the creditors are perfectly entitled to come forward and ask that some one else should be appointed. But this, too, is a matter of detail of little value in the construction of the statute. The factor, whoever he may be, is to be manager of the company, and that can mean nothing less than that he is to have the entire control of its affairs under the supervision of the Court.

The respondents have referred to the English statute and to the language which is made use of in it. In England judicial factors are unknown. The law of England has two names—receiver and manager—to denote the office which we know by one name—judicial factor; and the distinction between a receiver and a manager was explained to be—and I think very clearly explained to be—that if a receiver only was appointed the company necessarily came to an end; if the company was to be continued, the receiver must also be appointed manager, and hence in the English Act provision is made for the appointment of both officers. But in the Scotch Act the Court are directed to appoint a judicial factor, and this makes the matter more simple, because the powers of the factor would be limited or extended according to the position of the railway company's affairs. If the line was leased, then there would be nothing to be done but to receive the rent, and the factor would, in that case, be simply what in England is called a receiver. If, however, the company was working its own line, the factor would have to manage it, and thus take the place of the directors. On the whole matter, the conclusion I have come to is, that this application for special powers is unnecessary; but it may be quite proper to make a declaration in terms of the alternative prayer of the note, that in virtue of his appointment the sole and exclusive power of management of the undertaking, works, and property was vested in the judicial factor.

LORD MURE and LORD SHAND concurred.

LORD DEAS was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that, in virtue of the judicial factor's appointment under the 4th section of the 30th and 31st Victoria, c. 126, he is vested with the full and exclusive power of managing the undertaking of the Girvan and Portpatrick Junction Railway Company under the direction of the Court, and therefore find it unnecessary to confer any additional powers in terms of the prayer of the said note."

Superior and vassal—Condition in favour of superior—Vassal not to sell or retail any kind of malt or spirituous liquors—Property.—In the middle of the last century the proprietor of a large estate commenced to feu ground for building at a particular part of the estate, where in course of time a considerable town sprang up. In the titles of all the feuars was inserted as a real burden the condition that it should not be lawful for the vassals "to sell or retail any kind of malt or spirituous liquors, or to keep victualling or eating-houses" on the subjects, "unless they shall obtain permission in writing to that effect from the superior."

This prohibition was not enforced in any case from the commencement of the feuing down to 1880, and a number of licensed houses of different kinds were opened in the town. In 1880 the superior, having given some months notice to the vassals, proceeded to enforce the prohibition by action of declarator and interdict. His object was the furtherance of his views for the social reform of the district. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark) that the superior was not entitled to enforce the prohibition, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Craighill being of opinion (with the Lord Ordinary) that he had no interest to do so which the law would recognise, and Lord Young, that the prohibition was repugnant to the absolute right of property conferred on a vassal by the nature of his feu-right.

land v. Hislop.

2D DIVISION.

ford Clark.

THE town of Grangemouth is built entirely on the property of the Earl of Zetland. It was commenced in the middle of the last century by Sir Lawrence Dundas, a predecessor of the present Earl, who built a number of dwelling-houses in what is now the centre of the town. These houses still belong to the Earl of Zetland. Since then the town has increased till there are now more than 5000 inhabitants. The whole houses and others in the town not belonging to the Earl of Zetland are held of him as superior.

In the feu-rights granted by the Earl of Zetland and his predecessors of ground in Grangemouth there have regularly been inserted certain conditions having reference, inter alia, to the uses to which the subjects feued were to be put. Thus by feu-disposition dated 27th November 1814 Thomas Lord Dundas feued to James Simpson a certain piece of ground on the south side of Grange Street, Grangemouth, "but always with and under the burdens, conditions, provisions, and irritancies contained in the precept of sasine after inserted." One of the conditions so inserted in the precept of sasine was as follows:—"Secundo, It shall not be lawful for the said James Simpson or his foresaids, or any tenant or possessor of the buildings to be erected on the foresaid piece of ground, to carry on the business of candle-making, coppersmiths, blacksmiths, slaughtering or butchering of cattle, or any other trade, manufacture, or occupation that shall be deemed nauseous, troublesome, or dangerous to the neighbourhood by the superior, or his baron bailie, who shall have power to determine therein, and whose judgment shall be final; nor shall it be lawful for them to build public brewhouses or bakers' ovens in or upon any part of the premises, at least fronting the street, without prejudice always to them to brew or bake within the same for their own private use allenarly; neither shall it be lawful for the said James Simpson or his foresaids, or any tenant or possessor of the said houses, to sell or retail any kind of malt or spirituous liquors, or to keep victualling or eating-houses, unless they shall obtain permission in writing to that effect from the superior."

Subinfeudation was prohibited, and it was declared, septimo, that "the purchasers or disponees of the said piece of ground shall be taken bound by the sellers or disponees to hold the same of me and my foresaids in the terms herein prescribed allenarly." And it was farther "expressly provided and declared that the whole burdens, conditions, provisions, and irritancies above written shall be contained and fully engrossed in the infestments to follow hereon, and in all the subsequent charters, rights, and title-deeds of the said subjects, otherwise the same shall be void and null."

Similar conditions and restrictions were inserted in all feu-rights granted by the Earl of Zetland and his predecessors.

Simpson's feu had come by progress into the hands of John Hislop, the defender in this action, who held the same of the Earl of Zetland as his superior, subject to the whole burdens, conditions, &c. above referred to. Upon these subjects certain buildings had been erected which for some years had been used as a public-house for the sale of malt and spirituous liquors.

The Earl of Zetland having resolved to enforce generally the provision inserted in the feu-rights granted by himself and his predecessors against the sale of malt and spirituous liquors on the subjects feued, in January 1880 issued a notice to the following effect:—"Notice.—Whereas the feu-rights of properties in Grangemouth contain prohibitions against using them as public-houses, dram-shops, &c., or for the sale of malt or spirituous liquors, intimation is hereby given to all concerned that these prohibitions will be put in force on and after 15th May 1880."

This notice was delivered to the defender, and he having refused to comply with the prohibition as required, the Earl of Zetland raised against him this action of declarator and interdict, in which he sought to have it declared that the defender, his tenants, &c. were "not entitled, without the consent of the pursuer, to sell or retail any kind of malt or spirituous liquors" within the buildings erected on his feu, and to have them interdicted "from selling or retailing any kind of malt or spirituous liquors, or allowing the same to be sold or retailed within the said buildings."

Earl of Zetland v. Hislop.

Similar actions were raised against Richard Webster, Peter Carmichael, and Margaret and Jane M'Arthur, proprietors of other public-houses in Grangemouth, and their respective tenants. The action against Hislop was treated as the leading case, and the others were disposed of in conformity with the decision pronounced therein.

The admitted state of facts was that at the date of the action there were in Grangemouth two hotels, seven public-houses, four licensed grocers' shops, and a restaurant. That these had been gradually established without objection on the part of the Earl of Zetland and his predecessors. Some had been established without permission. In other cases, as in that of Hislop, permission had been obtained. In Hislop's case the permission had been given in writing in 1868 to Hislop's predecessor, but under an express "reservation of the right of the said Earl and his successors to enforce the prohibition against the sale of malt and spirituous liquors at any time, and without being bound to assign any reason for so doing." The Earl of Zetland's intention was to enforce the prohibition against all the public-houses, but not against the hotels and licensed grocers. And his avowed object was the furtherance of his own views for the moral and social improvement of the inhabitants.

Hislop stated the preliminary plea that the pursuer had "no title or interest to sue."

The Lord Ordinary, on 4th November 1880, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pursuer has not set forth any interest to sue this action: Therefore dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c. *

The pursuer reclaimed.

After hearing argument the Court allowed the pursuer to amend his summons with the view of averring his interest to insist in the conclusions of the action.

* "NOTE.— . . . In his condescendence the pursuer does not allege any interest which he has to enforce the conditions of the feu-contract. He simply sets forth his title as superior, and his resolution to require the feuars to submit to the restrictions.

"The question has thus arisen, Whether the pursuer has set forth any sufficient interest to sue this action?

"The Lord Ordinary accepts it as law that wherever a feu contains any restriction on property 'the superior or the party in whose favour it is conceived must have an interest to enforce it.' Such is the doctrine laid down in the case of the Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, 1 Rob. App. 307.

"Following this view, the Lord Ordinary does not think that the pursuer can prevail. The action is not brought to secure any patrimonial benefit, or to avoid any patrimonial loss. It is, as the Lord Ordinary was given to understand, the result of a desire to enforce, at the discretion of the pursuer, a restriction which affects the entire town, not for the sake of the pursuer himself, but to secure the well-being of the community. Even this interest is not alleged, but if it were, the Lord Ordinary could not hold it to be sufficient to sustain the action."

No. 125. The pursuer accordingly stated (Cond. 10) . . . "The whole of the rest" (i.e., other than certain houses yielding an annual rental of £750 belonging to the pursuer himself) "of the town is built on ground held of the pursuer as superior, and he still has a large extent of ground in and adjacent to the town available for feuing, including upwards of 140 acres within the burgh boundaries. The pursuer's mansion-house of Kerse is also within half-a-mile of the town, and his policy grounds extend considerably nearer to it." (Cond. 11) "The existence of so many public-houses as there at present are in Grangemouth, including the premises embraced in the summons, and the prevalence of drunkenness thence arising, are detrimental to the value of the pursuer's property above referred to, and seriously interfere with the comfort and well-being of many of his tenants and feuars, besides being prejudicial to the comfort and amenity of his mansion-house and policies."

Argument was then resumed, when

The pursuer argued;—The prohibition in question was not illegal, nor in any way opposed to public policy. It must be admitted that such a prohibition was valid and enforceable against a single feu, for so the Court had determined.¹ If so, then there could be no reason why the feuars in a whole street should not validly be put under the same restriction; and if the feuars in any one street, then the feuars over any larger area, or over the superior's whole estate. The superior's property in his unfeued ground was absolute,² subject only to his refraining from any use of it which would be injurious to his neighbour. If he sold it or feued it out, or gave it away, he might put the purchaser, vassal, or donee under any restriction he chose. If he put his feus under restrictions, he either increased the feu-duty obtainable, or he diminished it according as the restrictions were beneficial to the feuars as a body, or merely detrimental to the individual. But in either case the restriction was taken into account in the price, and formed a material part of the bargain. To allow the vassal to come forward and say, "True, I took the feu subject to the restriction, but no one else wishes the restriction enforced, and it is of no moment to the superior whether it is enforced or not, so I am not bound to comply with it," would simply be to give the vassal what he had not paid for, viz., a subject free from restriction, instead of a subject burdened with a restriction.³ But assuming that the superior must shew a special interest to enforce a restriction to which his vassal had agreed when making his contract, it was sufficient that the superior desired to reduce the means and opportunities of intoxication upon his estate.⁴ Lastly, there was here no question whether the restriction was binding on the defender as a singular successor, because the restriction necessarily, in virtue of the provision to that effect in the original disposition, entered his own title by progress.⁵

Argued for the defender;—(1) The restriction founded on was not made a real burden, and therefore was not binding on the defender as a singular successor in the feu. (2) The pursuer was barred from now enforcing the prohibition by the permission given to the defender's predecessor. On the faith of that permission considerable outlay had been made, and the defender had himself given a price far beyond what the subjects as a mere house would have fetched—a price, in fact, which included the value of the goodwill of an existing public-house business. (3) The prohibition founded on and sought to be enforced had been waived from the very beginning, and was inapplicable to the existing circumstances. Its enforcement now would be contrary to the fair meaning and intention of parties when the feu-contract was entered into. (4) To permit a superior to enforce such a restriction, not against an individual feu or feus, with reference to which, as being near his own house or otherwise peculiarly situated, he might be able to shew special reason for the enforcement, but per aversionem over a whole district, however large, would be contrary to public policy, and would be to allow an individual to legislate for a district, and to interfere with the authority which in this matter the Legislature had reposed in a certain statutory body. (5) The pursuer had shewn no legitimate interest which the Court could recognise; for by "interest" was meant not the fanciful interest of a philanthropist, but the patrimonial interest of a proprietor.

Mar. 18, 1881.
Earl of Zetland v. Hialop

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—The question here is whether a certain condition in a feu-charter is valid, and consequently enforceable according to its terms. The subject of the charter is a small piece of ground in the town of Grangemouth, on which a house now stands, and the condition in question is,—“Neither shall it be lawful for the said James Simpson or his foreshaids, or any tenant or possessor of the said houses, to sell or retail any kind of malt or spirituous liquors, or to keep victualling or eating houses, unless they shall obtain permission in writing to that effect from the superior.”

The question is important as relating to the restrictions which may lawfully be put upon a proprietor with respect to the use of his property. That this is its character is plain, when it is considered that a feu by charter or other deed of conveyance is the highest real property title known in law, and if I dwell on this topic for a little it is not because I apprehend that it may be thought to involve any doubtful matter, but because I think the importance and practical bearing of it has not always been sufficiently attended to in this class of cases.

I repeat, then, that there is no higher title of property than a feu, and add that it is immaterial to the nature and quality of the proprietor's right whether he holds by virtue of an original charter (i.e., the deed by which the feu was created) or of some subsequent progressive or transmissive deed. The name “feuar,” as familiarly and popularly used, is indeed confined, or at least most commonly applied, to small proprietors, as the name “feu” is, in the like popular speech, confined or usually applied to small properties. But this is mere popular speech, convenient enough if taken only for what it means, and not understood as importing any legal distinction in the matter of title between large and small properties. I need not say to your Lordships that there is no such distinction. Feudum, feu, fee, are synonyms, signifying “property,” as distinguished from any inferior title of possession, and it is immaterial to the character and quality of the feuar's (or proprietor's) title, whether the subject of it is half a county or half an acre. The name of the right is, according to the usage of all languages, transferred to the subject of it, and equally applied to both, so that just as houses are called “estates,” or “properties,” so they are called feuda, feus, or

No. 125. fees. Now, all land in this country, whether owned in large or small parcels, is, without reference to the size of the parcels, "holden,"—that is to say, "held" by the proprietor as vassal under a superior. Such is our system of real property title. The Crown is the ultimate superior of all the land of the country, for from the Crown all property in land is assumed to have originally flowed. The simplest case is when the beneficial owner holds immediately of the Crown, but this, though common enough, is not the most common case, for subinfeudation being universally allowable, except when restrained by paction, the greater part of the land of the country is held by the owners immediately of subject superiors. But whether the Crown or a subject be in any case the immediate superior, the beneficial owner is a "feuar," and his property is a feu, held by him as vassal under a superior. This, indeed, is the Earl of Zetland's "status," or condition, with respect to all his property in land on the mainland of Scotland, for I do not speak of Zetland, where a different system prevails, at least partially. All I have said only expresses the fact that the feudal law governs land rights in this country, and that the system admits of no distinction whatever between large and small properties.

I therefore regard the defender as proprietor in fee-simple of his ground with the house on it. I do not use the word "simple" as of any virtue with reference to the question in hand, for it applies only to the destination or succession, signifying that it is simple, i.e., not entailed. That the defender is proprietor in fee is the important matter, and with reference to that fact the validity of the condition in question must be judged of.

Now, it is clear law that land may be burdened with any known servitude, or (if that expression should be thought too limited as not admitting the possibility of a good servitude which has not hitherto occurred and been sanctioned) any lawful servitude, and that the burden will run with the land into whose hands soever it may pass. But it is, I think, material to notice this important feature of every lawful servitude that it must be beneficial to some dominant tenement, not necessarily in fact at any particular time, but capable from its nature of being so, and therefore by the fact of its existence adding more or less to the value of the dominant tenement. The servitude de non ædificando is the most familiar example.

The case of land parcelled off for building according to a plan with reference to which the lots are sold to several purchasers, is peculiar. It has been held that thus, or by the terms of the individual titles flowing from a common superior of contiguous building areas in a street or square a community may be established among the vassals, so that each shall have a legitimate interest in, and therefore legal title to enforce, the restrictions put upon, or obligations undertaken by every other. Wherever it is clear that the parties so intended, and that the feus were taken in reliance on the accomplishment of such intention, I do not doubt that the Court will enforce it. I think, and have at least respectable authority with me, that the principles of the law of servitude are sufficient to support the decisions on this subject, but others think otherwise, and it is unnecessary now to dwell on the subject.

But the power of putting upon land a special and exceptional law to which it shall be subject for ever, or at least so long as some one, not the proprietor for the time, may please to maintain it, is certainly limited. The law, following, I believe, prevailing public opinion, favours property and proprietary rights as being, although occasionally abused, on the whole greatly beneficial to the community. Accordingly, the general rule is, that conditions or limitations in a property title which are repugnant to the common legal notion of property and proprietary rights, shall be deemed invalid. Thus, conditions against selling and alienating, burdening with debt and altering the succession, are all bad, for these are common law incidents of property, and, at common law, inseparable from it. I need hardly say that entails prohibiting these things are bad at common law and stand only on statute, and within strictly regulated limits. No. 125.

Mar. 18, 1881.
Earl of Zetland v. Hialop.

The condition here is that spirits and beer and provisions shall not be sold on the property. Now, is this repugnant or not to a right of property? I think it is, and the notion that it is not has, I think, no support by analogy from cases of servitudes or building conditions and restrictions among a community of feuars in a street or square, the general rules and limits of which I have endeavoured to point out, as I understand them. If I could think otherwise I should, I own, have much difficulty in drawing the line at spirits, beer, and provisions, and in finding a satisfactory reason for declining to recognise a prohibition against selling any other commodities, or even against consuming them. I can, indeed, see a distinction when I regard a seller (whether a superior or not) with reference to views of social science, which are certainly respectable and may be sound, but I see none in law. The law imposes restrictions on the sale of intoxicating drinks, and to some extent of provisions also. These I must respect and enforce, but what right has Lord Zetland to increase them beyond the limits of his own property? Within these limits he may prohibit intoxicating drinks and many other things in the exercise of his proprietary rights. To retain this power, however, he must retain his property. Should he sell it, although to be held of himself as superior, he could not, I think, by condition, impose on his purchaser the rules of conduct which he approved and had himself followed, and I can find no ground for distinguishing in this matter between a sale of the whole and of a part. It was suggested by way of illustration that a man might have a legitimate interest to prevent a house in a corner of his park from being turned into an alehouse or whisky shop, and so might effectually restrain a purchaser from him accordingly. I see the interest, just as I see an interest to prevent a poacher with dogs and a number of dirty children from taking up his residence in a house standing in a corner of a park, and I allow it to be a good reason why the owner of the park should not part with the property of the house. I am, however, unable to assent to the inference that a title of property may be legally and validly qualified by a condition against poaching or keeping dogs or dirty children. A condition against the sale (or use, for I see no distinction) of drink or provisions is, in my opinion, of the same character in a legal view.

I hardly know whether it is favourable or the reverse to the condition in question, that it prohibits certain lawful acts not absolutely, but without the leave and licence of the superior, or, in other words, of the former owner who sold subject to the condition. The true view, probably, is that this peculiarity makes no difference, it being clear that the prohibition, though ever so absolute, might have been permanently removed, or temporarily suspended by the party in whose favour it was imposed. Still it illustrates the pursuer's contention which is, that a seller of land which he conveys with a de me holding (I put it so that I may not be supposed to overlook the existence of the feudal relation, though I myself think it is immaterial) may reserve to himself and his heirs for ever a right to control the buyer in his otherwise lawful, domestic, or business

No. 125. arrangements, licensing them or not as he pleases, and on such terms as he pleases. I think this is an extravagant contention, and altogether repugnant to property. I have said that I think the existence of the feudal relation of superior and vassal is immaterial to the question in hand, and, indeed, the purpose of my introductory remarks on our feudal system of titles was to explain why I think so. The relation is part of our real property law, so that no property can be had in land without it. It exists with respect to the pursuer himself, for he holds his lands, however extensive they may be, as a vassal under a superior, the Crown, or the subject proprietor from whom his ancestor bought, as it happens, according to the paction they made for an a me or de me holding. I do not wish to venture on a proposition unnecessarily large for the case before me, but I may state as my present impression, that, apart from feudal incidents, which are not hujus loci, it is immaterial to the validity or invalidity of a burden imposed on land by condition in the title whether the holding is a me or de me of the granter of the conveyance containing the condition. If it is lawful, and not repugnant to property, it shall have effect in either case, and otherwise in neither.

I am therefore for affirming the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, not, indeed, because assuming the condition to be lawful, the pursuer has no interest to enforce it, but because I think it is repugnant to the right of property granted by the deed that contains it. Were it lawful, the pursuer has an obvious interest in it, apart altogether from his social views. For he might exact an annual payment for a license or sell a discharge of the burden. I apprehend the Lord Ordinary's meaning is that this is not a legitimate interest in such a matter, and in this I agree. But I think so, on the grounds which I expressed at the outset in noticing the burdens which may legitimately be put on land. A prohibition of building which was not defensible on the law of servitude as being (or capable of being) beneficial to an adjacent dominant tenement could not, in my opinion, be sustained by the consideration that the creditor therein might, if it were good, sell a release from it for a large sum. This stands on the law of property, and the rules which prescribe the limits within which owners may be restrained in the exercise of their proprietary rights. The pursuer here has interest enough to support any lawful right; indeed he has the most ordinary of all interests, viz., a pecuniary interest; but the right which he claims is in my opinion bad, as repugnant to the property title of the defender, and involving an illegitimate interference with his proprietary rights. A man may contract himself out of any or all of his rights as a proprietor, but to subject land—no matter of what extent—or even a house, to a special and exceptional law, so that the property of it shall not be attended with the ordinary legal incidents of property, is contrary to the policy of the law. I need hardly say that the proprietor of a house or land may by lease give such right of possession and use as he pleases, prescribing some uses and prohibiting others. The lessor remains the proprietor, which a seller does not, though he may have conveyed the property with a de me holding, i.e., so that the buyer holds it of him as superior. His infeftment, indeed, stands to the effect of supporting the superiority; but the property is gone from him and passed to another with all the rights which the law deems to be inseparable from it, and which it is for the interest of the community should be so. I desire to rest my judgment on this view of the law rather than on the narrower ground that the pursuer has no interest, which, indeed, I can only assent to with reference to the rules of law which determine the kind of interest necessary to support a servitude, viz., the possession of a dominant tenement which thereby is or may be benefited. I think, in short, that the condition is such that a legal interest in it cannot exist, not that it may or not as it happens, and that the condition shall have effect or not accordingly. Thinking so, I am of opinion that the invalidity of the condition itself is the right ground of judgment.

Earl of Zet-land v. Hialop.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—The fundamental plea on which issue has been joined in this action is, Has the pursuer an interest to insist in this action?

The conclusion to which the Lord Ordinary came was that the condition in question is not one which the pursuer has an interest to enforce against his vassals, and the action, therefore, has been dismissed. I concur in this judgment.

That a superior in giving out a feu may, by the recognised rules of the feudal system, retain important rights in the subject of the grant, and may impose burdens and restrictions upon it, has not been and cannot be disputed. The question is, whether the condition in question is such a restriction? Vexatious and capricious conditions cannot be enforced, nor can a restriction upon property be sustained unless the superior or the party in whose favour it is conceived have an interest to enforce it. This, as the Lord Ordinary points out, is a statement of the law which was given in the opinion prepared by Lord Corehouse and concurred in by the other Judges in the case of Tailors of Aberdeen v. Coutts, 1 Robinson, p. 296, and it is consistent with all the authorities. The pursuer does not contend that the law thus laid down is not the rule of the law of Scotland. On the contrary, he admits that there must be an interest, and his case is that he has the necessary interest. In considering the merits of this controversy, the condition of the argument is, that the dominium utile of the feu becomes the property of the vassal. A superior, therefore, in imposing burdens or conditions upon the estate of his vassal imposes conditions upon the property of another. No doubt the radical right remains with the superior; but the estate of the vassal nevertheless is his own, and, unless so far as effectual stipulation has been made to the contrary, the superior may not interfere with the use which the vassal takes of his property. Analogies, therefore, drawn from restrictions placed by the landlord upon the use of his property by a tenant to whom he has let it can have no application; for a man may, as has truly been said, do as he likes with his own, but he is not entitled in ordinary circumstances to interfere with the use of property belonging to another. It does not appear to me to be necessary to define what are the interests belonging to the superior, which may be protected by a clause like that in the charters granted by the predecessors of the pursuer. Were it necessary I should be disposed to hold that the interest in question must be possessed by the party enforcing it in the character of superior; or, in other words, they must be interests of a proper patrimonial nature. This is the language used by Mr Duff in his work on Feudal Conveyancing, p. 74. All, however, which is necessary to be said on the present occasion is that any interest put forward by a superior, which is not greater than, nor different from, an interest possessed by any member of the community, is not an interest which can be created a real burden upon the estate of the vassal. All are interested in the good order of a community, and all are naturally desirous that nothing by which this may be disturbed should be sanctioned. But men's views differ as to the way in

No. 125. which results admitted to be desirable can best be obtained, and if feu-charters were to be made the vehicles by which opinions on social questions were to be carried out confusion would be the inevitable result. Were the doctrine contended for by the pursuer to be sanctioned any man selling a house might subject the property to the burden which the predecessors of the pursuer have endeavoured to impose upon their vassals. A seller of a property has in any social question the same interest as he would have supposing he were a superior giving a feu of the property. This consideration of itself seems to me to shew that an interest entitling the superior to enforce such a condition as that in question must be an interest of a different character from that which is possessed by the pursuer. The authorities cited in the course of the argument seem to me in most cases to point to and in all cases to be consistent with this conclusion. In the case of Brown it was found that there must be an interest, and in the other cases this was assumed. The apparently adverse decision in the case of Ewing v. Campbell is not in reality a hostile authority. There the only question which was raised was a question of construction whether a hydro-pathic establishment was in the sense of the clause of restriction a public-house. There was no controversy as to the enforceability of the condition, the reason being that the estate from which the ground feued was given off was an entailed estate; that the ground was feued in virtue of 31 and 32 Vict. cap. 84, under the conditions approved of by the Sheriff; that the clause in question expressed a condition approved of by the Sheriff; and consequently that the condition there came to be of statutory authority.

On the whole, therefore, and without difficulty, I concur in the judgment against which the pursuer has reclaimed.

I may add that, had it been necessary I should have been disposed to hold that the clause of restriction in the charters founded on by the pursuer was invalid, not merely upon the ground that the superior had no interest, but also on the ground that the restriction was void, as being a restriction upon trade, and also as being inconsistent with public policy. These last considerations, however, are not required to be taken into account on the present occasion, and I mention them only because the mention of them is expedient to shew that they have not been disregarded.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I cannot say that I have found this case unattended with difficulty, not so much as to the conclusion which ought to be reached, as to the precise legal grounds on which that conclusion ought to be supported. We have here four conjoined actions in which, although the facts vary in details, substantially the same questions arise. The defenders in this case are feuars in Grangemouth. Under their rights they all hold of the pursuer as superior of the territory upon which the town of Grangemouth is built. Each of those rights contains the same or corresponding prohibitions, and, in particular, in each the feuar is taken bound not to use any building erected on the feu as a public-house, or as a house for eating or refreshment. I do not state the exact words, but that is the substance of the provision. The question now raised is whether the superior can enforce this condition against these feuars, who are singular successors.

Taking these feu-rights singly, and on their terms, I am of opinion that there is nothing in these conditions which might not be enforced by the superior, or which are in themselves incapable of transmitting against a singular successor.

It is not necessary to enlarge on the general rules of our jurisprudence on this head, for they are too well fixed to be the subject of controversy. The nature of a feu-right is surely matter too elementary to admit of doubt. It is a subinfeudation granted mediately or immediately by or from a crown-vassal. The superior remains the owner, burdened by the feu-right; but the dominium utile, as opposed to the dominium directum, is transferred to the sub-vassal. The superior's right over the property is not and cannot be in any respect one of servitude. His power to introduce such stipulations into the rights of his feuars, and his title to enforce them, depends solely upon his supereminent right in the land, constituted by his own infeftment. The nature and effect of restrictive conditions such as the present contained in grants of the feu was exhaustively considered and explained in Lord Corehouse's opinion in the case of the Tailors of Aberdeen, in which the whole Court substantially concurred, which not only places the true doctrine on this head beyond dispute, but supercedes the necessity of any further exposition. When feuars of the same superior endeavour to enforce such restrictions against each other their jus quesitum has more analogy to servitude, but as between superior and vassal servitude is in no sense the foundation of the right. The incidents of a right of servitude are inconsistent with the relation of superior and vassal.

Earl of Zetland v. Hislop.

True, the superior, before he can enforce such stipulations, must have a legal interest to do so. He has always a legal title, but the Court will not allow him to put such stipulations in force, if it be shewn that he has no interest,—that is, if he be trying to enforce an obligation the fulfilment of which can be of no benefit to himself (it is said patrimonial benefit, and I do not differ), and if it be therefore insisted in emulously, capriciously, or oppressively. This, however, is a consideration applicable to the circumstances in which the superior attempts to put the clause in force more than to the nature of the condition. The superior has always a title to bind his vassal and his successors, provided the restriction enter the record, unless the stipulation is illegal, or contrary to public policy, or is in itself incapable of being enforced.

Further, were this a case of a single feu I am of opinion that this particular condition is not illegal, and is capable of being enforced. This was asserted and assumed in the Dunoon case (Ewing v. Campbell), and the decision is directly in point, and, to my mind, conclusive.

I was surprised to hear it doubted that the case was a direct decision that a clause to the effect of the present was a legal and enforceable stipulation, seeing one of this nature was not only sanctioned but enforced in it.

The question raised in that case was whether a prohibition against using a feu for the purpose of a public-house was contravened by building and keeping a hydropathic establishment. The law was assumed to be so clear that even the party impugning the condition did not venture to say that it was not legal in itself or inconsistent with the rights of property, but rested his whole case, as the Court did its judgment, on the question whether the building in question came to be within the prohibition. I look upon that case as being all the stronger that the general law was not controverted. It was simply the last of a long series of adjudicated cases on cognate conditions, and its application is clear. The practical dispute whether the hydropathic establishment was a public-house could never have arisen unless the condition was in itself effectual. All these matters are trite law, and, in my opinion, do not admit of doubt. There is, however, one peculiarity in the present case, and it is one not without significance, namely, that the superior reserves

No. 125. right to waive the condition, and this shews that the other feuars have no power separately to enforce it against each other. This is material, because it has a bearing on the nature of the interest involved in the right.

Mar. 18, 1881.
Earl of Zetland v. Hialop.

In my view, however, the present case ought to be resolved on other grounds. The practical question is, Whether the pursuer is entitled to enforce these stipulations for the purpose of regulating the social condition of a community amounting to 5000 inhabitants, and in fact incorporated under the police statutes and under a municipal management of its own? It is plain enough that the more the operation of these restrictions extends the more the superior's interest recedes from a real patrimonial character, and necessarily approaches the confines of effects which are at war with important social and public interests. In certain circumstances and within certain limits such prohibitions as this regarding the use to which premises are to be put are intended to protect direct patrimonial rights. In particular quarters of large towns, in which the value of premises depends on the use to which they are put, such restrictions often have a direct effect of enhancing the value of property in the neighbourhood. So a man may reasonably provide in feuing a piece of ground at the corner of his park that it shall not be used as a public-house. No one ever supposed such a condition to be contrary to the principles of property according to our law; it is entirely in conformity with it, according to rules followed in a long series of authorities. But when one dwelling-house is multiplied into 1000, and 5000 persons are interested instead of one, the matter becomes very different. As the public interests grow larger the individual interest necessarily grows less. Here I think it has disappeared altogether, and instead of reflecting the patrimonial interest of the superior, represents only individual opinions, philanthropic and social on his part. On the merits of these views, of course, I say nothing, except that I have quite as much respect for those holding one set of views as for those holding the other. Our opinion on such matters is of no more value, in no respect better, than that of the parties in the case; but I think it is quite clear that we are now asked to enforce this restriction, not for the protection of any property right in the pursuer, but in order to benefit the moral and social well-being of the community of Grangemouth. But this is to enable the pursuer to use his power as superior for the purposes of a benevolent despotism, leading directly to collision with the municipal authorities on the one hand, and in effect putting it in the superior's power to create a trade monopoly on the other. Now, I think we are not bound to give effect to this clause, looking to the admitted object and the necessary result of doing so. Lord Corehouse, in the following passages in his opinion in the case of Coutts, expresses the ground of my opinion in the present:—"Thus," he says, "it was often a condition in a feu-charter that the vassal should bring all his malt to the superior's brewery to be made into ale, and to have all his iron-work manufactured at the superior's smiddy. These conditions have fallen into desuetude, but they have never been declared illegal by statute. The Court, however, at present refuses to enforce them, as being inconsistent with public policy, for it would be a plain injury to the community if the proprietor of a piece of land could not employ the brewer or the smith whose work he most approved"—(1 Rob. App. 318). Here circumstances have proved too strong for the superior, and the community which he and his predecessors have helped to create has outgrown bonds which might have been reasonable or useful when first imposed, but which are unsuited times.

I have only to say, in conclusion, that I reserve my opinion on the question whether such clauses would be effectual under a long lease. If the term were equivalent to a perpetuity the same result would probably follow.

CITY OF GLASGOW UNION RAILWAY COMPANY, Defenders.—Trayner—Pearson. Mar. 18, 1881.
Hall v. City of Glasgow Union Railway Co.

Railway—Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. 19), sec. 127—Deficiency of Poor's-rate, caused by lands being taken, to be made good—Poor.—The 127th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, enacts that the promoters of an undertaking shall make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land-tax and poor's-rate and prison assessment, which may occur during the progress of their works, in respect of lands taken for the purposes of their undertaking.

Held that in determining whether or not such deficiency exists in the assessment for poor's-rate in a particular parish, the company's undertaking, so far as within such parish, is to be regarded as a whole, and that whenever such undertaking as a whole affords an assessable value as great as or greater than the subjects taken afforded at the date of the company's special Act, there is, within the meaning of the 127th section, no deficiency to be made good, though certain particular parts of the subjects may still have no assessable value, the works being incomplete, or the land being superfluous land, and vacant.

THE CITY OF GLASGOW UNION RAILWAY COMPANY was incorporated in the year 1864 by the Act 27 and 28 Vict. c. cclxxxvi., and authorised to make certain railways. The lands and others acquired for and in connection with three of these railways or parts thereof, viz., Nos. 1, 6, and 7 in the Act described, lay within the City Parish of Glasgow, and were, at the various dates when so acquired, liable to assessment for the relief of the poor in the said City Parish. A considerable portion of the subjects so acquired were not used for the actual construction of railways and stations, but were either surplus lands, or to be used in the formation of substitute streets, as required by the Act.

While the company's works were in course of construction various annual sums were paid by the company to the collector of poor-rates of the City Parish in respect of deficiency of poor's-rate, under the 127th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845,* which was incorporated in the company's special Act. The railway No. 1 was completed and assessed for poor's-rate in 1876, and the railway No. 6 was completed in

* The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, sec. 127, provides : —“That if the promoters of the undertaking become possessed, by virtue of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, of any lands charged with the land-tax, or liable to be assessed with the poor's-rate or prison-assessment, they shall from time to time, until the works shall be completed and assessed to such land-tax and poor's-rate and prison-assessment, be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land-tax and poor's-rate and prison-assessment, by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the work ; and such deficiency shall be computed according to the rental at which such lands, with any building thereon, were valued or rated at the time of the passing of the special Act ; and on demand of such deficiency, the promoters of the undertaking, or their treasurer, shall pay all such deficiencies to the collector of the said assessments respectively.”

No. 126. 1878, and assessed for poor's-rate in 1879-80. The railway No. 7 was abandoned. In 1878-79 and 1879-80 the company were still ostensible proprietors of the surplus land above-mentioned, and the land to be devoted to substitute streets, and a considerable portion of it was lying vacant, having no assessable rental. A claim was made upon them, and action raised at the instance of the collector of poor's-rate for the City Parish for deficiency of poor's-rate in respect of the subjects so lying vacant of £11, 8s. 8d. for the year 1878-79, and of £146, 15s. for the year 1879-80, in all, £158, 3s. 8d.

Hall v. City
of Glasgow
Union Rail-
way Co.

The company admitted the claim for the year 1878-79, and also that for the year 1879-80 to a small extent, but resisted the remainder of the claim for the latter year, on various special grounds, and, in particular, that, though they were ex facie of the records still ostensibly proprietors, they had parted with the ground partly to the corporation of Glasgow and partly to the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, by concluded agreements, and had given possession prior to the year of assessment.

The Lord Ordinary virtually gave effect to this defence, except as to a small part of the claim.

The pursuer reclaimed.¹

After hearing argument, by order of the Court the following information was furnished by the parties in a joint minute:—"1st, That the cumulo valuation of the properties (so far as within the City Parish) from time to time acquired and demolished for the purposes of the defenders' undertaking, was, at the date of the passing of the special Act, about £35,500. 2d, That the valuation of the defenders' railway and stations (so far as within the City Parish), conform to valuation by the assessor of railways and canals, was for the assessing year 1879-80, £31,234. 3d, That the cumulo valuations upon which defenders paid assessments, including the rent of the hotel, shops, and arches, all erected upon the solum of the subjects specified in article 1, was for the year 1879-80 £46,000.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action at the instance of the collector of assessment for the relief of the poor of the City Parish of Glasgow against the City of Glasgow Union Railway Company. It is founded upon clause 127 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, which is incorporated in the defenders' private Act of 1864. That clause of the general Act makes provision for the case of a deficiency in the poor's-rate of a parish arising in consequence of such a party as the present defenders taking land therein for the purposes of their undertaking. The pursuer here says that in the two years 1878-79 and 1879-80 there had thus arisen a deficiency, caused by the defenders taking land in the City Parish, to the amount of £158, 3s. 8d. The parties have come to an agreement as to the former year, the defenders acknowledging that they are due certain sums, which accordingly are decerned for by the Lord Ordinary, but the parties are in conflict as to whether or no there is a deficiency such as the clause of the general Act founded upon provides for in the year 1879-80.

In order to enable us more satisfactorily to determine this in reviewing the Lord Ordinary's judgment on the subject we required the parties to state in a minute how the assessment for the poor in the parish stood upon the whole property taken by the defenders at the time of their taking it, and how that assessment stands now. The minute informs us, both parties agreeing, that the assessable value at the time when the properties were taken amounted to the sum of £35,500, and that for the year 1879-80, being the year—and, as I have said, the only year—with respect to which there is any dispute, it had reached a sum of £46,000. Prima facie there is here no deficiency, for comparing the two periods there is an excess of assessable value in the latter year of about £10,000.

No. 126.
Mar. 18, 1881.
Hall v. City of Glasgow
Union Railway Co.

But it is said that nevertheless there is a deficiency within the meaning of the clause. I may observe, before adverting particularly to the clause, that this is said to be so by taking, not the actual property in the lump acquired by the railway company for the purposes of their undertaking in the parish in question, but by taking individual houses or plots of building ground. It is maintained that you can pick out of the whole property acquired and taken in the parish for the purposes of the undertaking certain houses or ground now vacant, but at the time of the taking occupied by houses, and that if you confine your attention to these alone there is a deficiency, the excess arising upon other parts of the subjects taken.

I am of opinion—and I may state it before proceeding to express my opinion more particularly upon the terms of the clause—that the undertaking of the defenders is to be regarded as one undertaking. Like every other undertaking of the kind it consists of various parts. There are many things to be done in the accomplishment of it. The company have to make the line—frequently to make branch lines, sidings, stations, accommodation roads—but the land taken for these purposes is land taken for the purposes of the undertaking; and I think the land taken by this railway company within the parish in question—for there is only one parish in question—is all land taken for the purposes of their undertaking.

Now, I refer to the clause, which is stated at length in Cond. 7—"If the promoters of the undertaking become possessed, by virtue of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, of any lands charged with the land-tax or liable to be assessed to the poor's-rate or prison assessment, they shall from time to time, until the works shall be completed and assessed to such land-tax, and poor's-rate, and prison assessment, be liable to make good the deficiency in the several assessments for land-tax, and poor's-rate, and prison assessment, by reason of such lands having been taken or used for the purposes of the work; and such deficiency shall be computed according to the rental at which such lands, with any building thereon, were valued or rated at the time of the passing of the special Act." Now, I think it strikes one at first sight that this is a provision to guard those who are interested—in the present case the poor-law authorities—against any loss of assessable subjects, or of assessment in respect of the diminished value of the assessable subjects prior to the time of these becoming again assessable after the completion of the works thereon—of their coming into the state into which it is intended they shall be finally put. When they come into that condition the assessment must be according to the actual value, whether that be more or less—I suppose the case has never occurred of land or property acquired in the manner referred to in this case being, when the works were executed, of less assessable value than it was before; but if that should happen there is no provision for any deficiency being made good. But prior to

No. 126.

Hall v. City of Glasgow
Union Rail-

the completion of the works, if there be a deficiency—and necessarily only if there be a deficiency—the company shall make it good. I say “necessarily,” because if there is no deficiency there is nothing to make good. Now, here, in the view which I take, there was no deficiency for the year in question, for I think it is clear in principle, and stands upon the only authority on the subject to which we were referred—the Thames Embankment case—that the increased revenue by any buildings erected upon any part of the property taken is to be taken into account in estimating whether there is a deficiency or not. And indeed the results of any contrary rule appear extravagant, from the statement of them. It was not intended to make a gift—to bestow a boon—at the expense of the railway company upon the poor-law authorities or collectors of the land-tax or prison-rates; but merely to provide for making good any deficiency. You are to take the assessable rental, for the purposes of these rates, of the property acquired by the company for its undertaking at the date of the acquisition; and if, taking the rental—that is, the assessable value—during the period that the works are in progress, there is a deficiency, that shall be made good as a personal claim—the railway company shall make it good. But if there is no deficiency—if these subjects, taken as a whole, afford as great or a greater assessable rental than they did at the time of the taking, then there is within the meaning of this clause, in my opinion, no deficiency to make good.

Now, that is the case here, upon the statement which we have in the minute, and therefore I am of opinion that, except in so far as the defenders have admitted their liability as applicable to the year 1878-79, this action is not well founded, and the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied, and that without any reference to the particular views on which the Lord Ordinary has proceeded in regard to land rating. It is really not doubtful, and I have not adverted to the subject—I did not think it necessary to advert to it—that the assessable value of the station, and of the shops under the arches, and so on, constructed upon the property taken by the defenders, must be taken into account in considering whether there be a deficiency or no.

My opinion is that the defenders, except in so far as they have admitted liability, are entitled to be assoilzied.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am of the same opinion, and I think the case a very clear one upon the facts as these are ultimately before the Court.

Apart from the statutory provision contained in section 127 of the Lands Clauses Act, the railway company would have been dealt with as regards assessment just as other owners of property. The houses or lands taken by them would be taken year by year at that which was their value at the time, but as it was probable that if this were the rule that was to be applied to undertakings such as the defenders' undertaking, there would for a period of years be some loss to the parish, it was thought expedient that provision should be made against such loss being incurred, and accordingly this clause, which is the foundation of the pursuer's claim, was introduced into the statute referred to. But the purpose of that provision was exclusively, as I think, to prevent loss, and it cannot reasonably be construed in such a way as to make it a source of gain to the parish and a source of loss to the railway company. It appears to me that once lands are taken they are to be looked upon as having been taken for the purposes of the undertaking, and up to the time when the assessable value of the undertaking shall reach the original value of the property that has been taken for those purposes the value of the subjects taken as they appear in the year in which the Act was passed is to be the rule by which the rights of the parochial authorities are to be determined.

Now, it appears that of the properties in question here, while many of them have been turned to account, there are still some whose yearly value is less than the value at which those properties appear in the valuation-roll of 1864. If the question is to be determined simply with reference to these properties, whether or not there is a deficiency, of course the answer must be that there is a deficiency. But we are not to ask that question with reference to each property separately. We are to ask the question with reference to all the properties taken for the purposes of the undertaking. And once we find that the assessable value of the works, so far as completed, and as now subject to assessment, is greater than was the value at the period the properties were taken, then I think the case for which the Act of Parliament made provision no longer exists, because the case for which this clause was passed was the existence of a deficiency, and it was not intended to be applicable to any case where the deficiency had been supplied. Now, the deficiency here has been supplied, is far more than supplied, and therefore I agree with Lord Young that except to the extent to which the defenders have admitted their liability they are entitled to be assoilzied.

Public Company—Reduction of Capital—Companies Act, 1867, secs. 9 to 20—Companies Act, 1877, secs. 3 and 4—Procedure.—The New Zealand and Australian Land Company was formed by the amalgamation of two previously-existing companies, and was incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, with a capital of £2,500,000. Soon after its incorporation it was found advisable upon inquiry to reduce the valuation of the estates held by it in New Zealand and Australia by £250,000, the result of which was that the nominal capital was larger than actually existed in assets. A petition was subsequently brought, founding upon the Companies Acts, 1867, secs. 9 to 20, and 1877, secs. 3 and 4, asking the Court to pronounce an order confirming a reduction of capital by £250,000, to approve of the draft minute proposed to be registered in pursuance of the above sections, to authorise the registration of both, and further, to dispense with the words "and reduced" as part of the name of the company. It was stated that the shares were all fully paid up, and that the reduction proposed was unrepresented by available assets, and did not involve the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital or the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital.

1st DIVISION.
Lord Adam.
B.

JOHN HENRY, S.S.C., brought this action against David Alexander Morrison, concluding that the latter, who had been a clerk in his office, should be ordained “to deliver up to the pursuer the following I O U’s, granted, or bearing to be granted, by David Andrew Scott, and initialed D. A. S.”—[Here followed a specific list of the documents, fifteen in number, and representing in toto the sum of £16, 18s. 6d.] There was no other conclusion, except for expenses.

The defender pleaded that the action was incompetent, the sum concluded for being under £25.

The Lord Ordinary repelled the plea.*

* “NOTE.—The first question in this case is, whether the action is incompetent under the 28th section of 50 Geo. III, cap. 112, in respect that its value does not exceed £25.

“It lies upon the defender, who seeks to oust the jurisdiction of the Court, to prove the affirmative of that proposition, and in order to do so he cannot travel beyond the record in the action, and, it may be, not beyond the conclusions.

“The action is an action for delivery of fifteen I O U’s of small amount, amounting in all to £16, 18s. 6d. There are no pecuniary conclusions.

“The action is therefore purely an action ad factum præstandum, and is brought by the pursuer for the purpose of recovering possession of certain articles, iz., I O U’s, which he alleges are his property. It is said, however, that it

The defender reclaimed upon leave being given.¹

No. 128.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I cannot say that I participate in the Lord Ordinary's doubts on the question raised here. I think the case is a very clear one. It is an action ad factum præstandum; there is no pecuniary conclusion, and it is quite impossible for the Court to estimate what is the real value of the cause. It may far exceed the amount in value of the I O U's, delivery of which is sought, and the object of obtaining possession of these vouchers may be something very different from the recovery of the money. The object, for instance, might be to vindicate the pursuer's character in another action, or to prove the forgery of these or other writings. There are many uses for which documents of this kind may be of great value which the pursuer is not bound to disclose. If he instructs that they are his property he is entitled to delivery of them, and it does not matter what the value of them may be. Looking to all the authorities, I am of opinion that this action is not open to the objection of incompetency.

Mar. 19, 1881.
Henry v. Morrison.

LORD DEAS.—It was for a long time a vexed question how the jurisdiction of this Court in causes falling under these statutes fell to be ascertained. I hold it to be now settled that the party objecting to the jurisdiction must shew, if not on the face of the summons, at least on the face of the summons and record taken together, that the value is under £25. If he fails to shew that, the jurisdiction must be sustained. If we were to go back upon that rule we should be unsettling what has been settled after a great deal of litigation. If that view be correct I think there is an end to this case. There is nothing in the summons, or in the summons and record taken together, to shew that the value is below appears ex facie of the articles sought to be recovered that their value is under £25, and that therefore that action is incompetent.

"The Lord Ordinary thinks that the question is a delicate one, but he thinks that the action is competent.

"It is clear on the authorities that where the action is solely for delivery of an article of property, it does not matter, as regards the competency of the action, how trivial the value of the article may be, and such an action only becomes incompetent where the pursuer himself estimates the pecuniary value to him of the article, and therefore of the action, by inserting an alternative pecuniary conclusion shewing that the value of the action is under £25.

"In this case there are no pecuniary conclusions, and it does not appear to the Lord Ordinary necessarily to follow that the value of the I O U's to the pursuer is simply the pecuniary value which they represent. It is clear enough that the action is not brought in respect of the pecuniary value of the I O U's to the pursuer, but for the purpose of aiding his partner, Mr Scott, in his defence to the action raised against him in the Sheriff Court by the present defender. That may or may not be a legitimate object, but it may give them a value in the pursuer's estimation much beyond the sum of £16, 18s. 6d. which they represent. It is not difficult to imagine a case brought for the recovery of certain pieces of the current coin of the realm which would be by no means met by the tender of coins of equal value. A pursuer may have a pretium affectionis even for a crooked sixpence, and if he can shew it is his property, wrongfully withheld from him, he is entitled to recover it. The Lord Ordinary therefore thinks that this action is not incompetent.—Purves v. Brock, 5 Macph. 1003, 9th July 1867; Shotts Iron Company v. Kerr, Dec. 6, 1871, 10 Macph. 195; *Aberdeen v. We do not require to determine particular questions which are not before us, but at present I am not prepared to find that an action for delivery of a "crooked bawbee" may not be competent in this Court. The bawbee may have a great value, which is not apparent. It may, for instance, be a pledge of a private marriage left in the possession of one of the parties. The thing sued for may have a value to the pursuer far beyond its market value. I think the rule is quite settled, and I see no room for doubt in the matter.

2D DIVISION. (SEQUEL of case reported May 30, 1843, 5 D. 1083, and Dec. 3, 1852,
 M. 15 D. 173.)

By the former of these decisions the Court determined that Mrs Isabella Anne Campbell took only a liferent of the estate of Leckuary, in Argyllshire, under the settlement of her father, Charles Campbell, of Leckuary, who died in 1808; and by the latter that, though her issue took by implication the fee of the estate, they did so subject to the condition of their surviving their mother. Whether the issue would, in that event, take a joint pro indiviso fee, or would take successively, as their mother's heirs in heritage, according to the ordinary rules of law, was left by the Court undetermined. Mrs Campbell having died in 1880, this question was presented to the Court in a special case for Mrs Campbell's eldest son, Colin Ward Campbell, and for Neil Campbell and others, her younger children.

The Court, without determining the general effect of the words "lawful issue of her body" occurring in a deed of settlement of heritage, held, in conformity with the opinion expressed in 1852 by Lord Rutherford, Ordinary (15 D. 176), and by Lord Wood in the Inner-House (15 D. 185), that in the particular deed the context shewed that they were to be construed as equivalent to "heirs of her body," and, by implication, destined the estate to Mrs Campbell's children, "as they should successively take as heirs of their parent in heritage," according to the ordinary rules of law.

The clauses of the trust-disposition and settlement under which the question arose will be found at 15 D. 174.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this note objection is taken to the Auditor's report of taxation in respect of three items, the question, however, being just this, whether a certain fee was properly sent on February 17th. The state of facts is simply this—The case was called in the afternoon, and after a very short beginning of an opening speech on the part of the appellant the cause was continued. When the case again came on for hearing a fee of £2, 2s. was sent as a refresher, and the question is, whether this fee was properly disallowed. It was stated to us that this fee was sent and charged in accordance with precedent and invariable custom. Now, we have communicated with the Auditor, and have ascertained that there is no such custom. On the contrary, the practice is, that if a cause is discussed on more days than one, and a greater amount of time, attention, and trouble is required of counsel than fall fairly within the original fee, then a refresher is allowed, but under no other circumstances. The mere fact that a case has extended over more than one day is no reason why an additional fee should be sent.

Sheriff—Appeal—Competency—Value of the cause—Statute 16 and 17 Vict., c. 80 (Sheriff Court Act, 1853), sec. 22.—A summary petition in a Sheriff Court craved, an order against the defender for delivery of a machine, and failing delivery within a specified time to be fixed by the Court, decree for payment of "£6, 10s. as the value of the said machine."

Held that as the prayer of the petition shewed that the value of the cause did not exceed £25 it was not competent to appeal the case to the Court of Session.

THIS was a petition in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeenshire by the Singer Manufacturing Company against John Jessiman, Aberdeen. The conclusions were,—“To ordain the defender to deliver to the pursuers a medium sewing machine, No. 2,891,385, with its accessories, and failing delivery within a short specified time to be fixed by the Court, to grant a decree against the above named defender, ordaining him to pay to the pursuers the sum of £6, 10s. sterling as the value of the said machine and accessories.”

The Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) assoilzied the defender.

The Sheriff, on appeal, recalled this interlocutor, and ordained the defender “to deliver to the pursuers the machine and its accessories, as concluded for in the petition.”

The defender appealed.

The Lord President directed the attention of counsel to the value of the cause as appearing from the conclusions of the petition. Counsel for the respondents stated that they were anxious to have a decision on the merits, and would not insist on the question of competency.

No. 131. LORD PRESIDENT.—We cannot discuss the case. The Court have no jurisdiction.

May 14, 1881.
Singer Manufacturing Co.
v. Jessiman.

The appellant then argued that the value did not appear distinctly on the face of the petition to be under £25. Specific performance was asked—not any machine, but a specific machine numbered 2,891,385. Besides, the case involved a principle, and would rule other cases where the company had hired out machines on similar terms.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am of opinion that this appeal is incompetent under the 22d section of 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, which by very express negative words excludes the jurisdiction of this Court in every case whose value does not exceed £25.

The case of Aberdeen v. Wilson is a strong one, and if Mr Shaw had been able to shew distinctly that it applied in the present case we should have been willing to follow it. But in this case the prayer of the petition is for delivery of a sewing machine, or, failing delivery, for payment of £6, 10s. as the value of the sewing machine and its accessories.

In the case of Aberdeen v. Wilson the conclusion was for delivery of an article, or, failing delivery, for payment of a sum of money, or “such other sum as shall be ascertained to be the true value.” It was on these words that the judgment of the majority of the Court was rested. The opinion of Lord Mure seems to me a very valuable one, and quite conclusive of this question. He deals with the authorities which have determined the rule of practice, and he clearly holds that appeal is incompetent unless under the conclusions of the application the Sheriff could pronounce decree for more than £25. When there is a conclusion for delivery of an article, and when the value is defined, we must take that definition as conclusive of the value of the cause.

LORD DEAS.—I entertain no doubt whatever. In the recent case of Henry v. Morrison our judgment was the other way. But the principles and authorities applicable to that case do not lead to the same result in the present case. The question of competency depends on the value of the cause. Now, here the value of the cause is fixed by the conclusions of the action, which are either to deliver the article or pay £6, 10s. That is all that can be discerned for, and all that can be recovered in this action, and it is of no moment that an action of this kind may be said to involve a principle. Every small-debt case may be said to involve a principle. An action for the aliment of an illegitimate child involves the question of the paternity of the child, but it decides no more than that a certain sum of money is due. If we were to hold that this case extends beyond the question whether £6, 10s. is due or not there would hardly be a small-debt action which would not be appealable.

The value of a cause could not be more definitely fixed than it is in the present petition. The defender can get rid of the action by payment of £6, 10s., and the action will fix nothing beyond.

LORD MURE concurred.

AGNES BATHGATE OR BRYDONE and her husband, James Brydone, grocer and dairyman, Lawnmarket, Edinburgh, raised this action of damages for slander against Malcolm Brechin, butcher, Edinburgh. The pursuers alleged that the defender "wrote, addressed, and forwarded by post an anonymous letter in the following terms to Mrs Macintyre, his wife's sister, who was then residing with the pursuers at Lawnmarket :—'Is it possible that a daughter of Mrs Gray's is living in the Lawnmarket? Things have surely gone to a pitch now, Mrs Macintyre, with you. The day is past when you would spurned at living in such a place, and being the guest of Mrs Brydone, who in days gone past has not been your best friend, but the opposite; the writer is a wellwisher, and would ask you to consider your position, and take heed and turn from such a way of living as the present is with you. The writer hopes to hear of different behaviour, and not going under the roof of any one but the one you should, viz., your mother, or go to some place where drink and your present companions won't get near you, so that temptation will be out of your way. The writer sympathises with your mother under her circumstances with your conduct. YOUR WELLWISHER.' The said statements were intended to mean, and did mean, that the friendship of the pursuer Mrs Brydone for Mrs Macintyre was treacherous, malign, and false in the past, and directed to tempt and lead away the said Mrs Macintyre from the paths of honesty and virtue. Further, the said letter was intended to mean, and did mean, that the pursuers were keepers of a house of disreputable character, where loose and immoral people were allowed to associate with each other, and where Mrs Macintyre would find drunken and profligate companions, and would thereby be exposed to temptation to do wrong."

No. 132.

May 17, 1881.
Brydone v.
Brechin.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The letter was not libellous; and (2) there were no facts stated on record to justify the Court in attaching a libellous meaning to the words of the letter.¹

It was explained at the bar that Mrs Macintyre was married; that her husband was at sea; and that her mother had a house suitable for her residence.

LORD PRESIDENT.—When the words of an alleged libel are not plainly of a libellous character, and require to be construed or have an innuendo put on them, I think the question is, as I stated in the case of Broomfield v. Greig, “whether this innuendo in the circumstance and in the state of the record is admissible, for some innuendoes are so unreasonable and forced that it would not do to allow them to go to a jury, merely because a party chooses so to innuendo words which are not actionable.” I think it is very clear that the words of this letter are not of themselves actionable. The plain meaning of them is that the writer disapproved of Mrs Macintyre, his sister-in-law, being with Mrs Brydone or anyone else except her own mother, and that his reason for wishing that was, that she would be exposed to the temptation to drink. That is plain on the face of the letter. The only part where there is anything like an insinuation is—“The writer hopes to hear of different behaviour, and not going under the roof of anyone but one you should, viz., your mother, or go to some place where drink and your present companions won’t get near you, so that temptation will be out of your way.” I think the only reasonable construction is an imputation against Mrs Macintyre, and nothing else. No doubt there is the allegation of the present companions and drink being a temptation. But that does not mean more than that if Mrs Macintyre is thrown in the way of persons who are in the habit of drinking she will be exposed to temptation. Out of this, and the previous statement in the letter that Mrs Brydone had not been a good friend to Mrs Macintyre, the pursuer proposes to construct a libel which charges the defenders with being “keepers of a house of a disreputable character, where loose and immoral people were allowed to associate with each other, and where Mrs Macintyre would find drunken and profligate companions, and would thereby be exposed to temptation to do wrong.” I looked at the record to see if any facts and circumstances were stated which could possibly give that meaning to words which have not got the meaning on the face of them. I never saw so meagre a record. We are not told whether Mrs Macintyre is married or not, what her husband is, or where he is, or where her mother’s house is. We are left in ignorance of all the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties. That being so, I think this is just one of the cases which I contemplated in my remarks in the case of Broomfield. I think we should dismiss the action.

LORD DEAR.—It is not pretended that the letter libelled will sustain an action of damages without an innuendo, and I am of opinion that the terms of the letter do not warrant the proposed innuendo. The case is different in this respect from the case cited, Dun v. Bain, 24th January 1877, 4 Rettie, p. 317. That was an action for libel in a newspaper article, to be read by the whole public, and so was the case of O'Brien v. Clement, 8th May 1846, 15 Meeson and Welsby, 435. But here the matter was between relatives interested in each other, and to whom a certain latitude of speech and communication may be allowed, which would not be extended to strangers. Moreover, if there is any slanderous insinuation in the letter it is rather against Mrs Macintyre than against the pursuer. It is that if drink was going (as it is less or more in most of houses) she might be tempted to take it.

¹ Broomfield v. Greig, March 10, 1868, 6 Macph. 563, 40 Scot. Jur. 568; Dun v. Bain, Jan. 24, 1877, ante, vol. iv. p. 317; M’Iver v. M’Neill, June 28, 1873, 11 Macph. 777, 45 Scot. Jur. 510; Rodger v. MacEwen, March 9, 1848, 10 D. 882, 20 Scot. Jur. 329; Kennedy v. Baillie, Dec. 5, 1855, 18 D. 138, 28 Scot. Jur. 53.

There is a great want of specification of facts and circumstances. We are not told even if Mrs Macintyre is a married woman, who her husband is, or where he is. I am willing in a case like this to take the explanations given at the bar. But all these explanations tell against the relevancy. Mrs Macintyre, it appears, is married, and her husband is at sea. Now, what can be more natural than to say that the proper place for her to live is in her mother's house. In her mother's house she would not be tempted to take drink, and she would not be able to get it if she were inclined. It is quite natural for her brother-in-law to say, "You ought to stay with your mother." The sting of the whole statement is that Mrs Macintyre might get drink in the house of Mrs Brechin, just as she might in the house of any respectable tradesman or other member of society. It is not reasonably possible to innuendo the statement as the pursuer proposes. I am therefore clearly of opinion that the action is not relevant. Plainly it is not expedient to encourage people of that rank of life to enter upon such a litigation.

The only thing that gave me any difficulty was the fact that the letter was anonymous. Although that must be taken into account I do not think it is enough to make the defender liable in damages.

LORD MURE.—I concur. These questions of innuendo are often difficult, but I think the rule is that if the words used substantially exclude the proposed innuendo it is the duty of the Court to stop the case, and not allow it to go to a jury. Now, applying that rule in the present case, it appears to me that there is nothing in the letter founded on to warrant us in sending the case to a jury to say whether the defender intended to describe the pursuers as "keepers of a house of disreputable character, where loose and immoral people were allowed to associate with each other, and where Mrs Macintyre would find drunken and profligate companions." I cannot find any words in the letter that admit of such a meaning. It goes no further, I think, than to warn Mrs Macintyre that she should not have left her mother's house, where she would not be exposed to temptation.

Croan v. Vallance.

Sale—Horse—Detention by Seller—Personal bar.—A cab-owner purchased a mare from a horse-dealer, which he returned next day to the seller as having failed to answer the warranty alleged to have been granted with her. The seller wrote insisting on the fulfilment of the contract, but meanwhile kept the mare in his own stables, and worked her in his own business. Held that, by keeping and working the mare, the seller was barred from insisting in an action for implement of the contract and payment of the price.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Midlothian.
I.

PATRICK CROAN, horse-dealer, Edinburgh, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against Thomas Vallance, cab-proprietor, Edinburgh, for payment of the sum of £19, 10s., being the price of a mare sold by him to the defender.

The defender, in his defences, averred that he had returned the mare to the seller on 14th May 1881, the day after he had obtained delivery, on the ground that it was vicious, and he also averred that the pursuer had kept it and worked it since that time.

The defender pleaded, inter alia, that the pursuer was barred from suing the action, inasmuch as, on the return of the animal, he had retained and worked and used her as his own property and failed to put her into neutral custody.

A proof was allowed, from which it appeared that on 13th May 1880 the pursuer sold to the defender a grey mare for the sum of £19, 10s. Delivery of the mare was taken on the same evening. On the following evening the defender returned it to the pursuer's stables as not answering to the warranty he alleged that he had received with her. The pursuer thereupon sent back the mare to the defender's stables, but on the following morning, 15th May, the mare was again brought to the pursuer's stables and left there.

On 17th May the pursuer communicated with the defender through his agent, informing him that, unless he heard from him offering to take delivery of the mare before the 19th the mare would be put out at livery and an action raised for the price and expenses.

The pursuer deposed that on 13th May he bought the mare, which he sold to the defender the same day. "I knew the animal previously. An honest good working animal. Since I have had it in my possession it has been one of the best animals in my possession. I have worked the animal more since it came back to my possession than if it had not been in dispute. I did so to test its ability. One of my reasons for keeping the mare at work, instead of putting it to a livery stable, was, not only to prove its working capabilities, but also to diminish the expense of its keep."

On 28th January 1881 the Sheriff-substitute (Hallard) pronounced an interlocutor decerning in terms of the libel,* and on 14th February the Sheriff (Davidson) adhered.

* "NOTE.— The defender made a point of the circumstance that the pursuer kept the mare at work after she was sent back. It is not easy to see what harm has been done thereby. As the mare was put into the pursuer's stable against his will, and by the defender's act, it was scarcely for the defender to complain that the pursuer put her to use. The result has been to save expense, and the conclusion for three shillings a week in name of keep has not been insisted in. It is thought that the defender's proceeding in sur-

The defender appealed to the Court of Session.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case we have not heard any discussion on the question whether this horse failed to answer the warranty alleged to have been given by the seller, and whether there is any conclusive proof of the vicious habits attributed to it; but I do not think that is necessary, owing to the way in which the seller dealt with the horse when it was returned upon his hands by the purchaser. The day after the sale the defender brought back the horse to the pursuer, who declined to resile from the bargain, and the horse was sent back. The next day, however, the horse was again sent to the pursuer's stable, and left there. The pursuer communicated with the defender through his agent, asking him to take back the horse, but this was never done. Now, the pursuer, when the horse was sent back to his stable, did not put it out to livery with some neutral party, but kept it at his own stables and used it for his own behoof in his business, working it, according to his own account, "more since it was in my possession than most cab horses in Edinburgh are wrought—more than I work my own." I think that the pursuer having acted in this way, when the horse was returned to his stable under an allegation that it failed to answer the warranty, the present action is untenable, and that we need not go further into the case.

Croan v. Val-
lance.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Of course I give no opinion on the question as to whether the defender was entitled to return this horse as not being fit for the purpose for which he bought it, and not according to the warranty alleged to have been given. But it is important as a fact in the case that the defender did return the horse as not fit for his purpose, and that the pursuer accepted the return, and proceeded to use the animal as his own, for his own profit, and in the course of his trade, and that, not only for a few days before he raised this action, but, so far as we know, down to the present time. I hold that that conduct must be held to have imported an acceptance by him of the return of the horse. He was not, I think, entitled to take these two courses at once,—to raise this action, and to use the animal as his own. The animal was used by the pursuer for the purpose of his trade, and that in such a manner as clearly implied that he thought the horse was well returned. In no other view is his conduct justified.

On these two facts, that the defender returned the horse on the allegation that the horse was not fit for his purpose, and that the pursuer used it for his own purposes when it was so returned, I think that this action is quite untenable.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and assoilzied the defender.

Marshall v.
Marshall.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Lenocinium—Bar.—Where a man, who had married a prostitute, some years after suggested to her that she should return to her former mode of life, and deserted her, held that he was barred by his conduct from insisting in an action of divorce for alleged adultery on her part.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Adam.
M.

IN February 1881 Harry Marshall, formerly coffee-planter, Ceylon, raised an action of divorce against his wife, in which he averred that on 9th October 1879 he had married his wife, who was then a prostitute in Edinburgh; that they had lived together in Ceylon, London, and Edinburgh, till May 1880, when he had been obliged to place himself under medical treatment in the Isle of Skye; that since he left her she had continued to live in Edinburgh, and had given herself up to a course of continuous and habitual adultery; that she had been in the constant habit of frequenting brothels, in particular a brothel at No. 7 Falshaw Street, and had there on repeated occasions committed adultery with men whose names were unknown to him.

Mrs Marshall, in her defences, denied the adultery, and averred that “before leaving the defender, as above mentioned, the pursuer recommended and urged the defender to endeavour to find some gentleman who would provide a house for her, and make her his mistress, and proposed that, on this being done, he, the pursuer, would come and visit her there. She was indignant at this suggestion, and refused to accede to it. His whole conduct to her afterwards, in deserting her, concealing his address from her, neglecting to give her any means of support, and having her movements watched by detectives, has been in accordance with this proposal, and the defender avers that he has done it all with a view to induce her to lead a life of prostitution, in order that he might raise an action of divorce against her.”

She pleaded that she was entitled to absolvitor, and “(3) Separatim, Lenocinium. The pursuer is not entitled to decree in any event, in respect of his conduct towards the defender.”

A proof was led on 1st and 2d March. From the evidence it appeared that the pursuer had lived with the defender for some time previous to the marriage, and had married her in the full knowledge of her character. Their married life was very unhappy, owing, in great measure, to the dissipated habits of the pursuer, who was much addicted to drink. On their return to England from Ceylon Mr and Mrs Marshall lived in Burton Crescent, London, for some time. Mr Marshall had at this time no means of his own, but was entirely dependent on his mother for money. When in London a Mr Hooker visited them, on the pursuer's invitation. This gentleman deponed,—“I remember of their having a quarrel about money matters when I was there. Mrs Marshall had been asking him for money, and complaining that he had not given her any for housekeeping purposes. I knew what she had been before her marriage. On that occasion in London the pursuer said something to her about her past life. When she was complaining about not getting money, she said, ‘What are we to do? How are we to live?’ And he distinctly said, ‘Do what you did before.’ At all events, he used words to that effect. He was evidently hinting that she should go on the streets. He seemed to be quite earnest in saying that, though no doubt it was said in heat. He was quite sober when he said it.”

Mr Hooker further deponed that he visited them again in May 1880, after they returned to Edinburgh, and that the pursuer again on that occasion “hinted that he would have no objection to her leading an immoral life.”

Mrs Reppingall, a lodging-house keeper in Broughton Street, deponed to having heard the pursuer on various occasions suggest to his wife "to go and keep a gay house." There was other evidence to a similar effect. The proof of the adultery alleged against the defender was mainly confined to the evidence of certain detectives and frequenters of brothels, the import of which appears sufficiently in the opinions of the Judges in the Inner-House.

Marshall v.
Marshall.

It was further proved that when the pursuer went to Skye the defender was ignorant of his address for a considerable time after he left, but she communicated with his agents, saying that she was penniless, and demanding aliment. In answer to this the agents wrote offering aliment to the extent of £30 per annum. This, and a larger offer of £50 per annum, was refused, and a summons for aliment was raised in the Court of Session. Meanwhile this action was raised, and an interim order was granted for aliment at the rate of £50 per annum.

On 2d March 1881 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor, finding facts, circumstances, and qualifications proved relevant to infer that the defender had committed adultery, and giving decree of divorce against her.

The defender reclaimed, and argued;—The proof of adultery had failed. The pursuer had deserted his wife in Edinburgh, where she had no friends but those who had been her friends before her marriage. In those circumstances the mere proof that she had been seen in brothels where her friends lived was not conclusive proof against her, as it would have been had her former life been different. Separatim, the pursuer had, by his actings, and the advice he had on various occasions given to the defender to return to her former way of life, barred himself from obtaining decree of divorce.

Argued for the pursuer;—There was no case of lenocinium here. To set up that plea it was necessary to prove that the husband had acted or spoken with a view to inducing the commission of the adultery complained of. The conduct must arise from deliberate design, and it was not sufficient to set up the plea merely to prove that a husband left his wife in such circumstances as might possibly lead to her committing adultery.¹ The advice to return to her former life was not seriously meant, but was merely a brutal jest on the part of the husband. The proof of adultery was sufficient.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case there are two questions raised, first, whether, on the proof, adultery has been proved against the wife, and, second, whether, if it is proved, or whether it is proved or not, the conduct of the husband has been such as to conduce to it. Something has been said about the contrariety of the two pleas, and the incompetency of pleading more than one of them. I do not, however, think that there is much in that, for the woman can easily say, "I am innocent, but even if the proof of adultery is held to be sufficient, you, my husband, conduced to it." There is no need to go too strictly into this argument, and I shall deal with both pleas. On the first question, though the proof that is offered to us is certainly not of a high class, the witnesses not being of the best description, still, if the case came here solely on the evidence, I should find it very difficult to come to a different conclusion from the Lord Ordinary. If the Lord Ordinary had found the other way, I should not have differed from him, but as it is neither am I inclined to do so now. On the second point, however, I am very strongly of opinion that I have seldom seen a case in which lenocinium has been more strongly presented. This woman, whose former life had certainly been of a very bad description, owed a duty to her husband, and there is nothing in the evidence before us to shew that she did not mean to do it. The husband, however, on his part, owed her a very special duty, considering the circumstances of her former life. As he had chosen a wife from that class, it was his special duty to protect her from outside influences, and from herself. Now, it seems to me that, in addition to leading a highly dissipated life, he thought fit, when he was suffering from the pressure of poverty, over and over again to counsel her in what I must characterise as the most brutal and heartless way to return to her former life. This was not done before one witness only, but before several. If that was done before witnesses on several occasions, it is most probable it was done several times when they were alone. After conduct of that kind, I certainly am not prepared to give the husband the remedy he asks. It is perhaps true that the wife was not driven to do what she did by poverty, but her husband thought fit to withdraw from his wife his maintenance and protection, and that in such a way that she did not even know where he was. No wonder, then, that, left to herself entirely, she fell back into the society she had been accustomed to before her marriage. On this ground, I have no hesitation in proposing that we should alter this interlocutor.

I must add that I do not differ in the least from the authorities cited to us, but where it comes to direct advice having been given to the wife to return to her former life, and that advice being given not as a jest, but with serious intention that the woman should follow it, then I think there can be no doubt that the plea of lenocinium is applicable.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and I feel no difficulty whatever about the case. I think that a man who marries a common prostitute knowingly should not easily obtain a divorce from her on the ground of her adultery and immorality. It is not impossible that he should obtain it, but I say it as emphatically as I can that he ought not easily to do so. A divorce is not granted because of the sin of the husband or wife, as the case may be. No doubt the sin of the one or the other is a necessary condition of divorce, but divorce is not granted in punishment to the guilty party, but as a remedy to the injured. Now, can one say that the pursuer here is an injured party? He married a street walker, and lived with her a dissolute and discreditable life. After marriage it seems to have broken on the wife that her husband was impecunious, and entirely dependent on his mother, and utterly incapable of supporting himself and her. When she remonstrated with him he had no hesitation in telling her to return to her old way of living, if indeed she had ever left it. For some time she had been living with certain persons, friends of her's before her marriage, and her husband did not seem to care whether she kept virtuous or not. At last he left her because he was in poverty, and in such a condition from drink that he had been ordered away to some place in Skye for treatment. His wife then said to him, "What shall I do?" and he answered, "My mother will do something for you, but you had better return to your old ways." I think that a man who conducts himself in that way cannot be heard when he says, "I am an injured husband." I am very clearly of opinion that he is not entitled to appeal to a Court of justice for a remedy. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the evidence of adultery is of the narrowest. There is absolutely no respectable evidence in the case, and, such as it is, it is only the evidence of detectives set upon her by the husband's relations. I am distinctly of opinion that such an action ought not to be sustained, and that it is not for the cause of morality that it should be.

Marshall v.
Marshall.

I do not like tying this man to this woman, but it is most important that men who marry prostitutes, as this man did, should not do so under the idea that they will obtain divorce as a matter of course on a proof of adultery on their part, or upon proof that in the ordinary case would suffice to obtain a divorce. I think it wholesomer that it shall be announced that they shall not easily get divorce, and I think especially when advice such as we have here is given that the plea of lenocinium, though perhaps that is not a very good word, should constitute a bar to decree being granted.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I am quite of the same opinion. If the adultery was in any way conduced to by the husband he is not entitled to get his divorce; but I think that if adultery is proved against a wife, and if it is not proved that the husband is directly or indirectly answerable for it, then, whether the wife was a prostitute or not, he is not to be deprived of that remedy which others enjoy. The wife is answerable for her own wrong, and if her husband has not conduced to her guilt, though she was a prostitute before her marriage, she has no right to relapse from virtue, and bring forth the facts of her early life as an answer to an action of divorce.

The first question here is whether this woman did commit adultery. Now, the character of this woman before her marriage has a material effect on the evidence brought forward to convict her of adultery, for that which would be conclusive proof against a person of hitherto unimpeachable character may not be conclusive against such a woman as this. It is notorious that whenever a woman not a professional prostitute goes to a brothel it is ascribed to one purpose only, and in such a case adultery would be held to be established. But here this woman was left by her husband, with no friends in the town but those in the walk of life in which she had been before her marriage. When she went to see them there was not the same presumption against her. There is a great deal in this view certainly, but the question is whether the evidence is all that is required. There is certainly not a strong case on the evidence, but I do not say that I feel warranted in differing from the conclusion arrived at by the Lord Ordinary, who saw and heard the witnesses give their testimony. I am far from thinking there is a clear case of adultery made out, but I think there is sufficient to warrant the verdict that has been given. That introduces the next question, are the circumstances such as to disentitle the husband from obtaining redress? It is not necessary for me, in answering this, to state an exact definition of the plea of lenocinium, but this I may safely say, that if a husband can be held to have been in any way contributory to what ensued the law will not interfere to give him a remedy. The circumstances here are certainly very peculiar. Take one case: In the course of a conversation between the husband and wife, in the presence of a man who had been intimate with the wife before her marriage, he advised her to go back to her former way of life. If it could be shewn that this was not meant or taken seriously of course all that could be said would be that it was a brutal and

No. 134. dangerous joke, but the pair came to Edinburgh, and again, in the presence of the same man, similar advice is given, and before the effect of the recommendation had passed away the husband left his wife without protection or means of subsistence. Might the wife not have had this advice in her mind when she returned to her former course of life? If what he said can in any way be held to have been contributory in bringing about such a result, then all that is required to enable me to come to the same conclusion as your Lordships has been proved. I think that that is so, and, therefore, I agree in thinking that this divorce should not be granted.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and assoilzied the defender.

No. 135. DUNCAN MACPHERSON, Pursuer.—Trayner—Jameson—Kennedy.
KENNETH MACKENZIE, Defender.—Gloag—Millie.

May 21, 1881. Macpherson v. Mackenzie. Royal Burgh—Harbour Dues—Prescription.—Held that a charter of royal burgh is a habile title on which to prescribe a right to exact harbour and shore dues, and that the usage of exaction for more than the prescriptive period will fix the limits of the right.

2D DIVISION. IN September 1879 Duncan Macpherson, tacksman of harbour dues of the royal burgh of Fortrose, raised an action against Kenneth Mackenzie, steamboat owner, for payment of £30, 9s. 4½d., being the amount of shore and harbour dues alleged to have been incurred by him between the months of October 1878 and April 1879 inclusive.

In October 1879 a second action was raised by Macpherson against the same defender concluding for payment of a further sum of £29, 1s. 9d., being the amount of further dues, part of which was incurred before the raising of the first action, but payment of which, the pursuer stated, he then believed was not to be refused. These actions were conjoined.

From the documents lodged in the process it appeared that prior to the year 1455 Fortrose, then known by the name of Chanonry, was the cathedral seat of the diocese of Ross. Adjacent and coterminous lay the burgh of Rosemarkie, which had been erected into a burgh by a charter of Alexander.—This charter is no longer extant.

By charter, dated 18th June 1455, James II. erected the villa of Fortrose into a free burgh, to be held and possessed by the Bishop of Ross, with all and singular privileges, liberties, and customs, as the burgh of Rosemarkie, and annexed and united Fortrose to the said burgh of Rosemarkie, and granted to the inhabitants of Fortrose all exemptions, liberties, and privileges conferred on the burgh of Rosemarkie, under the ancient charters and writs of Alexander and other kings of Scotland, or enjoyed or possessed by the said burgh past their own limits.

The charter next in date was granted by James VI. on 6th August 1590. By that charter, on the narrative of the above-mentioned charter of James II., and of the general revocation and annexation to the crown patrimony of ecclesiastical lands and villas, the king made, erected, and incorporated the villa lands, bounds, and possessions of Fortrose into an entire and free royal burgh, to be called the burgh of Fortrose. After providing for the government of the said burgh the charter granted to the magistrates and their successors the power "emendi et vendendi omnes et quascunque mercantias res et bona sicuti alii nostri burgi infra regnum nostrum

The charter proceeded,—“ Ac etiam Damus, concedimus et nominamus præfato nostro burgo de Fortrose præposito ballivis consulibus decanis et cummunitati ejusdem præsentibus et futuris duos dies mercatoriales i.e. marcat dayes, unum vero earundem hybdomadatam die lune et alterum die sabbati Ac etiam duas liberas nundinas vulgo i.e. feair dayes annuatim pro emptione et venditione omnium bonorum et rerum infra nostrum burgum et libertatem ejusdem prout eis videbitur expediens tenendus unus dies nundinarum prædictarum vulgo Saint Boniface day et alter vero vulgariter nuncupat. pardonne day omnibus temporibus futuris cum omnibus custumis devoriis et privilegiis in talibus usitat. et consuetis.”

 Macpherson v.
 Mackenzie.

Further, by charter dated 4th November 1592, James VI. ratified and confirmed the charter of 1455 (which is engrossed therein), and ordained that Rosemarkie, with Fortrose annexed to it, and with the name to all time coming of the burgh of Rosemarkie, should be held a free burgh, and “gave, granted, and dispoñed all and singular the prerogatives, privileges, and immunities which it ever had or could have, or which in any way belong to it, or to any burgh whatever within our kingdom, of which they, and any, our free burghs, have had the use or enjoyment.” There being no reddendo inserted in the above charter, a new charter was granted by James VI., of date 18th December 1612, in which this defect was supplied, and the reddendo fixed at £3 Scots.

This latter charter of 1612 contained the following,—“ Vnacum omnibus Tholoniis custumis et libertatibus ad hujusmodi pertinentibus vel quæ de jure ad quemlibet alium burgum infra dictum nostrum regnum cognosci possunt pertinere . . . Et generaliter cum tantis immunitatibus privilegiis libertatibus et prerogationibus pertinentibus vel que iure cognosci possunt ad quemlibet alium burgum infra regnum nostrum pertinere ut supra Preterea pro causis antedictis pro nobis et successoribus nostris De novo annexavimus univimus et incorporavimus dictum villam de Fortrose dicto nostro burgo de Roismarkye sic quod unus sit burgus omni tempore affuturo Burgum nostrum de Roismarkye nuncupandum Et quod inhabitantes dicte ville de Fortrose utantur et gubernantur per prefectum ballivos et consules dicti burgi de Roismarkye veluti burgenses et inhabitantes ejusdem burgi nostri de Roismarkye in omnibus que ad ipsum pertinent Tenendum . . . Adeo libere et quiete in omnibus et per omnia sicuti aliqui alii burgi infra regnum nostrum sine revocatione contradictione impedimento aut obstaculo quocunque.”

In 1641 this charter, with all those preceding, was ratified and confirmed by Act of Parliament.

Finally, in 1661, Parliament, on the narrative of the charter of 6th August 1590, and the instrument of sasine following thereon, and also of the charter of 18th December 1612, and considering the decay of the burgh of Rosemarkie, and the growing prosperity of Fortrose, and the unlawfulness of markets on the Lord's day, ratified and approved, and perpetually confirmed, the various charters granted by Alexander, James II., and James VI., and the possession thereon, in the hail heids, articles, clauses, and conditions conceived in favour of the said royal burgh of Fortrose, and whereby their privileges and liberties are anyways concerned and enlarged. This Act of ratification further ordained that the said towns of Fortrose and Rosemarkie should be in all time coming called the burgh of Fortrose, and have provost, bailies, council, and other

No. 135. members requisite for administration of justice. The Act further altered the market days, and made provisions of new regarding the annual fairs. The burghs of Rosemarkie and Fortrose accordingly continue to this day incorporated into one burgh, under the name of Fortrose, with all the rights and privileges conferred by, or exercised under, the foresaid charters and Acts of ratification.

Macpherson v.
Mackenzie.

The pursuer in his first action averred,—“The magistrates and town-council have constantly, by themselves or their tacksmen, exercised the right of levying and exacting customs or dues on all goods and merchandise loaded or unloaded within the jurisdiction of the burgh, and on all vessels anchoring within the limits of its anchorage-grounds. Such customs are known as harbour and shore dues, and have been exacted from time immemorial, or at least for upwards of forty years past, upon all such articles and vessels. The district within which the magistrates possess the right of levying these dues is specially described in the minutes of let from 1834 onwards as embracing the whole shore and sea-board of the burgh, the harbour and bays of Fortrose and Rosemarkie, and the Point, and as extending from the burn of Rosemarkie on the one side to the Craigwood Burn on the other. The present harbour was erected in 1814-16, at an expense exceeding £3482, and the whole revenue available for its maintenance and repair is derived from the letting of the harbour and shore dues. Since the completion of the harbour the greater part of the traffic and lading and unlading of goods has been conducted there. But the said dues have always been let, exacted, and paid, not merely within the limits of the harbour, but at all points along the shore between Rosemarkie Burn and Craigwood Burn. There may have been instances of individual escapes or evasions, and individual tacksmen may have waived their rights in isolated cases, but the constant course for upwards of forty years has been as averred.”

He alleged further,—The defender “himself was tacksman of the said harbour and shore dues from 1856 to 1862, and duly exacted them. He also sat in the town-council for some years, and approved the annual minutes of let and other proceedings relative to the said dues. Up till the present year he has paid the dues demanded without demur, and, as already stated, applied to be exempted from anchorage dues, and succeeded in his application. On these facts he is barred by his own conduct from denying the title of the magistrates.”

The defender in his answers denied that the pursuer had any right to exact the dues sued for, and averred that the pursuer relied “entirely on the burgh charters, which contain no grant of harbour, and an alleged immemorial usage of levying and exacting dues at the rate sued for.” This usage the defender denied, and averred that in law “a charter of erection of a burgh without a grant of harbour is not a competent title on which to prescribe a right to levy dues.”

He further averred,—“The harbour of Fortrose was made in the years 1814-17 by the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges appointed under 43 Geo. III. c. 80, at a cost of about £4000. One-half of the expense of erection was borne by the said commissioners out of funds intrusted to them under 46 Geo. III., c. 155, which was an Act for applying certain balances arising from forfeited estates towards making canals, harbours, &c. Of the other half, the Convention of Royal Burghs supplied about £630, and the remainder was raised by subscription among the proprietors adjacent to Fortrose, and the inhabitants thereof. No part of the expense was borne by the burgh of Fortrose as a corporation, nor had the burgh any grant of foreshore or right of property in the harbour. No fund was provided for the maintenance and repair of said harbour, or of about twenty others erected in a similar manner by said commissioners, until 1823, when an Act, 4 Geo. IV., c. 56, was passed empowering an imposition of dues at moderate rates.

No. 135.

Macpherson v.
Mackenzie.

"By section 35 of the said Act power was given to the commissioners for the purpose of keeping in repair such ferry piers and shipping quays as they had erected, to exact payment of a sum of 2d. per ton on any ferry or other boat arriving at any of the said piers or quays, and a sum not exceeding 2d. per ton on any goods embarked on or landed from any vessel or boat (not being a ferryboat plying for hire nor a vessel whose tonnage is registered), and in cases of vessels whose tonnage is registered a sum not exceeding 2d. per ton on every ton of the registered tonnage arriving at or departing from such pier or quay."

The defender further alleged that he was charged higher rates than those allowed by the Act, and, further, that anchorage dues for which he was charged were not charges authorised by the said Act, the only place in respect of the use of which any charge fell to be made being the harbour made by the commissioners.

The defender pleaded;—2. The pursuer has no title to sue, in respect (1) the magistrates and council have no legal right to levy dues under their charters, or by prescription; (2) they have no legal right to levy dues at the rates sued for, and could not convey such right to the pursuer. 3. Separatim, The defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses, in respect (1) any dues which have been claimed have been always charged against senders and consignees of goods, and not against the owners of the vessels; (2) said rates were never posted up or brought to defender's knowledge; (3) the rates charged in the account sued for are illegal, and the pursuer's material statements unfounded in fact. 4. Otherwise said account is subject to deduction, in respect of charges for goods shipped and landed beyond the limits of the harbour.

Proof was led in the conjoined actions.

Such of the evidence as was necessary to the decision of the case is set forth in the opinions of the Judges.

The Lord Ordinary, on 7th February 1881, assolizied the defender.*

* "NOTE.—These actions are brought by the tacksman of the harbour and shore dues of the burgh of Fortrose for payment of £59, 11s. 1½d., being the amount of shore and harbour dues alleged to have been incurred by the defender between the months of October 1878 and April 1879 inclusive.

"The table of dues, with reference to which the present account is charged, was framed and published by the magistrates in 1863.

"The question is, Whether the magistrates of the burgh have right to exact harbour and shore dues at the harbour and beach of Fortrose?

"The magistrates maintain that the charters erecting Fortrose into a royal burgh, followed by immemorial use of levying shore and harbour dues, are sufficient to establish a grant of free port to the burgh, and to give them a title to exact shore and harbour dues not only at the pier or harbour at Fortrose, but also all along the beach, from the burn of Rosemarkie on the one side to Craigwood Burn on the other, a distance of about two miles, which they say are the boundaries of the burgh.

"It appears from the minute of admissions by the parties that of the accounts sued for £33, 1s. 3½d. is charged as the dues on goods landed at the pier or harbour, and £17, 17s. 8d. is charged for anchorage dues, which are charged when the vessel comes into the harbour, and for a cable going between the vessel and the pier when she remains without the harbour. The balance of £8, 10s. is charged as dues payable for articles landed on the beach within the boundaries of the burgh.

"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the right of the magistrates to charge shore and harbour dues, and anchorage dues, in respect of the use of the pier or harbour, depends on different considerations from their right to charge dues on goods landed on the beach, and that it is necessary, in the first instance, to ascertain the circumstances in which the harbour or pier was constructed.

“By the 46 Geo. III., cap. 155, it was enacted that the balances arising from the forfeited estates in Scotland should be vested in the Commissioners for Highland Roads and Bridges appointed under 43 Geo. III., cap. 80, and should be applied by them, inter alia, in constructing or improving harbours, piers, or quays, under the same powers, rules, and regulations as were directed by the said Act with reference to the making of roads and bridges. By this last mentioned Act the commissioners were empowered, when one half of the estimated expense of any road or bridge should be engaged for, to advance the other half as therein mentioned.

“In 1813 the Magistrates of Fortrose and others presented a memorial to the commissioners, stating their desire to have a pier erected at Fortrose, that they were willing to contribute one-half of the expense of the undertaking, and craving the aid of the commissioners. The commissioners agreed to the proposal, and directed their engineer to make a plan and estimate of the pier or harbour. The harbour or pier was erected under a contract between the commissioners and certain persons on behalf of the magistrates of the burgh, and was completed in December 1817. The joint estimated expenditure appears to have been £4015, 6s. 6d., of which the commissioners paid £2007, 13s. 3d. Of the other half, £631, 5s. 9d. was obtained by the magistrates as a grant from the Convention of Royal Burghs, and the balance was raised by subscriptions obtained from parties in the neighbourhood interested in the undertaking. The burgh of Fortrose contributed nothing in its corporate capacity.

“No authority was originally given to charge dues for the use of the piers and quays constructed, as this one was, under the foreshaid Acts of Parliament, until the year 1823, when the 4 Geo. IV., cap. 56, was passed. By the 35th section of that Act, on the narrative that it was expedient to provide funds for maintaining the same in repair, it was enacted that it might be lawful for the commissioners to direct that no person should be permitted to embark from or to land on such pier or quay by means of any ferry boat plying for hire, or any other boat, unless and until a sum not exceeding 2d. per boat (at the discretion of the commissioners) should be paid for every such ferry boat, or other boat arriving at or departing from any such pier or quay, nor should any goods be embarked from or landed at any such pier or quay from any vessel or boat (not being a ferry boat) plying for hire, nor a vessel whose tonnage is registered, unless 2d. a ton be paid for every ton weight for such goods so embarked or landed (and proportionally for fractional parts of a ton), and in case of a vessel whose tonnage is registered, 2d. a ton for every ton of registered tonnage.

“No other or additional power of imposing rates or dues for the use of such piers or quays has ever been granted by the Legislature, and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that these are the only rates that can be legally exacted for the use of such piers and quays. He is further of opinion that no rates or dues could be legally exacted until the commissioners so directed. There is no evidence in process to shew that the commissioners ever directed that rates should be levied at Fortrose, or to shew that they ever authorised the magistrates to levy them.

“It further appears from the 19th section of the Highland Roads and Bridges Act, 1862, which deals with the transfer of such piers and quays, that the harbour of Fortrose is classed in schedule B as one of the harbours which have, by local Acts or otherwise, been transferred to, and are now vested in, other bodies and persons than the commissioners. No evidence has been produced in process to shew by what local Act, or how otherwise, the harbour of Fortrose was transferred to, or vested in, the Magistrates of Fortrose.

Mackenzie.

"With respect to the alleged immemorial use and wont of the burgh to levy shore dues, it appears from the earliest records of the burgh which have been produced, and which extend from 1710 to 1717, that the magistrates were at that time making efforts to raise funds for the erection of a harbour, which they considered to be absolutely necessary for the good of the community and privileges of the burgh.

"In the year 1718 the 'customs' of the burgh are let without reference to any other dues.

"In 1722 the customs of the burgh, 'as they are now restricted to the customs of the two markets of aqua vitæ and the anchorage of boats,' are let to a tacksman. In 1723 they are again let in the same terms. In 1726 the 'hail customs of the burgh, both great and small,' are set to Alexander Gun.

"On 17th October 1743 a committee of council have a meeting with Thomas Davidson, their treasurer, for the purpose of auditing his accounts. They then pass his accounts, 'reserving the consideration of his accounts of the harbour-money till a full meeting of the council.'

"At a meeting of the council held on 12th May 1744 it was resolved that the quarterly stent and certain other sums should be applied 'to the building of the harbour aye and until the £10 sterling borrowed from the harbour-money for payment of the town's stent be completely satisfied and paid.'

"In October 1744 the magistrates, in settling accounts with their treasurer, find that he has only discharged himself of £55, 16s. 10d. of harbour-money.

"No minutes of council meetings are produced between the above date and 1803. In that year the 'customs of the burgh,' with 'the duty paid on malt, spirituous liquors, and other customable goods brought to the town or shore for sale,' were exposed to roup, and were let to John M'Allan for £7, 8s. sterling.

"This continued to be the form in which the subjects were roup'd down to 1817, when the 'shore dues' were, for the first time, so far as appears, let separately, the customs being let to John M'Allan for £3, 4s., and the shore dues to John Dempster for £4, 13s.

"In 1823, by which time the pier or harbour had been erected, the 'shore or harbour dues' are let, and they continue to be let in this form until 1830. In that year the customs, with the duties paid on malt, spirituous liquors, and all other commodities customable brought to the burgh and harbour, with the shore dues from the 'Burn of the Craigwood to the Burn of Rosemarkie,' are let. This is the first time that any territorial limits appear to be assigned to the alleged right of port or harbour.

"At a meeting of the magistrates and council held on 8th June 1837, on the narrative that the principal table of shore dues had fallen aside, and only a printed copy of the same remained in the collector's hands, they authorised and authenticated 'the presently existing' table of shore dues for this burgh, and declare the same to be as in the table, a copy of which has been produced. When this table was originally framed and published there is no evidence to shew.

"The magistrates and council seem to have entertained the idea that they could alter the dues charged as they thought proper, and in 1845 they revised the table of dues of 1837, increasing some and diminishing other charges, and appointed the new table to be the rate of charges in time coming.

"In 1846 the magistrates and council seem to have come to entertain some doubt of their power to levy harbour or shore dues. In the roup of the dues for that year a condition is inserted that the tacksman of the shore dues or petty customs should not, as such, commence any process at law for the recovery of dues or customs without first consulting with, and obtaining the consent of, the magistrates.

"In the next year there is an additional condition inserted, to the effect that although the expositors considered they had right to levy dues within the bounds of the shore of the royalty, yet it was expressly understood that they do not guarantee power to the tacksman of the shore dues to exact such dues, except so far as they are exigible at the harbour or quay of Fortrose.

"The dues were let under these conditions and restrictions down to the raising of this action.

"It appears at a meeting of the magistrates and town-council, held on 24th August 1853, instructions from the Commissioners of Roads and Bridges were laid before them directing that a table of dues in strict conformity with the Act should be published and enforced at Fortrose, where more than the legal dues had been levied, and that they must furnish annual statements of receipts and expenditure on account of the dues levied, on pain of having the power to levy them withdrawn. These instructions were not attended to.

"In 1855 the magistrates and council approved of a new table of dues. It was not at all in conformity with the Act, but was merely an alteration, in some respects, of the former table.

"In 1863 they again revised the table of dues, and approved and enacted the one now alleged to be in force, and with reference to which the charges sought to be enforced in this action are imposed.

"From what has now been stated it appears that there is no evidence that the Magistrates of Fortrose were in use to levy harbour or shore dues prior to the erection of the pier or harbour in 1817. They were in use apparently to levy certain duties on 'customable goods brought to the town or shore for sale.' What these goods were, or what duties they paid, there is no evidence to shew; whatever the duties were they appear to the Lord Ordinary to have been of the nature of custom duties, and not of shore dues.

"Subsequent to the erection of the pier or harbour there is no doubt that the magistrates have been in use to levy shore and harbour dues at the pier or harbour. Before 1837 there is no evidence to shew either the amount of dues charged or the articles on which they were charged. Subsequent to that date and down to the raising of this action—that is, for a period of more than forty years, the magistrates have charged dues according to the table of dues issued in that and subsequent years.

"It is said that they have thus acquired by prescription a right to levy these dues. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the right to levy dues at all depends upon the terms of the Act of Parliament under which the harbour or pier was erected. It is clear that the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges themselves could not have acquired by prescription a right to levy dues higher or different from those specified in the Act of Parliament, which was their only title to levy any. It is equally clear that the Magistrates of Fortrose can have no higher right than the commissioners. The tables of dues of 1837 and 1863 are in no respect in conformity with the rates specified in the statute. They are therefore illegal, and the magistrates have no right to enforce them, in so far as regards the harbour and pier at Fortrose.

"This, however, does not dispose of the charge of £8, 10s., as the dues on goods not landed at the pier, but on the beach.

"The magistrates would appear not to be very sanguine as to their right to exact shore dues, as they neither guarantee them to their tacksman, nor allow him to sue for them without consent.

"The Lord Ordinary has already said that, prior to the erection of the pier or harbour, there is no evidence that the magistrates were in use to levy shore dues. It was not to be expected that after the harbour was erected, and it was a vox signata, signifying marine dues. (2) The magistrates had a burgh charter, and so had a good title on which to prescribe a right to levy dues.¹ A barony title with a grant of parts and pertinents will, if followed by possession for the prescriptive period, give a right of ferry,² and a barony title is an inferior title to a royal burgh title. There was no express boundary beyond that marked out by usage.

Argued for the defender;—The pursuer had no title to levy dues at all. Rights of harbour have hitherto been of two classes only, (1) a right over a large extent of shore beyond the mere port; (2) a right over a port alone. As to the first of these there must be a special grant, and the boundaries must be clearly defined.³ This was the right claimed by the pursuer. None of the things inter regalia has ever been prescribed by a burgh without a special grant, though a barony title is habile to do so. Thomson, in his Acts of Parliament, contrasted "tollonia" with "custuma portium" (pp. 667-671.)

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a very important case relative to the burgh of Fortrose. There are two actions raised at the instance of Duncan Macpherson, tacksman of the harbour and shore dues of the burgh of Fortrose, against Kenneth Mackenzie, steamboat owner, residing at Rosemarkie, for the recovery of shore and harbour dues.

The defence to the two actions is that the pursuer has no right to levy pier and harbour dues, and it is said further that even if he had, the charges made in the account are on goods, some of which, at all events, were landed beyond the limits within which the magistrates or their tacksman can be supposed to have jurisdiction or power to levy rates, and that the rates charged are in excess of any rates which can be called legal. It is also pleaded that the magistrates had lost any right that they ever had, by reason of the pier having been allowed to fall into disrepair.

We have had a very able argument on the first question, namely, whether the facilities thereby afforded for the landing of goods, the beach should be much used for that purpose. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the pursuer has entirely failed to prove that the magistrates have for time immemorial levied dues on goods landed on the beach. He is therefore of opinion that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

"The charters founded on by the pursuer, which are set forth in articles 2 and 3 of the condescendence, contain no express grant of a right of port or harbour, and no definition of any boundaries of a port or harbour. The question was argued at considerable length to the Lord Ordinary whether an express grant was necessary to confer a right of port or harbour, or whether the terms of the charters were sufficient when followed by immemorial use of levying shore or harbour dues, to establish such a right. As the Lord Ordinary thinks that the pursuer has entirely failed to prove immemorial use he has not thought it necessary to decide that question."

Macpherson
Mackenzie.

The question then is, whether the burgh of Fortrose or its tacksman has a right to levy these dues. That, as I have said, becomes a very important question. The Lord Ordinary has substantially found that the burgh has no such right; and that whether dues have been levied or not the magistrates had no title whatever under which they could levy them. The result of that judgment would be that the burgh of Fortrose for the future would be left without the means of maintaining the harbour.

I think that that is a more serious result than the Lord Ordinary had in view. For not only are they left without the means of maintaining the pier, but they will cease from the exercise of rights which have been exercised far beyond the prescriptive period.

We come to the consideration of the case with the admitted or all but admitted fact before us that for a period of sixty-three years these rates have been levied by the Magistrates of Fortrose without any interruption. The rates may not have been exactly the same all that time, because I think there is evidence of their having been raised, but practically they have been the same.

I must own that in a matter of custom and dues I consider that fact almost conclusive in itself. It will require very little title, in a municipal matter of that sort—not being a matter affecting private right, but seriously affecting the course and progress of trade—to validate a course of exactions which has subsisted for a period a half more than the prescriptive period.

But the answer of the defender is, in the first place, that the charter of the burgh gives no express grant of port and harbour, and that a right of port and harbour cannot be exercised unless the grant be expressed—that is to say, unless the words “port and harbour” appear in the grant. In the second place, it is said that the exaction of dues could only be valid on the supposition that they were exacted in respect of an authority or supposed authority conferred by the Commissioners for the making and keeping in repair of the Highland Roads and Bridges, Commissioners, who, we all know, were appointed with statutory powers to administer the forfeited estates in the last century. It is further contended that as the only right, apart from a crown-right, which the burgh could have acquired to levy rates, must have been from the Commissioners I have referred to (who, although appointed about the time already specified, continued to exercise their functions down to a much more recent date), and that right never was derived from the Commissioners, that therefore whatever dues were levied and paid, the exaction of them could not now be pleaded against the defender.

I am of opinion that all these contentions are not well founded. I think the burgh title was quite sufficient to prescribe, or rather to fix, by usage, the extent and limit of the powers of the burgh.

I am of opinion, separately, that the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges, while they were entitled to make advances to the burgh for the benefit of the harbour, in the same way as they were entitled to make advances for the carrying on of any other public work in the north of Scotland, were in no respect either proprietors or administrators of the harbour in question, and that the burgh itself derived no title from them on any such footing. I should have been inclined to think also, even had it been different, that that would have been no answer whatever to the demand which is made here. No. 135.

I shall endeavour very shortly to express my opinion upon these somewhat important matters without trying to deal with the questions exhaustively, which, in present circumstances, I am not in a fit position to do. May 21, 1881.
Macpherson v.
Mackenzie.

And, first, in regard to the charter of the burgh :

It has been laid down by Stair, and it has been ruled in various cases by high authority, that a right of port and harbour—that is to say, a right to exact dues in respect of accommodation afforded in the harbour—may be acquired by prescription. Quite true, the defender says that Mr Erskine (ii., vi., 17 and 18 ; ii., i., 5) lays it down that it can only be acquired by express grant. Both writers I have mentioned are of the very highest authority as institutional writers ; but I venture to say that Mr Erskine must there have been speaking of an express title, and not of a title to prescribe. Stair's opinion in both the passages that were quoted is quite precise, and upon such a matter no authority is higher, or even so high, as his. I do not refer again to the opinion of Lord Cowan in Colquhoun's case, who lays down the law as a matter beyond all dispute precisely as Stair puts it. And therefore upon that question I am with the pursuer, thinking that the general title may be ascertained and defined by usage.

But there must of course be a title on which such a right can be prescribed. I do not think it necessary to deal with the question whether an ordinary infeftment in lands bordering on the sea-shore, coupled with the use to exact dues, would be sufficient to give the right. I am not by any means sure that it may not. But we are dealing here with a community having a charter of erection and nomen universitatis ; and we are dealing, besides—which is very important—with a matter cognate and incident to the municipal character. It is quite true that the charters have no words of port and harbour ; but it will be remembered, in the first place, that this is a sea-bounded burgh, and, in the second place, that it is a harbour—a natural harbour—but still a harbour. I may refer to an Act of Parliament passed in 1861 to facilitate the construction and improvement of harbours by authorising loans to harbour authorities. The interpretation clause of that statute (24 and 25 Vict. cap. 46) bears that “ the word ‘ harbour ’ shall include harbours properly so called, whether natural or artificial estuaries, navigable,” &c. Thus nature has made a harbour here, and the Crown had set down a municipal authority, within whose limits at all events the harbour was necessarily fixed ; and therefore this was a natural incident of the burgh community. In the passage quoted from Craig—which carries great weight—I think it was explained that the most appropriate recipient of a grant of this kind of port and harbour was a municipal corporation, because such a grant was not usually made to individuals, it being thought that the means and revenues of an individual would be insufficient for the proper maintenance of harbour works. That is very distinctly laid down in the passage quoted from book i. tit. xv., sec. 15, where he says—“ Portus autem publici juris sunt, et inter regalia numerantur: tamen et privatorum, saltem universitatum proprii aliquando fiunt, ita tamen cuilibet appellere, onerare naves et exonerare in eis liceat, dummodo portoria solvat.”

A burgh is a nomen universitatis, and it has been argued—although we were not referred to much authority in regard to that matter—whether or not in that respect it is on the same footing as a barony in regard to prescription.

No. 135. Now, without resolving that question absolutely, I should say that in a matter of this kind, Fortrose having a clear municipal charter, and necessarily the incidents of a seaport burgh, it has especially a title to prescribe such rights as the present; and, independently of that, this is not a mere erection into a burgh. It is an erection with a considerable amount of specification, and the specification is so wide that I cannot conceive that, interpreted by usage, it will not extend to and include the right of levying these harbour dues.

Macpherson v.
Mackenzie.

There are two charters; the second of them is the widest—the charter of Rosemarkie, dated 18th September 1612—and that erects the burgh “unacum omnibus Tholoniis custumis et libertatibus ad hujusmondi pertinentibus vel quæ de jure ad quemlibet alium burgum intra dictum nostrum regnum dignosci possunt pertinere. Necnon cum potestate ipsis preposito ballivis et consulis dicti nostri burgi communitatem eidem pertinentem tam de Roismarkye quam de Fortrose eidem unitam cum suis pertinentiis in particatas burgales hereditarie ipsis burgensibus aliisque inhabitantibus pro edificatione et reparatione dicti nostri burgi disponere. Et generaliter cum tantis immunitatibus privilegiis libertatibus et prerogationibus pertinentibus vel que jure cognosci possunt ad quemlibet alium burgum intra regnum nostrum pertinere.”

The words in the first part of this clause are capable of more than one meaning. They are generic words; and “Tholoniis” is stated by Ducange to be appropriate to customs in relation to matters maritime:—“Tholoniis—that is, customs levied on persons coming by sea.” If the words, therefore, be general, they may be construed by usage, if they are capable of such a meaning.

Therefore on that first question I am of opinion that this burgh charter is a title on which a right of port and harbour may be prescribed.

The next question is, whether a right of port and harbour has been prescribed? On that matter, if nothing had been introduced about the Commissioners for making and repairing Highland Roads and Bridges, no doubt exists, because since the erection of the pier in 1817 these dues have been levied without exception down to the present time. But the matter does not rest there. I quite grant that the proof of usage is scanty enough between 1717 and 1814, but I think there is quite enough there, joined with the subsequent usage, to infer constant and continuous exercise of this right of harbour. I need not, I think, go over the evidence in detail. From 1717 the burgh authorities levied anchorage dues. The proof of it occurs only from time to time, but that proof necessarily implies some continuous use, because the harbour dues were let along with the burgh customs. It is, in my view, in vain to say that anchorage dues are simply dues on goods brought in. That is not the meaning of the term at all. It is dues for the use of the harbour, and not for the goods brought in from time to time. I need hardly say that I refer to the expressions which occur in the minutes of the town-council.

It must also be remembered that the burgh people from time to time improved their harbour for the purposes of a harbour—necessarily implying that they were asserting their right to improve the harbour of which they were in the possession and use.

Therefore I am of opinion that the title is quite sufficient, and the possession proved is beyond all manner of doubt.

But then comes this idea, that the Highland Roads and Bridges Commissioners in some way or other were the proprietors of this harbour—that it was not the magistrates of the burgh who levied the dues but the Commissioners of the Highland Roads and Bridges, or, at all events, that the magistrates in levying the dues were levying them upon the title of these commissioners. On the contrary, I am of opinion that the view on this head maintained from the bar from first to last proceeds upon a total misapprehension of the fact. The Lord Ordinary goes so far as to say that the pier, which was begun in 1814 and finished in 1817, was built under an Act of Parliament—"It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the right to levy dues at all depends on the terms of the Act of Parliament under which the harbour or pier was erected." This, however, is a mistake. It was no more built under an Act of Parliament than it was built by the Convention of Royal Burghs or by the Commissioners of Supply. Down to 1823 there was no Act of Parliament authorising such a thing. The Act of Parliament having reference to this matter authorised the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges to make advances of money to those persons who were about to build a pier. In this instance they did make advances—they made advances to the Magistrates of Fortrose; and the Magistrates of Fortrose made as strong an assertion of their rights of port and harbour as I can conceive. It was only a subvention that the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges were authorised to make or made. That subvention was not the only means by which the works were brought to completion. It was supplemented by landowners in the neighbourhood, by persons in the burgh, and by the Convention of Royal Burghs, but the Magistrates of Fortrose, who had the right to it, within whose jurisdiction it was, remained administrators of the funds. It is not of the slightest moment whence the funds came, the fact being that the burgh, out of funds they acquired, built the pier.

Six or seven years after that an Act of Parliament was passed which gave these Highland Roads and Bridges Commissioners the power in certain circumstances to authorise or direct the levying of rates for the support of the piers for which they had previously made advances. What would it signify that the Commissioners had authorised the Magistrates of Fortrose to do this? Would that have been a different state of matters in regard to the authority and proceedings of the magistrates? On the contrary, it would still have been competent to shew that the dues which were levied after 1823 had been levied before 1823.

But, unfortunately for the defender here, he pleads on his record that the Magistrates of Fortrose have not acquired any such right at all from the Commissioners, and I am of opinion that that plea, which the Lord Ordinary has sustained, is as matter of fact perfectly well founded. It is perfectly true that the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges did make over this harbour to the Magistrates of Fortrose—a fact which, I think, has a tendency all the other way. But there is neither grant nor direction by them that the dues which they were authorised to collect were to be levied by the Magistrates of Fortrose. And I rather imagine that such was not the fact. The Magistrates of Fortrose had continued to levy dues from 1814 down to 1823 under their own authority. And they continued to do exactly the same thing after that date. Even if they had had a right given them by the Commissioners, their continued exercise of the right of levying harbour dues from 1814 to 1817, and down to the present time—a right which so far as we see they never ceased to exercise—did not originate with the Commissioners. Nor

That seems to me to be conclusive, and to put the matter beyond all doubt; the Magistrates took over the power of the Highland Roads and Bridges Commissioners, and extinguished any connection they ever had with the pier.

In conclusion, let me say that I think there is an entire mistake as to the position of the Commissioners. Those Commissioners were simply appointed to make advances out of the funds derived from the sale of the forfeited estates, and they were to make these advances, and did make them to great public advantage, for harbours and roads in the Highlands. There was no obligation upon them to administer—they had a certain limited power to administer in cases where they thought fit—a power which they did not exercise, and in so far as they did not exercise any power of that sort, they were simply in the position of trustees handing over funds provided by the state for the purposes I have referred to, such as for harbours and bridges, in this case for the benefit of the harbour of Fortrose.

On the whole matter, I have come, without any difficulty, to the conclusion that the magistrates are entitled to continue the exercise of the right which they have now apparently exercised for so long a period.

LORD YOUNG.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and have really nothing to add. In the observations of a general character on the general law as applicable to the particular case before us, in its material features I quite agree with all that your Lordship has said. The general question before us—I mean as applicable to the burgh of Fortrose—is of public interest undoubtedly, but I think the public interest is with the pursuer of the action, and not with the defender. In point of fact, there is a harbour at Fortrose, whatever the real character of it may be,—that is to say, there is a place suitable for landing and embarking, and conveniently situated with reference to the requirements of the district. There is a district conveniently served by it, and accordingly resort is had thither for landing and embarking. That is a harbour. Is it a private harbour? There are plenty of private harbours in the country belonging to private individuals, and used for their own purposes—their own estates and their own people—and to which the public have no right to resort without special permission. And such harbours may belong to societies. Is this a harbour of that sort, or is it what is in legal language called a “free port,” which means, not that people may resort there without payment, but that it is free to all upon paying such dues as the accommodation afforded requires, or usage or law otherwise has established at the particular place? This harbour, then, is open to all the subjects of the Queen, and indeed to all nations and people who are at peace with the Queen. I take it there is no doubt of that. Nobody can prevent them going there. Well, then, it is a “free port,”—free to all. Not just as an open part of the shore where without trespass people may land or embark, but as a recognised harbour, a spot selected and improved, more or less, to which, beyond the memory of man, people have resorted for landing and embarking. And I suppose, referring to one's general understanding, we may conclude that to the existence of this port here the town of Fortrose owes its existence. It was not made a port on account of the village standing there, but the village was built there, which has enlarged itself, in point of dignity at least, into a royal burgh, because at that point there was a good harbour. It is erected into a burgh, the community built houses and established a village there, and that community is erected into a burgh; and the question is, what is this royal burgh? In order to ascertain the territorial limits of it, to begin with, in so far as these are not specified in the charter—and these are very rarely specified in the charter—you must have resort to usage. And there can be no doubt, as matter of right and law, that by proof of usage or possession you may well ascertain the territorial limits comprehended within a grant of royal burgh. It is not that anything may be acquired by the law of this country by possession or usage only,—it is that you explain the grant, the extent of the grant, in so far as it does not express itself by specifying and prescribing limits, by evidence of what was done under it. The usage is proof, not because usage per se affords a title to anything, but because it explains and interprets the grant which is the title. Now, upon the question, what is the burgh here? does it extend to the sea-shore, and include the sea-shore? The grant does not say, it does not mention the sea although the sea was there, in fact with the shore as a necessary accompaniment. Does the grant comprehend the sea-shore? To ascertain this, the question is put, How do the community act under the charter—did they possess the sea-shore? The answer upon the evidence here is, Yes, they did possess it; they made such use as alone could be made of it as a place of landing and embarking; they improved it for these purposes, and they made charges upon all those who resorted to it, for the purpose of defraying expense incurred. That was the only use that could be taken. They had certainly done that for sixty years at least, and there is evidence sufficient, having regard to the nature of the particular case, that that usage extended a long way back beyond the sixty years. It has been said more than once that the proof of usage is scanty. No doubt the whole affair is scanty; the harbour was scanty; the resort to it was scanty; everything about it was scanty; and the evidence must be scanty. But you have such evidence as might be expected, as a whole, with reference to usage in such a matter.

Then was the harbour included? What I have said shews that it was, for the harbour just consisted in the landing and embarking there. The burgh performed the duties—I daresay very scantily—of improving the natural features of the harbour, making it more commodious for the purpose, and exercised the right corresponding to these duties of exacting dues for the accommodation afforded. Well, join all these things together, with the free resort there without let or hindrance of all the world who are desirous of resorting there, and you have what is called a “free port” or harbour. Well, was that within the burgh or not? It is very commonly included in a burgh in a similar situation, so commonly that I am not aware of any instance of any royal burgh with a harbour, i.e., with a harbour adjoining, in which the harbour was not part of the burgh. I put the question whether there was any such instance, and received the answer, that if there was it was not known. Well, there exists here a free port or harbour. The charter does not say whether it is within the burgh; but, as already said, the question what is the burgh, in so far as the charter does not specify, must be determined by usage. There are some things that do not need to be expressed, but would be implied,—jurisdiction, watching, and warding; the right and the duty of providing market accommodation. All these things are comprehended in the notion of a burgh, which is not merely a grant of land, but the erection of a community into a corporation for certain purposes advantageous to the whole, and the advantage is not limited to that community itself. It is a things besides the mere property of the land granted to the community, and port and harbour is one of those things which it frequently comprehends, and if it be not expressed I see no reason for not resorting to usage for the answer to the question, Does the particular burgh include it? The answer we have here quite distinctly, although no doubt beyond the sixty years the evidence is scanty, because scantiness is the nature of the whole matter before us. That being so, the magistrates, as the trustees of the community and the guardians of the community's interest, being impecunious, as they were likely to be in such a place, apply for aid to the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges. They get that aid, and they build this pier, i.e., they improve the accommodation of the harbour, and that is the beginning of the sixty years which the Lord Ordinary refers to. Having so improved it, they are able to give better accommodation, and their exaction of dues is more distinct. This continues down to the present, and what is there against it? Nothing at all. With the aid which they got from the Commissioners—and they might have got it from public subscription, indeed they appear to have got part of it from that—they might have got the whole from people interested, what does it matter?—they were enabled to set to work and to apply themselves to the improvement of the harbour, and they exacted dues from those of the public who resorted to it, all the public being entitled to resort. But the Act of Parliament to which the Lord Ordinary refers has no other concern with the matter at all. To be sure, if there had been no other way of raising money in order to maintain the harbour, by statute 4 George IV., cap. 56, the Commissioners themselves were entitled to impose dues. But that had nothing to do with the existence of the harbour, and the rights and duties connected with it, which belonged to and were performed by the grantees, i.e., the community. In that I entirely agree with your Lordship.

That being so, the defender here, as one of the public, habitually resorts to this harbour with his steamer for his own profit, and thus takes the use of the accommodation provided there. Does not he maintain, and is not it in the interest of the community that he should maintain successfully—although he is suggesting the contrary here—that the magistrates are bound to improve the harbour, and keep it available for his accommodation, and for the accommodation of others? But, according to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, there is no obligation on the magistrates at all; it is not a free port and harbour; the magistrates have no duties and no rights at all. I cannot say that that is the view in which the community is interested. I think the community is interested that this shall be a free port and harbour, vested in this community, with the duty of maintaining it, and with the right of exacting dues necessary to enable them to perform that duty. But, according to that view, this action is well founded. The right to levy dues is corresponding to the duty of the community. If that be so, and these dues, reasonable in themselves, are generally in conformity with the usage of forty years, I hope, for the matter of a few pounds, probably only a few shillings, we shall not have this litigation prolonged. The dues are not fixed by Act of Parliament; the harbour is not of sufficient dignity and importance to require a statute to regulate it. As it is, the only measure is "reasonable dues," not transcending, generally speaking, the usage which is established here. I use the word "reasonable" with reference to the nature of the harbour, and the duty imposed upon the community in regard to it. The mere taxation of the account here sued for may be of interest in views which do not occur to me at this moment, but I hope the parties will now enable us to dispose of the whole case. No. 135.

I agree with your Lordship that the Magistrates of Fortrose, as representing the community, have the right of port and harbour, with the duty of maintaining it, and the corresponding right of levying customary harbour dues necessary to enable them to perform that duty. May 21, 1881.
Macpherson v.
Mackenzie.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur with all that has been said by your Lordship and by Lord Young.

There is no doubt that this question is one of interest, not merely to the parties, but also to the community of which it may be said Fortrose is the central point. The magistrates, if the pursuer succeeds in this action, have power to levy such dues as are according to law, and upon them lies the obligation to maintain this harbour, so that it may be of use to all those who desire to resort there. And it is this last, certainly quite as much as anything else, that gives the right to levy dues.

The first question raised by the defender is whether there is any title in the magistrates to this port and harbour, to which the public have been in use to resort from time immemorial, giving them a right to demand harbour dues. What the defender says is that in the case of a burgh, if there is to be a right of port and harbour, it must be the subject of an express grant. I confess that I was startled by the proposition when I heard it, and I have heard nothing to satisfy me that it is according to law as recognised by the authorities. How it should come to pass that a royal burgh should be in a worse predicament than any other of those bodies by whom regalia may be possessed, I was at a loss to understand. The burgh charter—a nomen universitatis—is a title upon which to prescribe. Beyond all doubt in the case of a barony there is a title upon which possession can run into prescription. The authority of Stair goes much further than this, because in the first of those passages quoted to us he says that a right of port and harbour may be available which is possessed by the private right of an individual. According to Stair, custom itself, of course upon a title, will be enough to support a right of port and harbour. Now, I should think, with reference to the authorities, and to the considerations of expediency, the acquisition of a right of port and harbour, in place of being more difficult for a royal burgh than for others, may be easier. There is a great deal of presumption in favour of the burgh here. There is a shore suitable for port and harbour, and the idea that where there has been use, and a harbour called into existence, where the magistrates are the persons by whom the harbour has been maintained, and they have levied dues for the use of the harbour, it is not to be presumed that there is a title, if there is nothing more than a grant of royal burgh, without specifying port and harbour, is what I cannot understand. The mere nomen universitatis is regarded by Craig as of itself sufficient; he says that in every case, whether there is an express grant or not, port and harbour is to be looked upon as belonging to the burgh. And the same thing is meant by Bankton, b. i., t. 3, sec. 4,—“The privilege of port and harbour, and of exacting such dues for keeping it in repair, is for the most part granted to cities and burghs where they lie, and sometimes also to private parties for the public good and encouragement of navigation.” Wherever you have a burgh then with a port and harbour, surely the presumption is not against acquisition if there has been possession, but, on the contrary, is all in its favour. Therefore, it appears to me that a royal

No. 135. burgh cannot be worse than a burgh of barony, for one as well as the other is a nomen universitatis, all the stronger for being a royal burgh instead of a barony.

Macpherson v.
Mackenzie.

The only question remaining is, Has there been possession? The evidence is such as leads me to the conclusion that there has been possession. The possession for the last sixty years is plain enough. That there are tables of dues, recognised charges during that period, there is no controversy. That there had been something of the kind in the eighteenth century is pretty clear, though the evidence is not so abundant, but that is accounted for by the consideration that the period is so much further back. What we have, however, leads to the conclusion that there must have been harbour dues levied and dealt with by the burgh as part and parcel of their grant. You have anchorage dues for instance, in 1718; after that you have reference made to "the harbour fund," wherever it came from, whatever it was, a fund of such an amount as enabled the burgh to borrow from it for other purposes. And before 1823 we have harbour dues expressly specified as one of those rights which were exposed to public roup. That all shows, as I think, that prior to 1823, when the Act of George IV. passed, there was a harbour, and dues were levied by the magistrates. If that is so, coupled with the possession which has followed since, it appears to me that we are necessarily led to the conclusion that there is a title, and that upon this title it is to be held that these dues can be levied, and, consequently, that possession has explained what is comprehended in the charter forming the burgh title. }

But it is suggested that whatever was the case before 1823, matters were changed by the Act of George IV. I entirely agree on that subject with your Lordship and Lord Young. The Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges were never owners of any of those piers which were erected in part through the assistance given by them. Monies were placed in their hands, not that they might become proprietors, but that they might assist those interested in establishing certain piers. They at first could scarcely be regarded as creditors. It does not appear that there was any right conferred upon them of demanding repayment of the amount of their contribution. It appears that by the Act of 1823 they were empowered to give directions to levy a fee of 2d per boat for the use of piers erected through their subvention. But it is very remarkable that in this case there was never given any such direction. Was it of no interest to them that this pier should be kept up? The power required to be exercised only if there was not another way of maintaining the pier. Now, it appears to me that where the assistance was given to a royal burgh which had, or presumably had, a right to collect shore dues for the maintenance of the harbour this particular power given in 1823 was a power the exercise of which was not required; it was not necessary to collect this 2d., which was the whole amount the Commissioners could levy.

All the evidence goes to show that after 1823 this power, which was to be exercised when necessary, was in the case of Fortrose not required, because presumably there were other funds available for the purpose administered by the parties in right of the port and harbour, by means of which the harbour could be kept up. It is not necessary to say anything further in support of the view taken by your Lordship and Lord Young, in which I fully concur.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, repelled the defences, and decerned against the defender for £44.

MRS AGNES DENHOLM OR CLARK, Defender.—*J. Campbell Smith—Rhind.*May 25, 1881.
Clark v. Clark.

Husband and Wife—Conjugal Rights Act, 1861 (24 and 25 Vict. c. 86), sec. 16—Reasonable provision to wife—Whether husband had obtained complete and lawful possession of the property.—A wife having received from her father a sum of money, was allowed by her husband to deposit it in bank in her own name, which she did for two years. She then, with her husband's knowledge and consent, uplifted it and invested £450 in heritable property, taking the title in favour of herself and her heirs and assignees. The rental of the property was about £30 per annum. The husband some years afterwards brought an action to set aside the conveyance in his wife's favour as a donation stuntes matrimonio and revocable. Held that the purchase having been made with funds of the wife, of which, though they undoubtedly fell under his jus mariti, the husband had never "obtained complete and lawful possession" in the sense of the 16th section of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, he was bound in terms of that enactment before claiming the property to make a reasonable provision therefrom for his wife, and that in the circumstances the conveyance in question, which did not exclude his jus mariti from the rents during his life, but only secured the property to his wife after the dissolution of the marriage, was no more than a reasonable and moderate provision, and could not be revoked.

Observed (per Lord President) that "complete and lawful possession," in the sense of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, sec. 16, means something more than a good title to possess, and implies not control merely but actual possession.

IN 1865 Mrs Agnes Denholm or Clark received from her father, David Denholm, who was then still alive, a sum of money, of which she placed on deposit-receipt in her own name with the Commercial Bank of Scotland at Dunbar, on 5th July 1865, £440. This sum was increased by the addition of a farther small sum, to which Mrs Clark succeeded from an aunt, to £495, and was redeposited on 10th November 1865. It was again increased to £500 on 25th May 1866, and reduced to £460 on 22d March 1867, the deposit-receipts being always taken in Mrs Clark's name. The fund fell under the jus mariti of James Clark, Mrs Clark's husband, but he did not intromit with it or interfere with her dealing with it as her own, and accordingly, on 26th November 1867, the last mentioned deposit-receipt was uplifted and the proceeds employed to pay for a small heritable property in Dunbar, which had been bought by Mrs Clark with her husband's knowledge and consent. The disposition to this property, which was dated 28th November 1867, was taken in these terms:—"I George Denholm, of Ninewar, heritable proprietor of the subjects herein-after disposed, in consideration of the sum of £450 sterling, instantly paid to me by Mrs Agnes Denholm or Clark, wife of James Clark, tenant of Springfield, as the price thereof, do hereby sell and dispoise to the said Agnes Denholm or Clark, and her heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Hail," &c.

1st Division.
Lord Adam.
B.

The rental of the subjects was about £30. Mrs Clark had besides a life rent right to the pro indiviso half of certain other lands which had been left her by her father, and which yielded her about £40 a-year. There was no exclusion of Mr Clark's jus mariti from the rents of the property purchased in Mrs Clark's name, or from her life interest in her father's estate. Mr Clark was tenant of a large farm. He had received through his wife certain other sums, the amount of which was disputed, but which was certainly not less than the amount invested in heritable property in Mrs Clark's name.

Mr and Mrs Clark having separated in or about 1874, Mr Clark, on 19th May 1880, raised this action against his wife, to have it declared

No. 136. that the conveyance of the Dunbar property in her favour "was a donation by the pursuer to the defender, stante matrimonio, and that the same is revocable by the pursuer, and that he is entitled to revoke the same."

May 25, 1881.
Clark v. Clark.

In defence Mrs Clark pleaded ;—(3) The defender having obtained, by donation or bequest, the fund out of which she paid the price of the heritable subjects in question, the same did not fall under the pursuer's jus mariti or right of administration, in respect that he did not claim or obtain possession of it, as set forth in the "Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1861."* (5) The subjects in question being no more than a reasonable provision for the defender's support and maintenance, the present action is, in respect of the provisions of the statute cited, untenable in law. (6) Esto that there was a donation, it is irrevocable, in respect that it was a provision made for the defender, and was and is not more than reasonable.

The Lord Ordinary, after a proof, pronounced this interlocutor :—"Finds that the disposition of date 28th November 1867, taken by the pursuer in favour of the defender, his wife, was, in the circumstances, a reasonable and onerous provision made by him for her as his wife, and is not revocable by the pursuer : Therefore sustains the sixth plea in law for the defender, and assoilzies her from the conclusions of the action," &c.†

* By the 16th section of "The Conjugal Rights (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1861," it is enacted as follows,—"When a married woman succeeds to property, or acquires right to it by donation, bequest, or any other means than by the exercise of her own industry, the husband, or his creditors, or any other person claiming under or through him, shall not be entitled to claim the same as falling within the communio bonorum, or under the jus mariti, or husband's right of administration, except on the condition of making therefrom a reasonable provision for the support and maintenance of the wife, if a claim therefor be made on her behalf ; and, in the event of dispute as to the amount of the provision to be made, the matter shall, in an ordinary action, be determined by the Court of Session, according to the circumstances of each case, and with reference to any provisions previously secured in favour of the wife, and any other property belonging to her exempt from the jus mariti ; provided always that no claim for such provision shall be competent to the wife if, before it be made by her, the husband, or his assignee or disponee, shall have obtained complete and lawful possession of the property."

† "NOTE.—At the conclusion of the proof the Lord Ordinary stated the grounds on which he was of opinion that the money paid for the subjects contained in the disposition above mentioned was in law the property of the pursuer, and that therefore no question arose under the 16th section of the Conjugal Rights Act. But he took time to consider the question raised by the defender's sixth plea in law, whether the disposition was to be regarded as a pure donation by the pursuer to his wife, or whether it ought not to be regarded as a reasonable provision by him to her, and therefore not revocable. There was no marriage-contract between the parties. The pursuer is under a natural obligation to provide for his wife, if not otherwise sufficiently provided for. She appears to be only provided in a sum of £40 per annum, being one-half of the rents of a small property called Howburn, the liferent of which was left to her by her father, the pursuer during his life being entitled to the rents. The pursuer is also entitled to the rents of the subjects now in question during his life. The information furnished as to his means is not very satisfactory, but he is the tenant of a considerable farm, and appears to be in comfortable circumstances. A few years ago he came into possession of a sum of £500 left to the defender by her uncle ; and, besides household furniture of some value, he succeeded, in right of his wife, to a sum of about £100. In these circumstances, a provision of £450, which was the price paid for the subjects in question, does not appear to be more than a reasonable provision for his wife.—Rust v. Smith, January 14, 1865, 3 Macph. 378 ; Galloway v. Craig, 4 Macq. 267 ; Kinnear v. Ferguson, November 7, 1871, 10 Macph. 54."

No. 136.

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the pursuer seeks to set aside a disposition taken in name of his wife in 1867 of certain subjects at Dunbar. The disposition bears to be granted “in consideration of the sum of £450 sterling, instantly paid to me by Mrs Agnes Denholm or Clark, wife of James Clark, tenant of Springfield, as the price thereof.” The pursuer’s allegation is that the money which was paid for the property really belonged to and was paid by him, and that therefore the conveyance of the subjects to the defender was a pure donation to her stante matrimonio, and revocable. On the other hand, the defender avers that the subjects were purchased with money to which she had succeeded from her father, or which her father had given her, and which had been kept in bank in her own name till the purchase of the property.

Clark v. Clark.

Now, the defender’s averment is well founded in point of fact. She did receive from her father, and deposit in bank on 5th July 1865, £440. This sum was increased in November 1865 to £495, by the addition of a small sum which the defender had acquired from another source, and a fresh deposit-receipt was taken for that sum in her own name on the 10th of that month. The deposited sum was increased in 1866 to £500, but was reduced on 22d March 1867 to £460, and that sum remained on deposit-receipt with the Commercial Bank of Scotland at Dunbar till 26th November 1867 when it was uplifted. The conveyance in question is dated 28th November 1867, and there is no doubt that the money paid to the seller was the same money as was lodged in Mrs Clark’s name on deposit with the Commercial Bank.

In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that no question arises in this case under the 16th section of the Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, because “the money paid for the subjects contained in the disposition above mentioned was in law the property of the pursuer.” I am unable to agree with his Lordship in that view. It seems to me that if the 16th section of the Conjugal Rights Act did not apply to anything which was in law the property of the husband the provision would be quite futile. I think, on the contrary, that the enactment was intended to apply to property which is in law the property of the husband by virtue of his jus mariti, and that what it provides is that nevertheless he and his creditors shall not be entitled to claim it, “except on the condition of making therefrom a reasonable provision for the support and maintenance of the wife.” But the section proceeds,—“Provided always that no claim for such provision shall be competent to the wife if before it be made by her the husband, or his assignee or disponent, shall have obtained complete and lawful possession of the property.” The first question therefore in this case appears to me to be, Was there on the part of the husband complete and lawful possession of what his wife kept deposited in bank in her own name and afterwards invested in heritable property with, apparently, her husband’s knowledge and consent at the time?

Now, it is quite clear that to have obtained complete and lawful possession means something more than to have a good title to possess. It implies not control merely, but actual possession. Where, then, was the actual possession in this case? Was it not in the wife, to the exclusion of the husband? It stood in her name on deposit-receipt. It was converted into land in her name. “Complete and lawful possession” on the part of the husband is therefore excluded by the facts.

No. 136.

Clark v. Clark.

The only question that remains is, Is this provision as it stands such a provision as the wife is entitled to insist on having made for her before the husband and his creditors can claim the property? It is in land or other heritable property, and therefore very suitably secured. And it is certainly not a large provision, the gross rental being apparently only about £30 a-year. On the ground of amount therefore I think no objection can be taken.

But it was farther objected that the defender was not entitled to a provision to take effect during the marriage. It is unnecessary to consider whether that is a sound objection or not. For from the nature of this provision the free rents stante matrimonio fall under the jus mariti of the husband, and the actual beneficial interest in the property only opens to the wife after the husband's death. I think therefore that the effect of allowing this deed of conveyance to be taken in the wife's name was to make no more than a reasonable and moderate provision for her, which the husband might have been compelled to make under the statute. Having made it voluntarily, he is not, I think, entitled to revoke it by setting aside the conveyance.

I therefore come to the same conclusion as the Lord Ordinary, but on different grounds.

LORD DEAS and LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Having heard counsel on the reclaiming note for James Clark against Lord Adam's interlocutor of 8th February 1881, recall the interlocutor; sustain the third and fifth pleas in law for the defender: Assoilzie the defender, and decern: Find the defender entitled to expenses," &c.

ELIZABETH B. WINCHCOMBE, Pursuer (Appellant).—Rhind—Millie.
HENRY HOPKINS WINCHCOMBE, Defender (Respondent).—Salvesen.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Desertion—Pursuer unwilling to adhere.—In an action by a wife against her husband, concluding for divorce on the ground of desertion, the pursuer deponed that her husband had deserted her in May 1870, and had failed to contribute to her support since that date; that prior to the desertion he had treated her with great cruelty, and that if he had asked her to go back in July 1870 she would have been afraid to go back, and that she was not now willing to adhere. The Lord Ordinary (Adam) found that as the pursuer had, on account of her husband's cruelty, been, during the whole period of desertion, unwilling to resume cohabitation, she was not entitled to the remedy of divorce for desertion.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Adam) that as the defender had deserted the pursuer for upwards of four years, and as there was no proof of his having made such an offer of adherence as she was bound to accept, she was entitled to decree of divorce.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Adam.
M.

ELIZABETH BARR WINCHCOMBE, Greenock, raised an action of divorce against her husband, Henry Hopkins Winchcombe, residing in France, on the ground of wilful and malicious desertion.

The pursuer averred;—The pursuer and defender were married in December 1868, and thereafter lived together in Greenock as man and wife till about the month of September 1870, when the defender wilfully and maliciously deserted her.

The defender denied the desertion, and stated that in 1873 and 1874 he had written repeatedly asking the pursuer to come to him. Copies of these letters were put into process, but were not printed for the purposes of the debate in the Inner-House. No. 137.

A proof was allowed.

The defender was not examined as a witness, and did not lead any evidence. May 26, 1881.
Winchcombe
v. Winchcombe.

From the proof it appeared that shortly after the marriage the defender began to ill-use the pursuer, striking her when far advanced in pregnancy, turning her out of doors into the street at night, and threatening her life if she returned. The pursuer further deponed that on one occasion he drew an open razor across the back of her neck; that he left her in Greenock in 1870, without giving her his future address, after selling all the furniture in the house; and that from that time she had lived with her own relations, supporting herself and a child born of the marriage by her own exertions. Several witnesses deponed that he had, previous to the alleged desertion, announced to them his intention of leaving his wife. Being interrogated as to whether she had received letters from the defender since he deserted her, the pursuer deponed,—“I don't remember when I first heard about him after September 1870. I think it is about a year ago, or between one and two years ago. It was just about the time I caused a previous action to be raised against him. I had made inquiries to find out where he was. I found he was living at St Valerie-sur-Somme, in France, and carrying on a rope business there. From September 1870 until I heard about him being at St Valerie, I had got no letter or communication from him. He had never contributed anything to my support during that time, nor has he done so yet. A summons was raised against him on the ground of adultery, but was afterwards withdrawn. I cannot explain how that came to be. I know that my agents wrote to their French correspondents on the subject, and made inquiries about him. I put the matter into their hands. Since that action was raised I have received some letters from him, which I have handed to my agents, and since then I have raised the present action. I am quite sure I had no communication from him until the first action was raised.” Under cross-examination she further deponed,—“I am not now willing to adhere to him if he is willing to take me back. (Q.) Were you willing in July 1870 to go back to him if he had asked you? (A.) I was afraid to go back. (Q.) And you were not willing? (A.) In that case I was not willing, because I was afraid.”

On 14th March the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Having heard counsel for the parties and considered the proof and whole process, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action, and decerns: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses: Allows an account to be lodged, and remits the same to the Auditor to tax and report.”*

* “NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary does not doubt that the defender deserted the pursuer in May 1870, and has remained away from her ever since, without contributing to her support, or to that of their son. Prima facie that state of matters would appear to entitle her to divorce, but it also appears that she is not, and never has been, willing that the cohabitation between them should be resumed, the reason being that while they lived together he had behaved to her with great cruelty. In other words, she acquiesced in the separation. It may seem to be a hard state of the law that she would have been entitled to divorce had he not behaved cruelly to her, but having behaved so cruelly to her that she is glad to get rid of him she is not entitled to divorce.

“The law, however, afforded her another remedy, that of separation.

“It appears to the Lord Ordinary, that prior to the change of procedure intro-

LORD YOUNG.—This action is brought on the ground of wilful and malicious desertion. If that is proved, and if it was maliciously and wilfully persisted in, for a period of four years, then the pursuer is entitled to her remedy. The desertion must have been malicious and wilful to begin with, and maliciously and wilfully persisted in by the offending spouse. If the facts enable us to affirm that, then I say that the pursuer is entitled to her remedy, and I think that they do. I think that the defender did so desert his wife more than ten years ago. He used her ill, turned her out of doors, and threatened her with violence if she came back again. All this he did deliberately, for he told his friends that his purpose was to be separated from his wife. He then broke up his establishment, ceased to have a home, and went away, leaving his wife to provide for herself, and that without any cause, so far as we can judge. He never invited her to return, at least for ten years, when, owing to the erroneous interpretation of a letter from France, his wife raised an action of divorce against him. The reading of the letter turned out to be erroneous, and the action was abandoned. After that the husband invited his wife to return. I am not going to express any absolute opinion on the legal question, whether it is too late for repentance when ten years of desertion has passed; it is, in my opinion, sufficient to say that there is no proof here of the defender's repentance and willingness to take his wife back. He cannot rely on these copies of letters alleged to have been sent by him; they are not properly before us, not being printed. I have, however, looked at them, and there is nothing in them which can be received as of any value after ten years' misconduct, unless they are strengthened by the evidence of the writer. I think, therefore, that it is proved that wilful and malicious desertion continued for ten years, and it is nothing to the purpose to say that when the pursuer was examined as a witness for herself she said, in answer to the question, "Would you be willing to return to your husband now?"—"I am not now willing to adhere to him if he is willing to take me back." I do not like the question, "Were you willing in July 1870 to go back to him if he had asked you? Would you have been willing to return if something happened which never did happen?" I do not like such questions being put, and I am not sure I should have allowed such a question myself. If I had allowed it I think the discreet answer would have been,—“If I had been asked, I should have taken time to consider my answer.” On the grounds I have stated I am not prepared to assent to the views of the Lord Ordinary, except in so far as duced by the 11th section of the Conjugal Rights Act, the pursuer could not have been in a position to institute an action of divorce.

“She was not willing to adhere, and in her frame of mind could not have taken active steps by raising an action of adherence against her husband, and adopting the other procedure required by the Act to compel him to adhere, which were necessary preliminaries to an action of divorce, and without which the deserting spouse was not in a state of wilful and malicious non-adherence. It is clear that there was required not only desertion on the part of one of the spouses, but also a willingness to adhere, or rather a desire for adherence, on the part of the other.

“The Lord Ordinary thinks that the first of these elements is present in this case, but not the latter. He does not think that any change of the law, in this respect, was intended to be made, or has been made by the Conjugal Rights Act.—Bowman v. Bowman, Feb. 7, 1866, 4 Macph. 384; Muir v. Muir, July 19, 1879, 6 Rettie, 1353.

he says that he does not doubt that the defender deserted his wife in 1870, and has remained away from her ever since. I am therefore of opinion that in the circumstances this interlocutor ought to be recalled and the divorce granted.

LORD CRAIGHILL concurred.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur, and only wish to add that I quite retain the opinion I expressed in the case of Muir, cited by the Lord Ordinary, and think that the more the question is sifted the more clearly will it appear as an inevitable result that it would never do for a man at the end of twenty years of wilful and malicious desertion simply to make an offer to adhere, when his wife raises an action of divorce against him, with the result of making the wife's action fall.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and granted decree of divorce.

Agent and Principal—Stockbroker—Sale of stock and closing of customer's account—Misrepresentation by customer as to means and credit.—Held that where a stockbroker has incurred personal responsibility by purchasing stock for a client on the faith of representations made by him as to his means, which proved not to be correct, and the client has refused to give satisfactory explanations or references, the stockbroker is entitled to realise the stock held for his client, and close the account.

Agreements and contracts—Stock Exchange—Gaming transaction—Betting as to the rise and fall of stock.—Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young) on the question whether contracts for the purchase and sale of shares when neither party intends to deliver or accept the shares, but merely to pay the differences according to the rise or fall of the market, is a gambling transaction, so as to deprive the parties of the aid of the Court in questions arising out of them.

IN December 1880, John Risk, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff^{2d Division} Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, against Messrs Auld & Guild, stockbrokers and accountants there, for payment of £416, 15s., as loss and damage sustained by him from the defenders having sold certain stocks belonging to him contrary to his instructions.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 1) "In the month of June 1880, the pursuer employed the defenders to act for him and Peter Craig, Canniesburn Toll, near Glasgow, in the purchase and sale of shares on the Glasgow Stock Exchange. On the pursuer's instructions the defenders purchased fifty shares in the Steel Company of Scotland for the pursuer, and fifty for Mr Craig." (Cond. 2) "Before the arrival of the settling day for these purchases (29th June 1880), Mr Craig, who had previously been in quest of a bond for a sum of money he had lying in bank, received notice from his agents that a bond for £4000 over heritable property could be given to him. Mr Craig and the pursuer inspected the property, and being satisfied that it was a safe investment for the sum mentioned, accepted the security. Craig thereupon expressed a desire to be clear of the Steel shares, and, with a view to relieving him, the pursuer wrote to the defenders inquiring if they would be willing to put into his name the fifty shares standing in Craig's name, and he at the same time offered to lodge money in their hands as security for any loss that might arise. The defenders agreed to put the shares into the pursuer's name, but nothing was said by them about the pursuer's offer of security." (Cond. 4) "The defenders expressed no dissatisfaction with the pursuer or the orders he gave them until 15th July 1880, when he received a letter from them, stating that 'in consequence of information we have to-day received we must ask you to give us a reference as to your position and means, else we must close your account.' After the offer of security which the pursuer had made to the defenders at the commencement of his dealings with them, and which they did not think necessary to accept, the pursuer was very much surprised and annoyed at the position they had taken up, and on 16th July 1880* wrote them to this effect, and also intimated that he did not intend to give them any more orders for purchases on his behalf when the transactions then in hands were closed. He, at the same time, instructed them that 'if the market is good to-day for Huntingtons and Steels you may close them. I will give you instructions further on regarding the Caledonians and Atlantics.' To the instructions contained in this letter the defenders paid no attention; but, contrary to express instructions, at once closed the whole of the pursuer's accounts, notwithstanding that the market was not good for either 'Huntingtons' or 'Steels' on the day in question, and sent him a statement of account shewing a balance of £52, 15s. 4d. in his favour, which sum he declined to accept." (Cond. 5) "On the said 16th July 1880, when the accounts were closed as aforesaid, there stood in the pursuer's name 220 shares of the Steel Company of Scotland, 200 shares of the Huntington Copper Company, 20,000 dollars second Atlantic Bonds.

"The defenders allege that they sold the Steel Company shares on the Glasgow Stock Exchange as follows:—10 shares at £11, 5s., 10 at £11, 2s. 6d., 130 at £11, and 70 at £10, 17s. 6d. Had the defenders attended to the pursuer's instructions, he could have realised £12, 10s. per share for these; and he thus lost, through their breach of duty, the sum of

I rather think you have got bad information, but where a doubt has got hold, instead of giving references or making explanations, as all this has a tendency to unsmooth business between us a little, it will perhaps be better to close, at least for a time, until you may get better information. However, I should not like you to close all at once, as I think this would be imprudent, but we will try to finish up with this account. I expected you would have sold my Huntingtons yesterday; and if they and Steels are good to-day close both. Caledonians and Atlantics I think would be better to go on with until near the close of the account.

"I may say that, except lodging a little money as what I offered you, I never was asked for more before; and had this been proposed at first by you I would have taken it kindlier, as I consider this would not have been out of place, nor do I consider, on the whole, you are far wrong yet, although quite misinformed.—Yours truly, JOHN RISK. The pursuer pleaded;—The defenders having undertaken to act as brokers for the pursuer on the Glasgow Stock Exchange, and having failed to avail themselves of his offer of security made at the commencement of his transactions with them, and they having been guilty of breach of their duty toward the pursuer as his brokers by selling and buying stocks contrary to his instructions, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved, with expenses.

The following were the principal statements by the defenders, with the pursuer's answers:—(Stat. 1) "The defenders were instructed by the pursuer, on or about 16th June last, to purchase on his behalf 100 shares of the Steel Company of Scotland. Fifty of the said shares were to be carried over, and the remainder taken up and paid for. The said shares were duly purchased, and notices of the purchases were sent to the pursuer." (Ans. 1) "Admitted, under the explanation that the 50 shares which were to be taken up as here mentioned were for Mr Craig, and this was known to the defenders." (Stat. 2) "On 22d June the defenders received a letter* from the pursuer stating," &c. "The defenders, in the belief that the said statements were true, and that the pursuer was a person of means, agreed to his request, and did not ask a deposit. The said statements were really untrue, and were made with the object of deceiving the defenders, and of representing that the pursuer was worth £4000, or, at all events, that he had invested or intended to invest that sum on heritable security." (Ans. 2) "Denied. The defenders are called upon to produce the letter here mentioned, which is referred to for its terms." (Stat. 4) "Under the 58th rule of the Glasgow Stock Exchange, the defenders were personally responsible to the brokers from whom they pursuer's account for the due implement of the said purchases and sales."

 (Stat. 5) "Under the 87th rule of the said Exchange it is provided as

(Ans. 4 and 5) "The rules of the Stock Exchange are referred to for their terms, beyond which no admission is made." (The extracts from the rules were afterwards admitted.) (Stat. 6) "As the pursuer had requested the defenders to 'carry over' the purchases which should have been settled upon the 29th June and 14th July, and as the sum for which the defenders were personally liable was large, they caused inquiries to be made as to the pursuer's financial position. The result of these inquiries was not satisfactory." (Ans. 6) "Not known that the defenders made inquiries as to the pursuer's position; but if they did, the information they profess to have received was incorrect, and not such as to have entitled them to act with regard to the said shares in the manner in which they have done. The defenders are called upon to state at whom they made the said inquiries, and what the nature of the information was." (Stat. 7) "On the 15th day of July, the defenders wrote to the pursuer as follows:—'Dear Sir,—In consequence of information we have to-day received, we must ask you to give us a reference as to your position and means, else we must close your account. The information may not be correct, and a reference to your solicitor who offered you a bond for £4000 will doubtless satisfy us.'" (Ans. 7) "Admitted." (Stat. 8) "The pursuer failed on 16th July to furnish the references desired; and with a view to avoid any loss in their transactions with him, as the stocks and shares bought and sold by the defenders were subject to fluctuations in the market, and the Glasgow Stock Exchange was to be closed on the 17th and 19th July, they at once acted upon their intimation of the previous day, and sold the stocks or shares they had purchased, and bought in such stocks or shares as they required to implement sales made by them on his behalf, and closed the account." (Ans. 8) "Denied as stated, with the exception that the defenders closed the pursuer's account. Explained and averred that on said 16th July the pursuer wrote a letter to the defenders, which they are called upon to produce," quoted supra.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer's statements are irrelevant. (2) The defenders, in accordance with the rules of the Stock Exchange, and at common law, were entitled to close the pursuer's accounts upon his failure to furnish them with satisfactory references as to his means and position to meet the obligations undertaken by them on his behalf. (3) The defenders having been induced by the pursuer's representation that he had obtained, or was about to obtain, a heritable bond for £4000, to continue their account with him, and to undertake heavy liabilities on his behalf, were entitled, upon his failure to furnish them with satisfactory references, to close the account.

On 22d January 1881 the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor before answer, allowing parties a proof of their averments.

The defenders appealed to the Sheriff (Clark), who, on 16th February 1881, pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds that it appears on the record that the defenders were induced by misrepresentation on the part of the pursuer that he had the control of means to the extent of £4000, to undertake his employment and act for him: Finds that soon after they discovered that they had been misinformed in this respect, and that, in point of fact, as appears from his own letters in process, he was not possessed of the said means: Finds that, in these circumstances, they were warranted in refusing to proceed farther with his employment, or execute his orders; and therefore finds, in point of law, that he has disclosed on record no relevant case: Sustains, accordingly, the defenders' pleas in law to this effect: Recalls the interlocutor appealed against, and dismisses the action, and decerns," &c.*

No. 138.

Risk v. Auld & Guild.

The pursuer appealed to the Second Division of the Court of Session.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer had stated a relevant case, and ought to be allowed a proof. The rule of the Stock Exchange on which the defenders relied was not in point, as it applied only to cases where persons failed to pay on the settling day, or were admittedly unable to meet their liabilities. This was not the case with the pursuer, at least proof was required on the subject. The defenders, who were employed by the pursuer as his agents, had, by disobeying his orders, involved him in loss; they were therefore liable to him in the amount thereof.¹ Their duty was to have held on till the next settling day.

The defenders argued;—The pursuer's case was irrelevant. There was no contract averred that they should hold the stocks longer than they liked. The 87th rule of the Stock Exchange applied, as in his letters the pursuer had failed to give them satisfactory references as to his means. Further, they had been induced to continue their course of transactions with the pursuer solely by his false representations in the letter of 22d June.

LORD YOUNG.—I must say I have a very clear opinion of this case, and that

* "NOTE.—It is plain from the record that the defenders were induced to act for the pursuer as brokers on a gross misrepresentation, and that if they had continued to act for him they might have incurred responsibilities of a grave kind without any adequate security. The pursuer by his letter induced the defenders to believe that he had the control of £4000. Before executing his orders they, from inquiries made, ascertained that this statement was questionable, and accordingly, before proceeding farther, they grant him an opportunity of satisfying them on the matter. Instead of doing this he wrote them another letter, the plain meaning of which was that their connection had better terminate; seeing they entertained doubts as to the matter in question, and giving them no satisfactory explanation of the state of his means. By the rules of the Stock Exchange referred to, it would appear that the defenders were acting quite within their power when, in these circumstances, they brought their connection with the pursuer to an end—indeed, were it not for such rules, no broker would be in safety to deal with parties as to whose means he was not perfectly informed. I would also notice that the statements in the condescendence, as regards the alleged claim of damages, are very far from being of that clear and distinct kind, more especially in reference to dates, which an action of this kind would require. In short, I do not think that on his own shewing the pursuer has made a case of sufficient relevancy to be remitted to proof."

without having any sympathy for either party. I am not going to make any observations on the matter of gambling in shares, which, in my opinion, the facts as stated here do not press on our consideration. There is no legal or moral objection to persons investing in railway or other shares in the expectation that they will rise in value and may therefore be sold at a profit. But there is gambling of a pernicious description which is very prevalent, and which can only be profitable to brokers, and occasionally to lucky gamblers at the expense of others. That gambling consists in selling stocks which have no existence, the operations being often carried on to an extent greatly exceeding the whole stock of the concern, and the proceeding being simply a betting by one party against the other that the stock will or will not rise in value in the course of a fortnight, and the transaction being settled by the losing party paying the bet to the winner. Sometimes this may be done under circumstances which leave no doubt as to its existence, and yet as there is no possibility of proving it a Court will feel itself bound to aid a party invoking its aid in what is really such a proceeding. But where a case of this most pestilential kind is really disclosed, I apprehend that a Court will refuse to aid the parties. The law is clear. It is stated in two sentences in Addison on Contracts, 7th ed. 209—"A colourable contract for the purchase and sale of railway shares or of goods, where neither party intends to deliver or accept the shares or the goods, but merely to pay the differences according to the rise or fall of the market, is gaming and wagering, and it is for a jury to determine whether the parties really meant to purchase and sell, or whether the transaction was a mere bet upon the future price of the commodity." I look to the record in this action, which is raised by the customer against the broker, and find that the action is for breach of contract, because it is said if the contract had been observed the customer would have made more than he did. The statement might have been so made as to conceal the real nature of the arrangement, and then we should not have been able to get at the gambling in the transaction. But we have a record admitted to be defective, and to require amendment. No Judge is more willing than I to allow an amendment in order to get at the matter really in dispute, but here, in a case where the pursuer, a speculator in Glasgow, is engaged in pure gambling for differences, and the only amendment that can be made is to set out more clearly the arrangement under which he contracted with the broker to assist him in gambling, and where the action is one against the broker for so conducting this gambling that the speculator had not made more than he did make, I am not for allowing any amendment. I am prepared on this ground to hold that there is no relevant case stated.

I agree also with the Sheriff in his other ground of judgment that it is proved on the evidence of the letter before us (which is not explained by an averment so as to let in proof) that the customer deceived the broker, and induced him to lend his credit by a false representation in writing containing a statement which was untrue and calculated to deceive. When a broker has taken up for a customer shares to be paid for on the settling day, he is bound, if the customer does not put him in funds, either to make payment or take the shares himself. When he is selling on what this pursuer frankly calls a "bear" account, he is liable, and pledges his own credit to the person to whom he sells, and therefore to induce him to give such assistance he requires from the customer an assurance of having means. This customer, for the purpose of giving such assurance, wrote to the broker on 22d June 1880—"Some time ago I gave orders for a bond of £3500 to be looked out for me. Yesterday I got notice that I could get £4000, a first bond on good property," and so on. Are those statements true? Not a word of them. Were they intended to deceive? Yes, they were. With what object? To induce the broker to pledge his credit. The broker discovers the truth in July, and sends the letter mentioned—"In consequence of information we have to-day received, we must ask you to give us a reference as to your position and means, else we must close your account. The information may not be correct, and a reference to your solicitor, who offered you a bond for £4000, will doubtless satisfy us." What is his answer? The letter quoted so often, in which he says it is better to close accounts in consequence of the doubt about his position. For a person in that position to bring an action against the broker for not obeying instructions seems to me extravagant.

I think therefore, first, that the action is not relevant; that there is no case for our aid in correcting the statements in record so as to bring out the true point; and that, indeed, there is every reason for refusing that aid. And, in the second place, I am of opinion that on the evidence, prima facie conclusive, under the pursuer's own hand, of the deceit practised by him in order to aid his credit, no explanation of which is given, the Sheriff is right in the finding in fact which he has made.

LORD CRAIGHILL—I am obliged to differ from the conclusion reached by Lord Young and by the Sheriff, for I think that as matters now stand the Sheriff was not warranted in the conclusion at which he has arrived. It might have been that on the pursuer's statements we might have rightly dismissed the action as irrelevant, because not disclosing grounds in law for the conclusion desired—that is, we might have turned the pursuer out of Court on his own statements. Or, again, a defender may be assoilzied without any proof, because of admissions made by the pursuer in answer to the defences which are sufficient to destroy his case. But the specialty of this case is that in order to find the action irrelevant we must go outside the statements and admissions made by the parties on record. Something must be done as if after a proof, though there has been no proof. The Sheriff has taken that course, and I think he is wrong. I am far from saying that the pursuer's case is as full and complete as could be desired, and it was plainly the pursuer's interest to have stated more than he has done. But I am not prepared to say his statements are irrelevant. His case is that he, wishing to buy and sell shares, employed the defenders to act as his brokers, and that they sold shares belonging to him without his authority and to his loss. It may be that on a proof we should find they were quite warranted in doing so, but in order to do so now we must go beyond the pursuer's statements and admissions. No doubt the defenders say they were entitled to sell, first, by the rules of the Stock Exchange, which rules and their application to the case both remain to be proved. They say also that the employment was taken by them in consequence of his misrepresentations. It was quite reasonable that the defenders should make inquiry into the financial position of the pursuer, and, it may be, demand an answer with regard to it. But we have not yet reached the stage of coming to a conclusion on the facts. The Sheriff has taken into consideration a certain letter, and has dealt with it as if there was nothing else in the case. I should like, for my part, to have known what was the information of the defenders, and how they came to be anxious as to the pursuer's position. We are not warranted, I think, in taking these letters as if they contained the whole case. To do so would, in my opinion, be to take something for granted where no proof is allowed—in short, to take the defenders' proof and not the pursuer's—and that is a course to the propriety or justice of which I cannot assent. As to the character of the transactions, I cannot adopt it as a ground of judgment that they are betting transactions, and that therefore no facilities ought to be given by the Court to enable one of the parties or the other to recover that which is due to him. It may be that their true character is what is described by Lord Young, but the pursuer certainly does not say so, and the defenders say the very reverse in statement 1, where they say—"Fifty shares were to be carried over, and the remainder taken up and paid for." With these statements before us I think it would be unjust to both parties if we withheld facilities for proof, or were influenced by considerations which are not properly before us and not determined by proof. I am therefore for reverting to the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This is a somewhat important case, and I am sorry that there should be a difference of opinion upon it. I quite understand the view of Lord Craighill with regard to deciding the case without farther proof. I have, however, come to be of opinion, and that very clearly, that it would be idle to continue the controversy, because there is no further question of facts to be established by proof, and the facts that have been established by the pursuer himself are quite sufficient to support the Sheriff's judgment. In that state of matters if we were to put the parties to the cost of further procedure it would be an unreasonable application of the forms of process, and I, for one, am not by any means inclined to allow it.

In the first place, then, let me say that I greatly sympathise with what Lord Young has said upon the nature of the transaction. No doubt such dealings as these have been for many years a canker in our mercantile community, and have had, and have now, a most pernicious influence. At the same time, I am not prepared to rest any part of my judgment in the case upon these views. The contract was not an illegal one, as far as I can judge from the statement of it, or from the argument directed against it at the bar; indeed it is not stated in the record that it is so. I have referred to the passage in Addison on Contracts, quoted by Lord Young, and find that it is so modified by the passage which immediately follows it that it is impossible to apply it here. In the case of Hibblewhite v. M'Morine, 5 M. and W. 466, there cited, Baron Parke says,—"I cannot see what principle of law is at all affected by a man's being allowed to contract for the sale of goods of which he has not possession at the time of the bargain, and has no reasonable expectation of receiving. Such a contract does not amount to a wager, inasmuch as both the contracting parties are not cognisant of the fact that the goods are not in the vendor's possession; and even if it were a wager it is not illegal, because it has no necessary tendency to injure third parties." In these circumstances I am not inclined to take that ground of judgment. The case here is really "false representation." The pursuer says that he employed the defenders as his brokers, and that they undertook to hold certain stocks over till the next settling day, and that at a time when the balance of the account was in his favour they chose to close the connection and to sell the stocks at a loss, and that on a day between the settling days. The statements are not very clearly made, but still enough is disclosed to shew that the brokers really undertook the defenders' business on a certain belief as to the pursuer's position. The brokers admit the employment, and inferentially admit that they were not entitled to sell these stocks unless something had happened to justify such a course. But they say that they were so justified, on two grounds, first, by misrepresentations by the pursuer, and second, by the fact that instead of resisting the sale he acquiesced in it. Now, unquestionably, on both these grounds proof might have been led, but the Sheriff has found, and Lord Young has given strong reasons for thinking, that because as much as is necessary for judgment has been admitted, and no qualification of those admissions has been or can be stated at the bar, no proof is necessary. Lord Craighill says that it is hard that one party should be allowed proof and not the other, but that is hardly so; for what the Sheriff has found is that on the record no further proof is required. The pursuer wrote a letter to these brokers evidently for the purpose of raising his credit in their eyes. But he has admitted that the statements in that letter were false, that he really had not £4000 of his own, and the brokers discovered that that was so. After that do we require a proof? His statement on record is that another man had a bond for the money and not he. The defenders wrote to him requesting the name of the solicitor who, according to his letter, would grant him the bond. Now, the pursuer had not the courage to face this difficulty, but writes to say that if the defenders were not satisfied with his credit they had better close the connection. Now, looking to the rules of the Stock Exchange, as to which there is no dispute, this false statement, followed by a refusal to give any information, justified the defenders in what they did. There is nothing stated on record which could be sent to proof which could alter the effect of these facts. But, further, the pursuer did not object to the defenders' course of action. On the contrary, he acquiesced in it. On the whole matter I think we should be quite wrong if we allowed the case to proceed further.

Scottish Property Investment Company
Building Society v. Horne.

Right in security—Ex facie absolute disposition—Debtor left in possession—Summary ejection.—A building society held a security for advances to one of its members over heritable property by way of ex facie absolute disposition duly recorded. Their debtor received no proper back-letter, but the rules of the society provided that he should remain in possession on certain conditions, and in the event of his falling in arrear with his instalments and interest, that it should be "in the power of the society, without any warning or legal process of any kind whatever, to enter into possession of the property," "and if such member shall be in the actual possession or occupancy of the premises, to remove him therefrom."

Held that a petition for summary ejection at the instance of the society against their debtor was incompetent.

No. 139.

THE SCOTTISH PROPERTY INVESTMENT COMPANY BUILDING SOCIETY were infeft on a disposition ex facie absolute of certain property in Glasgow belonging to David Horne, builder, Glasgow, including a house, No. 7 Clarendon Street, in which Horne lived. Their disposition, though ex facie absolute, was really in security of a loan made to Horne under the rules of the society, of which he was a member. Horne held no back-bond or letter from the society, but the society's rules with regard to advances provided—(See rules Nos. 33, 34, and 35, quoted at length in the opinion of the Lord President).

Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society v. Horne.

Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

The 61st rule further provided:—"When any member who has obtained an advance allows his instalments and interest, or any disbursements made on his account, to fall into arrear to an extent equal to three months' instalments, it shall be in the power of the society, without any warning or legal process of any kind whatever, to enter into possession of the property in respect of which the advance has been made, and to draw, uplift, and discharge the rents or feu-duties (as the case may be) payable therefrom, and if such member shall be in the actual possession or occupancy of the premises, to remove him therefrom, and let the property to others, or to constitute such member their tenant therein, and allow him to remain in the occupancy at such rent as the directors shall think reasonable and shall fix; which rent shall commence to run and be payable from such previous term as the directors shall determine, and the society shall have the same preference for such rent as landlords by law are entitled to, and shall be entitled to recover the same, by sequestration or other legal process, and, in general, the society shall have full power to act in every respect as absolute proprietors of the property. For these purposes it shall be sufficient to intimate the intention or resolution of the directors to such member by a letter under the hand of the secretary, addressed to him, according to his address as entered in the books of the society; and a certificate, under the hand of the secretary, that such letter was either delivered to such member, or put into the post-office bearing his address, as entered in the books of the society, shall be legal and conclusive evidence of such intimation. After deduction of all payments made and expenses incurred on account of their management of such property the directors shall place the balance to the credit or debit, as the case may be, of the member's account with the society. Upon payment of the whole arrears due in respect of such advance the society's possession shall cease, and the member to whom the advance was made shall be entitled to resume possession."

Horne having, as alleged by the society, fallen more than three months in arrear with his instalments and interest, they brought this petition to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, "to grant warrant to summarily eject and remove" him from the house, No. 7 Clarendon Street, occupied by him.

The society founded on their 61st rule, as quoted above.

Horne denied that he was in arrear, but pleaded as a preliminary defence—(1) The pursuers have no right or title to prosecute the present action. (2) Any disposition held by the pursuers, although ex facie absolute, being only in security, they cannot exercise any right beyond that of an ordinary bondholder. (3) The pursuers are not entitled to use the present proceedings, being ultra vires of an ordinary bondholder.

The Sheriff-substitute (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds the present summary process of ejection incompetent: Sustains accordingly the first plea in law stated for the defender, and dismisses the action."

The Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society appealed to the Court of Session.¹

No. 139.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The leading object of this building society, as specified in May 31, 1888 its rules, is, “by the subscriptions or payments of its members to form a fund” Scottish Property Investment Company v. Horn out of which “members who are desirous of erecting or acquiring dwelling-houses or other heritable property may receive advances upon heritable security by way of mortgage to enable them to do so.” The defender is a member of the society, and there have been transactions of a somewhat complicated character between him and the society. He purchased heritable property of considerable extent, and on the security thereof obtained large advances from the society. The form of security was a disposition ex facie absolute, and there was no back-letter properly speaking. But it is quite clear on the face of the society's rules that the ex facie absolute title was in reality in security merely. I think it necessary that this should be clearly shewn as the basis of the judgment I am to propose. I beg therefore to refer to the 33d, 34th, and 35th of the society's rules :—“(33) Applications for advances shall be in the form No. 2 or No. 3 appended to these rules, accompanied by such specification of the security offered and other information as the directors may require ; and these applications shall be recorded by the manager according to the dates at which they are received by him in a register to be kept for that purpose, and they shall be preferred and disposed of by the directors in the order in which they are recorded. The manager shall have power, before receiving any application for an advance, to require the applicant to deposit with the society the amount of the surveyors' fees. (34) When the directors are satisfied that the property offered is a sufficient security, such property shall be conveyed to the society by absolute disposition, or by bond and disposition in security, or such other deed as the law-agents of the society may require ; and the same, and all other necessary title-deeds relating thereto, shall be deposited with the society ; and the directors shall then give the party who has sold the property, or is to grant the necessary deed, an order on the society's bankers for the amount agreed to be advanced by the directors. (35) No member who has obtained an advance shall be entitled, on any ground whatever, to change or alter the property over which the security of the society extends without the written consent of the directors ; nor shall he, without such consent, be entitled to take a grassum on letting any lease, or to grant any feu of such property, or any portion thereof, to sell or give up any right or pertinent to the property, nor to lease the property for a longer period than five years. Provided always that no lease granted by any member shall be held to be valid or to bind the society, in the event of their having to enter into possession of the property, unless the rent fixed under the same shall have been conditioned as the fair annual value of the property. Such members shall, however, from and after the execution and delivery to the society of the requisite conveyances and title-deeds, as before provided, and so long as these rules are complied with, have power to possess such property, to input and output tenants, and to draw the rents and pursue therefor, but always without prejudice to the preferable right of the society over the same.”

Scottish Property Investment Company
Building Society v. Horne.

Now, it is quite clear that this 35th rule in all its parts applies equally to a security given in the form of an absolute disposition and to one in the form of a bond and disposition in security, and therefore, though under the rules as a member of the society he has granted an ex facie absolute disposition, he is, by force of the 35th rule, entitled to maintain that the conveyance is no more than a security, and not inconsistent with his continuing in possession so long as he fulfils the condition of paying interest and instalments on his loan. Accordingly the defender is just in the ordinary position of a person who has granted an absolute disposition qualified by a back-bond. The 35th rule affords him in this respect all the protection that a back-letter could.

The ground on which the society proceed is that the defender has failed to fulfil the condition by paying interest and instalments. And for the alleged violation of the special agreement as to these, they seek a remedy. What is that remedy? Summary ejection. Now, observe, the defender has a good right to possess unless he has incurred a forfeiture of possession. It is the 61st rule which provides for such forfeiture in the event of a member falling in arrear. But before the 61st rule can be put in operation the ground of forfeiture must be established as matter of fact, and until that is done the right to possess continues. Now, the question is, is this a case for summary ejection? To warrant that, the possession must either be vicious possession, that is, obtained by fraud or force, or precarious possession, i.e., without a title. In this case there is neither. There is no question of vicious possession. A precarious possession is a possession by tolerance merely. But this defender is here in virtue of ownership, and under the rules of the society. The law on this is very clearly settled, and I need only refer to the case of Hally v. Lang, the rubric of which is—"A petition for summary ejection which contained no allegation of vicious or precarious possession without title held incompetent." I need not quote more than the opinion of Lord Deas, who says,—"The first ground on which we must dismiss this petition is that there is not set forth here any such ground of action as, according to the forms of process in the Sheriff Court, will warrant an ejection. An ejection is only competent when a party is either a vicious possessor or a precarious possessor, in the sense of having no title at all, and the party asking ejection must set forth something sufficient ex facie to support his application." I am therefore of opinion that this petition stands properly dismissed.

LORD DEAS.—I should have some difficulty in proceeding on my own opinion in the case of Hally v. Lang, in so far as that opinion seems to proceed a good deal on the action being incompetent in the Sheriff Court. Now, since that case was decided the jurisdiction of the Sheriff has been extended to questions of heritable right relating to subjects of not greater value than £1000. This question is about property of the value of £30 per annum, and therefore presumably of not greater value than £1000. I am therefore disposed to view this case in the same light as if it had been brought in this Court. It thus raises a much larger question than occurred in Hally v. Lang. I think this action is ruled to be incompetent by the case of Wylie—I mean incompetent on principle. A warrant of ejection is not a decree, but a diligence. The question therefore is, whether private parties can make rules for themselves applicable for diligence quite different from those of the ordinary law. If that were so they might make rules of diligence injurious to the interests of the other creditors. Now, under its rules this society may, without any warning whatever, enter into the possession of this defender's property. That is quite inconsistent with the ordinary rules of law, as fully explained in the case of Wylie. I therefore think the Sheriff was right in refusing this petition. No. 139.

LORD MURRAY—The nature of this action is an ejection of the most summary kind known to law, just as in the case of Hally. I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that the forfeiture requires to be established. There are certain circumstances in which it is provided that the society may enter on the possession, and these circumstances must be shewn to have taken place. I concur with your Lordship in resting my opinion on the case of Hally.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced:—"Recall the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 21st August 1880, and all the subsequent interlocutors in the inferior Court, including the interlocutor of 17th February 1881: Dismiss the petition as incompetent, and decern: Find the defender and respondent entitled to expenses in both Courts, and remit to the Auditor to tax the account or accounts of said expenses, and to report."

Provisions to husbands, wives, &c.—Antenuptial marriage-contract—Conveyance of universitas—Subsequent alterations in settlement.—A husband in an antenuptial marriage-contract conveyed his whole means and estate as at the date of his death to trustees, and therefrom provided £150 to his widow, "in full of all legal claims." He directed the residue of the estate to be divided equally among the children of a former marriage, and any children to be born of the present one. Two children were born of this marriage. The husband afterwards executed a trust-settlement, whereby he directed an additional payment of £300 to his widow, and also gave her the liferent of her children's shares of the residue, subject to the burden of alimenting them. Held that this was a fair and reasonable provision for the wife, and not a fraud upon the provisions of the antenuptial contract as regarded the children of the second marriage.

PETER LOWDEN, merchant, Dundee, on the occasion of his marriage with Miss Margaret Wyseley Coupar, his third wife, entered, on 9th March 1870, into an antenuptial contract of marriage, whereby he disposed and conveyed his whole means and estate to trustees for the following purposes:—(1) Payment of debts, funeral expenses, &c.; (2) "that my said trustees shall, as soon as convenient after my death, pay to the said Margaret Wyseley Coupar the sum of £150 in full of all legal claims which she may be entitled to, and of which sum she, by her signature hereto, hereby accepts in full of all her legal claims against me or my said estate as my widow or otherwise; (3) regarding the remainder of my said estate, I direct my trustees, in the event of there being any children of this marriage, to aliment and educate them out of the common fund until the youngest arrives at the age of twelve years, and on such age being attained by the youngest then I direct my said trustees to divide my

Lowden's
Trustees v.
Lowden, &c.

This deed concluded, "(lastly) and as this contract is also my settlement, I recall all other settlements or contracts I have made." The contract was signed by both Peter Lowden and Miss Coupar.

Mr Lowden had three children by his first marriage, none by his second, but two more were born of his marriage to Miss Coupar.

On 17th July 1874 Mr Lowden executed a trust-disposition and settlement, whereby he conveyed his whole means and estate to trustees, directing them (1) to pay debts, &c.; (2) as soon as convenient after his death to dispoise to his widow his dwelling-house in Dundee, to pay her the £150 provided in the contract of 1870, and to allow her to take all the property she had at the time of her marriage as therein also provided, and also allow her the free liferent use of his household furniture, &c.; (3) and (4) to pay to the three children of his first marriage each a fifth share of the free residue of his estate, and to hold and retain two fifth shares of the residue for the two children of his present marriage, but to pay the income thereof to his widow as an alimentary liferent, subject to an obligation on her to maintain and educate her children, and so to relieve his general trust-estate of the undertaking to aliment and educate in the antenuptial contract.

On 28th July 1877 and 12th December 1878 Mr Lowden added codicils to his trust-deed, whereby he bequeathed to his widow a sum of £300 in addition to the former sum of £150 and the liferent use of his house. Both trust-deed and codicils were signed by Mrs Lowden, as well as by the truster, in token of her approval of them.

Mr Lowden died on 17th October 1880, survived by his widow, and three children of his first and two of his third marriage. He left means to the extent of about £7000.

Some difficulty having arisen as to the effect of the above deeds, a special case was prepared and presented to the Court for opinion. To this case the first parties were Mr Lowden's trustees, the second party Mrs Lowden, the third parties Mr Lowden's children by his first marriage, and the fourth parties his children by his last marriage.

The questions of law were:—(1) Whether the first deed has been in its entirety revoked or superseded by the subsequent trust-settlement and codicils? (2) Whether the provisions of the first deed in favour of the third parties hereto have been validly revoked or altered in the manner and to the effect contained in the subsequent trust-settlement and codicils? (3) Whether the provisions of the first deed in favour of the fourth parties hereto have been validly revoked or altered in the manner and to the effect contained in the subsequent trust-settlement and codicils? (4) Whether the second party hereto is entitled to all or any of the additional provisions made in her favour by the trust-settlement and codicils; and whether all or any of the said provisions are to be charged upon the trust-estate in the manner and to the effect directed in the said trust-settlement or codicils; or are any, and which, of the said provisions to be charged exclusively on the shares of residue falling to the third parties hereto? (5) In the event of the answer to the third question being in the negative, are the fourth parties hereto entitled, in addition to the provisions in their favour in the first deed, to take any benefit under the trust-settlement and codicils, and, if so, what? (6) Are the first parties hereto entitled to the sole and exclusive administration and management of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, left by the testator, and to hold and dispose of the said estate to and for behoof of the second, third, and fourth parties hereto, according to their respective rights and interests?"

Lowden's
Trustees v.
Lowden, &c.

Argued for the first, second, and third parties;—The effect of the conveyance in the antenuptial contract of the universitas of his estate by Mr Lowden had not the result of divesting him of all power to alter or increase the provision to his wife.¹ The conveyance of a universitas still left the father in a position to make other provisions, provided they were not a fraud upon the contract under which the conveyance was made. This widow was in any view entitled to aliment out of the estate.

Argued for the fourth parties;—The marriage-contract being an irrevocable onerous deed, Mr Lowden could not alter any of the provisions therein made,² and these children were therefore entitled to get their shares free from the burden of their mother's liferent.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—A number of questions have been presented for our consideration under the branch or head of law which we have been discussing, but I do not think in the circumstances before us they present any material difficulty.

The questions between the parties arise under (1st) an antenuptial contract or deed, dated 9th March 1870, between Peter Lowden, merchant in Dundee, and Margaret Wyseley Coupar, who became his third wife; and (2d) the trust-disposition and deed of settlement of Peter Lowden, dated 17th July 1874, which was also subscribed by his wife, and two codicils thereto, the one dated 28th July 1877, and the other the 12th December 1878. By the first deed Mr Lowden made a provision of £150 to his wife in the event of his death, which has still to be paid; while the result of the settlements as regards Mrs Lowden, if the settlements are also to receive effect, is, that there fall to be added to the £150 a dwelling-house believed to be of the value of £400, the liferent of the household furniture (to cease on her marrying again), a bequest of £300, and the liferent of her own two children's two-fifth shares of the estate.

Six questions are submitted to us, but the principal of these is the fourth—"Whether the second party hereto is entitled to all or any of the additional provisions made in her favour by the trust-settlement and codicils; and whether all or any of the said provisions are to be charged upon the trust-estate in the manner and to the effect directed in the said trust-settlement or codicils; or are any, and which, of the said provisions to be charged exclusively on the shares of residue falling to the third parties hereto?"

Trustees v.
Lowden, &c.

In the first place, the rights of children to general provisions of conquest under a marriage-contract, although they are to a certain extent stateable as debts in certain circumstances, and give a certain amount of jus crediti, do not interfere with the reasonable administration by the husband of his own domestic affairs, and the position of his wife and children.

The real question is, What was the good faith of the obligation undertaken to the wife—for she was the other party—and in favour of the children, who have a right and interest under the deed as being an onerous deed in their favour? What was the real meaning of this deed?

I said in the course of the discussion, and it strikes me very strongly, that one peculiarity of this case is that there was a family by Mr Lowden's previous marriage, and the husband and wife were bargaining about that. And what they bargained was that all were to be put on the same footing at the husband's death—that is to say, that the amount of conquest was to be equally divided. I think it difficult indeed to maintain that that being the nature of the contract, and of the thing contracted for, any effect will be given to that contract which will entirely upset the other deeds, or that they are to upset that contract. The husband here faithfully carried out the contract, with one very trifling exception. His ultimate settlement gives his wife enlarged provisions, but his right to do so was a right that he unquestionably retained notwithstanding the clause in the contract which said that £150 should be paid to her at his death in full of all legal claims “which she may be entitled to, and which sum she, by her signature thereto, hereby accepts in full of all her legal claims against me or my said estate as my widow or otherwise.” The only other thing that can be said is that the children's share to which they will ultimately succeed on the death of their mother is to be liferented by her, she having got a subsequent provision to that effect from her husband, who had power to grant it. I do not think anything more was intended than I have indicated; and, on the whole matter, I am of opinion that the second deed does not go beyond a fair and reasonable construction of the intention of the parties in the marriage-contract, and consequently that the questions should be answered in favour of the widow.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The questions before us are not framed in such a manner as to elicit exactly the answers which I should have supposed—agreeing, as I understand, with your Lordship—it would be desirable to return. For it is asked, first—“Whether the first deed has been in its entirety revoked or superseded by the subsequent trust-settlement and codicils?” And secondly—“Whether the provisions of the first deed in favour of the third parties hereto have been validly revoked or altered in the manner and to the effect contained in the subsequent trust-settlement and codicils?” The third question is, “Whether the provisions of the first deed in favour of the fourth parties hereto have been validly revoked or altered in the manner and to the effect contained in the subsequent trust-settlement and codicils?”

So that all these refer to revocation; and I do not think we have here any question about revocation. The question is as to the extent of liberty which the marriage-contract left the father, and whether he has abused it. I am of opinion that the marriage-contract has left him at liberty to make a reasonable provision for his widow. At the time when he entered into the marriage-contract in question Mr Lowden had been twice married. By his first marriage he had three children alive ; by his second he had none, alive or dead. Apart from No. 140. the provision he made for his wife, he provides that his children by his first marriage, and any children he may have by the marriage he is then entering into, shall share in his fortune equally. That is the whole provision of the contract—that whatever he shall leave at his death, whether it be large or small, or anything at all, he shall leave at his death to his children by whatever marriage he has entered into, and divide it equally among them. That, I say, is the whole provision, apart from the provision to his wife. And the provision to the wife is certainly about the most wonderful I ever saw. It is neither more nor less than a direction to pay her £150, and that then she might go about her business. She is to have a sum of £150 in full of all legal claims which she may be entitled to, and of which sum she, “by her signature hereto, accepts in full of all her legal claims against me or my estate, as my widow or otherwise.”

Now, I say I have rarely seen such a provision made in favour of a widow by an antenuptial contract of marriage. Suppose there had been none at all, I do not think the contract otherwise would have prevented the husband from making rational provision in favour of the unprovided-for widow. Indeed, that is too clear to be matter of argument. He might, notwithstanding the terms of the contract, have made a provision in favour of his widow, assuming that she was not provided for. But here we have a provision in favour of the widow, and it amounts to the sum of £150. I think that is not a rational provision. I do not understand how it has got into the deed. One almost is led to suppose it must have been £150 a-year that was meant. It might, however, have been 150s. for that matter. Does the contract preclude him from increasing, or tie him up so that he shall not increase, this ridiculously inadequate provision to a reasonable one? I think not. Upon the same principle that he could have made a provision in her favour in the absence of any provision whatever, I think he is at liberty to increase up to a rational amount this provision of £150. And that was what he proceeded to do, with the concurrence of the wife herself, three or four years after the contract was entered into. And he certainly made a provision in her favour moderate enough. The provision was, that whatever shares of his estate her own children should be entitled to upon the footing of the equality which had been bargained for between him and her in the marriage-contract, she should have the liferent of, under an obligation to maintain those children. That I think a fair and rational provision, and not contra fidem tabularum nuptiarum, and quite within the power of the husband, and that without any revocation of the former deed, but in the exercise of the liberty which he possessed notwithstanding the former deed. I am not prepared to give proper expression to it at this moment, but I should have wished that the question had been put somewhat in this form—Whether the deed of 1874 is contrary to the husband's right, or an excess of the liberty that was left to him after the execution of the deed of 1870? I should be prepared to answer that question by saying that he was not by the deed of 1870—that is, by the marriage-contract—precluded from making the deed of 1874, which accordingly, in my opinion, ought to receive effect.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I have arrived at the same opinion. I am glad that I have been able to do so, because, apart altogether from any legal consideration, the deed granted by the late Mr Lowden as a testamentary deed was reasonable in itself, and satisfied in a reasonable way the claims of all who came under it.

Lowden, &c.

No. 140. The deed is one as regards the terms and meaning of which there is no controversy between the parties.

June 1, 1881.
Lowden's
Trustees v.
Lowden, &c.

It appears that the testator had entered into three marriages. In regard to the third, he had entered into an antenuptial marriage-contract, by which he made provisions, in the first place, for his wife, and, in the next place, for the children of the marriage, and at the same time for the issue of his previous marriage with Miss Mudie.

The question that has arisen here is, whether or not the hands of the testator were tied up when he made the trust-deed, so that he was prevented from doing anything which, as regards the widow and as regards the children of their marriage, was inconsistent with the provisions to be found in the antenuptial marriage-contract. I think that, so far as regards the wife and children of the marriage, that was a contract and not a testament. It is also clear that that which was left to the trustees or conveyed to the trustees for the purposes set forth in the marriage-contract was the universitas of Mr Lowden's succession. And it is established that where universitas is in such circumstances as the universitas here, then the estate is subject to the reasonable acts and deeds of the person whose it is.

That being so, I am of opinion that the testator was entitled to increase the provision that was given by the marriage-contract in favour of his wife. It was the best thing that could have happened for all concerned, because, as has been suggested by my brother Lord Young, the provision for his wife in that deed is no provision at all. So far as appears, the wife had no fortune of her own, and £150 could not by any possibility maintain her until the end of her days, and when once it was spent, then, if there was no other provision for her, she must have turned on the estate left by her husband, and claimed as matter of law what he has wisely left her as matter of provision under the deed of 1874. Of course if it had turned out that the provision was unreasonable, that, so to speak, it had robbed others to enrich the wife, the law would not confirm such an exercise of the power which the husband possessed. But these provisions given in the end are not more than reasonable provisions, and ought to be sustained.

The difficulty I had was with regard to the imposition of that portion of the provision which was created in favour of the wife upon the two-fifths of the estate left to the children of the marriage. But, everything taken into account, and looking at the powers which the husband unquestionably has over all parts of the succession, I quite agree with your Lordships in thinking that as regards the effect the thing cannot be interfered with as being contrary to the faith of the contract.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the party thereto of the second part is entitled to the additional provisions made in her favour by the trust-disposition and settlement of Peter Lowden, dated 17th July 1874, and the two codicils thereto, the one dated 28th July 1877 and the other dated 12th December 1878, and that the said provisions are to be charged upon his trust-estate in the manner and to the effect thereby directed; and that the parties of the first part are entitled to the sole and exclusive administration and management of the whole estate, heritable and moveable, left by the said Peter Lowden, and to hold and dispose of the same to and for behoof of the parties of the second, third, and fourth parts according to their respective rights and interests : No. 140.

Process—Caution for expenses—Bankrupt—Trust for creditors—Bankrupt suing trustee to account.—A bankrupt who had granted a voluntary trust-deed for behoof of creditors sued his trustee to account for a balance of funds which he alleged was in the trustee's hands. Held that he was entitled to sue the action without finding caution for expenses.

hoof of creditors. Alexander M'Intosh was the trustee nominated in the Sheriff of deed, and he accepted the trust, and proceeded to administer the estate. Midlothian.

On 11th January 1881 Ritchie raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Midlothian calling on M'Intosh to account for his intromissions with the estate, and alleging that he had £800 of funds as a balance in his hands. The condescendence contained various averments of malversation, &c., against the trustee, and it was also therein stated by Ritchie that his creditors had been paid in full, and that the above balance remained.

M'Intosh defended the action, and, besides denying Ritchie's statement, pleaded ;—(2) The pursuer being insolvent, and having denuded himself of his whole estate, is bound to find caution before proceeding further with the present action.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hallard), on 4th March 1881, appointed Ritchie to find caution for expenses, and afterwards, on his failure to do so, on 25th March assolizied the defender.

On 4th April 1881 the Sheriff (Davidson), on appeal, recalled this last interlocutor, and of new appointed Ritchie to find caution for expenses. On 6th May the Sheriff-substitute again, in respect of Ritchie's failure to implement the Sheriff's interlocutor of 4th April, assolizied the defender.

Ritchie appealed to the Court of Session, and argued ;—The trustee here was the creature of the cedent, and was bound to account to him when called on.

Argued for M'Intosh ;—The pursuer was practically a bankrupt. The general rule was, that a person who was divested must find caution for expenses.¹

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—On the question as it is presented here I have no difficulty of any kind, because a trustee in such a position is nothing but the creature of his author. The creditors may have a jus quæsitum under such a deed, but no such point is under consideration. The trustee cannot object to account when he has received the estate upon condition of accounting. It is not for him to say that by receiving the estate he has divested his author, and that therefore that author cannot sue him for an accounting without finding

M'Intosh.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. I must confess I am amazed at the judgments of the Sheriffs, who have manifestly misapprehended the law on this subject. No doubt it is the practice both in this Court and in the Sheriff Court not to allow a party divested of his property to sue an action except upon the condition—but not always on the condition—of finding caution for expenses. The reason is, that in such a case the party so divested is usually seeking to recover for himself something which is included in his conveyance to another. For example, a bankrupt who is legally divested of his estate has sometimes brought an action, saying the trustee is no doubt the proper person to sue this action, because the right is vested in him, but he improperly refuses to make this claim, and I ask leave to make it myself. This observation applies equally to the case of a person who is divested by a voluntary trust-deed. The person truly vested in the claim refuses to make it, and so prima facie it cannot be considered a good claim. The Court, in that case, may allow the divested person to make the claim, but only on finding caution for expenses. Here, however, the person suing is divested, but he is suing his own trustee and calling on him to pay over an alleged balance, which he says is in the trustee's hands. Can it be said that his right to call upon his trustee to account for a balance said to be in his hands was so conveyed to the trustee as to make him the proper person to sue for it? If the action is rightly founded, the pursuer here, and no one else, has the true interest. The right is in him, and he is only seeking to make good a right of which he never was divested. To say the contrary is to make a proposition outwith the rules of good sense and authority.

There is always a power in the Court to order a party to find caution for expenses, but absolute impecuniosity is never the sole reason for such an order. The conduct of the cause may be such, or other matters may transpire, which make such an order necessary, but absolute impecuniosity will never be taken as the sole ground for making a party find caution for expenses. That is a rule which I remember hearing the first Lord Mackenzie lay down very much in the same terms as I have now used.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—I concur in the conclusion to which your Lordships have come, and in all the observations made in explanation of the grounds of judgment.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the judgments of the Sheriffs appealed against, and decern: Find the appellant (pursuer) entitled to expenses in this Court, and also in the inferior Court, from 4th March 1881, the date of the interlocutor closing the record."

Entail—Agreement between heir in possession and apparent heir—Heir and Executor.—An heir of entail in possession expended certain sums in improvements, and entered into an agreement with his son, the apparent heir, whereby the latter bound himself, “his heirs and successors, succeeding to” the estate, to repay the same. The son died without succeeding to the estate, but his eldest son succeeded his grandfather as heir of entail. Held that neither the grandson who succeeded to the estate, nor the personal representatives of the son, were bound by the agreement to repay the sum expended.

Entail—Succession—Collation—Heir alioquin successurus.—The heir of entail in possession of an estate by his settlement bequeathed a third of the residue of his free means to his son (who was then heir-apparent to the entailed estate), “partly in consideration of the burdens he will be subjected to on his succeeding me” in the entailed estate, “and to his heirs, executors, and successors.” The son predeceased, leaving three children, the eldest of whom succeeded to the entailed estate on the death of his grandfather. In a question between him and the other two children as to whether he could take a share of the grandfather's bequest without collating his life interest in the entailed estate, held (diss. Lord Young) that there was here no room for the doctrine of collation, as the heir of entail was entitled to a share of the residue in consequence of the expressed will of the testator.

Observations (per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Young) on the case of Blair v. Blair, Nov. 16, 1849, 12 D. 97, 21 Scot. Jur. 612.

ON 6th March 1851, by interlocutor of Court on a petition presented ^{2^d DIVISION.} under the Rutherford Act, the late Sir John Sinclair of Dunbeath, Bart., with consent of his three sons then alive, viz., John Sinclair, Alexander Young Sinclair, and George Sinclair, disentailed the estate of Barrock, in the county of Caithness. Thereafter, and in terms of the agreement entered into between Sir John Sinclair and his sons, Sir John, after borrowing on the security of the said estate £6000, on 14th July 1851 re-entailed the estate in favour of himself, “whom failing, of John Sinclair, lieutenant in the 39th Regiment of Madras Native Infantry, my eldest son, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to Alexander Young Sinclair, lieutenant and adjutant of the 26th Regiment of Bombay Native Infantry, my second son, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing, to George Sinclair, lieutenant in the 63d Regiment of Bengal Native Infantry, my third son, and the heirs-male of his body; whom failing,” as therein mentioned. And he thereby, in terms of the agreement, renounced all right to “burden the said lands and estate with any sum or sums of money for improvements, or for any purpose whatever other than the amounts which have been or may be borrowed under the Drainage Acts passed or that may be passed,” and for such provisions as he had made, or might, by virtue of any law or any Act of Parliament, be entitled to make in favour of his widow and younger children. Sir John was duly infeft under this entail.

On 3d March 1856, an agreement was entered into between Sir John and his eldest son, John Sinclair, whereby, on the narrative that it was advisable to have a corn and meal mill erected at How on the estate, which it was estimated would cost £700, it was agreed that Sir John should borrow this sum, and his son John should grant him a promissory-note for £700, and on his succeeding to the estate should pay off the loan without having any claim against Sir John or his personal representatives. A similar agreement was entered into between Sir John and his second son, Alexander Young Sinclair, dated 15th November and 25th December 1856, Alexander Young Sinclair, granting his father a promissory-note for £700, and becoming bound, in the event of his succeeding to the estate, to pay off the £700 without claim against Sir John or his personal representatives.

On 1st February 1861—the eldest son, John Sinclair, having in the meantime died—Sir John and his two surviving sons, Alexander Young and George, entered into another agreement. This document proceeded on the narrative of the former agreements, and also contained a statement that Sir John had expended £1400 in erecting a farm-steading at Quintfall on the estate. The sons then bound themselves as follows:—“Primo, I, the said Alexander Young Sinclair, the nearest heir in succession to the said entailed estate, and I, the said George Sinclair, as at present next in succession to him, do hereby corroborate and confirm the said agreement between the said Sir John Sinclair and Alexander Young Sinclair, which is dated the 15th day of November and 25th day of December 1856, in the whole heads, clauses, and contents thereof; and of new I, the said Alexander Young Sinclair, in the event of me or the heirs of my body succeeding to the said entailed estate, and I, the said George Sinclair, in the event of me or the heirs of my body succeeding to the said entailed estate, do hereby become bound to content and pay, as we do hereby in the events foresaid respectively bind and oblige ourselves, and our heirs and successors, to content and pay the said principal sum of £700 sterling to the executors of our said father, with the interest of the said principal sum from and after his death, aye and until payment: Secundo, And in consideration of the said advances made by the said Sir John Sinclair upon the improvement of the said estate in the parish of Wick, and in the erection of the steading on the farm of Quintfall, do hereby respectively as aforesaid become bound, as we do hereby bind and oblige ourselves, and our heirs and successors succeeding to the said entailed estate as aforesaid, to content and pay the further principal sum of £1000 sterling to the executors of our said father, with the interest of the said principal sum from the time of his death aye and until payment.”

Sir John Sinclair died on 21st April 1873. He was survived by his widow, Lady Sinclair, and by the widow and three children of his son Alexander Young Sinclair. He left a trust-deed, dated 22d March 1867, whereby, in the fourth place, he provided:—“With regard to the residue and remainder of my said estate and effects, heritable and moveable, above conveyed, including therein, when free, the capital sum or sums lent out or invested to meet the said liferents in favour of the said Dame Margaret Learmonth or Sinclair, and such capital sum or sums which may have been invested to meet the foresaid annuities or any of them, in the event of my trustees considering it expedient to provide for all or any of the said annuities in that way, I direct and appoint my trustees to pay, assign, and dispose one third part thereof to the said Major Alexander Young Sinclair” (afterwards Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander Young Sinclair), “my son, partly in consideration of the burdens he will be subjected to on his succeeding me in the said entailed estates of Barrock, and to his heirs, executors, and successors; and the remaining two-third parts thereof to the said Captain George Sinclair, my second son, and his heirs, executors, and successors.”

Lady Sinclair—Sir John's widow—who was also one of his trustees, on 23d December 1875, in order to avoid any question between Sir John's obligation to free and relieve them of all responsibility in connection with June 7, 1881.

 the other sum of £1000, should they be made responsible for not enforcing Sinclair's payment thereof. Trustees v.
 Sinclair, &c.

After Lady Sinclair's death, Sir John's trustees began to arrange for dividing the residue, and difficulties having arisen as to who was to pay the £1000, and to whom the shares of residue under his settlement were to be paid, a special case was prepared and presented to the Court. The parties to the case were (1) Sir John Sinclair's trustees; (2) the widow of Alexander Young Sinclair; (3) Sir John Rose George Sinclair, Bart., the eldest son of Alexander Young Sinclair; and (4) Margaret and Norman Sinclair, Alexander Young Sinclair's younger children, and their curator bonis and factor loco tutoris.

The questions of law in the case related to two different matters:—(1) As to the liability for the £1000 above mentioned. This was dealt with under questions 1 and 2, which were as follows:—"1. Whether the party of the second part, as representing the personal representatives of the said Alexander Young Sinclair, is liable in payment of the said sum of £1000 above mentioned, with the interest thereof from the date of Sir John Sinclair's death? 2. Whether the party of the third part, as heir of the body of the said Alexander Young Sinclair, who has succeeded to the said entailed estate of Barrock, is liable in payment of the said sum of £1000 and interest?" (2) As to the succession to residue under Sir John's settlement. The remaining questions related to this, and were:—"3. Whether the third part or share of the residue of the estate of Sir John Sinclair, payable to the 'heirs, executors, and successors' of Colonel Alexander Young Sinclair, is divisible equally among his children, the parties of the third and fourth parts, without collation by the party of the third part? or 4. Whether the party of the third part is bound, as a condition of receiving an equal share, to collate the value of his life interest in the entailed estate to which he succeeded on the death of the testator?"

On these points the trustees (first parties) maintained, with respect to the £1000, alternatively, that the general representatives of Alexander Young Sinclair, represented by his widow (second party), were bound to pay the £1000 with the interest; or (2) otherwise that Sir John Rose Sinclair (third party) the eldest son of Alexander Young Sinclair, as heir of entail who had succeeded to and was in possession of the estate of Barrock, was bound to pay the £1000 and interest.

Mrs Sinclair and Sir John Rose Sinclair (second and third parties) maintained, on the other hand, that the obligation by Alexander Young Sinclair, with respect to the £1000, was not enforceable either against Alexander Young Sinclair's personal representative or the heir of entail. Mrs Sinclair did not admit that the amount of the estate of Colonel Alexander Young Sinclair was sufficient to meet the claim for £1000 and interest, in the event of its being held liable therefor; but it was agreed that all questions as to the amount of the estate should be reserved.

With regard to the division of the one-third of the residue of Sir John's estate bequeathed to Alexander Young Sinclair and his heirs, executors, and successors, Sir John Rose Sinclair, Alexander Young Sinclair's eldest son, maintained that he was entitled to an equal share of residue along with his brother and sister.

The brother and sister (fourth parties) maintained that their elder brother was only entitled to an equal share of residue on his collating the value of his life interest in the entailed estate to which he had succeeded on the death of Sir John Sinclair, their grandfather.

No. 142.

Sinclair's
Trustees v.
Sinclair, &c.

Argued for the first parties on the question as to the £1000;—The charge clearly fell on the general representatives of Alexander Young Sinclair, because where an heir of entail in possession professes to bind himself and the heirs of entail, he only in reality binds himself and his general representatives.¹

Argued for the second party;—The liability failed entirely, as any obligation undertaken was only to come into force in the event of Alexander Young Sinclair succeeding to the estate, which he never did.

Argued for the third party on the question of collation;—Collation did not apply here. It only came in in questions of intestacy. Further, Sir John Rose Sinclair took here directly, as one of his father's heirs in mobilibus, under a bequest from his grandfather. He might have been bound to bring into "hotchpot" everything that he took as heir-at-law of his father, but he took nothing in that capacity. All the heritage he took he took from his grandfather.²

Argued for the fourth parties on the question of collation;—The case of *Blair*³ extended the obligation to collate to cases where the moveable estate had been left by will, and the case of *Little-Gilmour*³ had already extended it to cases of entailed estates where the heir was alioquin successurus. Sir John Rose Sinclair was therefore bound to collate his life interest in the entailed estate before he could share in the moveable bequest from the grandfather.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this special case there are four parties—first, the trustees of the late Sir John Sinclair of Dunbeath, who was heir of entail in possession of the estate; the second is the widow of Colonel Alexander Young Sinclair, who was the second son—ultimately the eldest son by the death of his brother—of Sir John Sinclair, the heir of entail; the third is the heir at present in possession, Sir John Rose Sinclair, who is the eldest son of Colonel Sinclair; and the fourth are the younger children of Colonel Sinclair for their interest in this matter.

There are substantially two questions that arise, one of them, which I shall afterwards speak to, of considerable interest.

The first two questions relate to a special agreement made between Sir John, the heir in possession of the entailed estate, and his then eldest son, and also his second and third sons, in regard to certain burdens upon the entailed estate. I need not go in detail into the transactions between the father and the sons; but the substance of it is this, that the entailed estate of Barrock, under the authority of the Rutherford Act, with the consent of the eldest and second sons, was burdened with £6000, and Sir John undertook, in the transaction by which the disentail was effected, to lay no additional burden on the Barrock estate for improvements or otherwise; but finding that there were certain matters that were urgently required for the benefit of the estate, he entered into an agreement in the year 1856 with his eldest son in regard to the building of a mill at How,

² Little-Gilmour v. Little-Gilmour, Dec. 13, 1809, F. C. 1 Bell's App. 102; Anstruther v. Anstruther, Jan. 20, 1836, 14 Sh. 272, aff. Aug. 16, 1836, 2 Sh. and M'L. 396; Blair v. Blair, Nov. 16, 1849, 12 D. 97, 21 Scot. Jur. 612; Ersk. 3, ix. 3.

The building of the mill was valued at £700. The result was that his eldest son, then John Sinclair, undertook, in the event of his succeeding to the estate, to become liable for this sum. Afterwards the second son undertook a similar obligation conditionally upon his eventually succeeding to the estate. Then after the death of John Sinclair the final agreement was come to in February 1861 which is the subject of the first two questions that arise here.

I must really say that I have endeavoured to arrive at the meaning of that instrument with very little success, and at this moment I am totally unable to say, at least with any amount of confidence, what it was that the conveyancer intended to express by the very enigmatical words which are used in that deed.

However, we must take it as we find it. By this minute of agreement between Sir John Sinclair and his two surviving sons, Alexander and George, after narrating the former agreements, and setting forth that it is reasonable that they, the two sons Alexander and George, should grant these presents, "do hereby corroborate and confirm the said agreement between the said Sir John Sinclair and Alexander Young Sinclair, dated the 15th day of November and 25th day December 1856, in the whole heads, clauses, and contents thereof; and of new, I, the said Alexander Young Sinclair, in the event of me or the heirs of my body succeeding to the said entailed estate, and I, the said George Sinclair, in the event of me, or the heirs of my body, succeeding to the said entailed estate, do hereby become bound to content and pay, as we do hereby in the events foresaid respectively bind and oblige ourselves, and our heirs and successors, to content and pay the said principal sum of £700 sterling." To say that that was done of new is an entire blunder, for no such thing had been undertaken by the prior agreements in any sense. The prior agreements were entirely dependent on the heir himself, the party bound, succeeding to the estate, and no such condition or event as the heirs of his body succeeding to the entailed estate was in contemplation at all. That was entirely a new thing. I do not know what meaning is to be attached to "in the event of me or the heirs of my body succeeding." I do not know, I say, what that means, because Alexander Sinclair and George Sinclair might have predeceased the heir in possession by many years, and the idea that the winding-up of their personal succession was to remain over until it was seen whether any of their sons succeeded to the entailed estate, is to my mind a notion that never could have been entertained by a man of business. Therefore I am inclined to read that part of the agreement pro non scripto. I do not think it has any meaning, and I do not see how it could by any possibility occur to any practical conveyancer.

The widow paid the £700, and there is no question about it now. But then we come to a question of somewhat more moment. The only importance of the particular clause to which I have adverted is to be found in its bearing upon the next, which was intended, as I think it must have been, to operate precisely the same kind of obligation. It runs thus:—"And in consideration of the said advances made by the said Sir John Sinclair upon the improvement of the said estate in the parish of Wick, and in the erection of the steading on the farm of Quintfall, do hereby respectively as aforesaid become bound, as we do hereby bind and oblige ourselves, and our heirs and successors succeeding to the said entailed estate as aforesaid, to content and pay the further principal sum of £1000 sterling."

It is impossible to exaggerate the want of intelligibility in this clause. -It would seem to imply that the heirs and successors had been bound in the prior clause. But there is not a word to bind them in the former clause, and yet here they, "as aforesaid," become bound and bind themselves, their heirs, and successors succeeding to the estate. It is perfectly plain that nothing of that kind could have been intended, because, if Alexander Sinclair had the power to bind the heirs of entail, much more had the heir in possession. It must have been perfectly well known that there was no power whatever to do that; and I am quite persuaded that there is nothing here but the most slipshod and inaccurate language.

The conclusion I come to is, that the only intention of either of these two obligations was to bind the two heirs, the obligants, in the event of their individually succeeding to the entailed estate; and as Colonel Sinclair did not succeed to the entailed estate I am of opinion that his personal representatives were not responsible for either of these obligations.

I am of opinion, therefore, that we must answer the first and second questions to the effect that neither the heir nor the personal representatives of Alexander Young Sinclair are responsible for this sum of £1000.

I have come to that conclusion with some amount of difficulty, because I felt I was dealing with a clause the precise words of which have little meaning. I cannot find the heirs of entail liable when the executors are not. Nor do I see how I can say that in the event of one of the heirs of the body succeeding to the entailed estate at an indefinite period that is to be made a condition of the liability.

But then we come to a question of a different kind, and one involving much more important interests so far as the law is concerned, and that is the third question—"Whether the third part or share of the residue of the estate of Sir John Sinclair, payable to the heirs, executors, and successors of Colonel Alexander Young Sinclair, is divisible equally among his children, the parties of the third and fourth parts, without collation by the party of the third part?"

It will be observed that the question relates solely to the interests of the younger children of Alexander Sinclair. It arises in reference to the personal succession of the late Sir John Sinclair, but it is not stated or maintained on behalf of the next of kin of Sir John; but the younger children of his son Alexander, who have no right in this money but that of legatees, now make this claim against their brother.

The subject-matter of this question is a legacy left by Sir John Sinclair in a will executed by him in the year 1867, after the date of the agreements we have referred to. He left a trust-deed, the trustees under which are parties here; and after leaving to his wife the liferent of the whole of his property, he proceeds as to the residue:—"I direct and appoint my trustees to pay, assign, and dispose one-third part thereof to the said Major Alexander Young Sinclair" (afterwards Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander Young Sinclair), "my son, partly in consideration of the burdens he will be subjected to on his succeeding me in the said entailed estate of Barrock, and to his heirs, executors, and successors; and the remaining two-third parts thereof to the said Captain George Sinclair, my second son, and his heirs, executors, and successors."

There is no ambiguity in this bequest. The parties interested in testing its validity were the next of kin of Sir John Sinclair, but apparently no question has been raised upon that matter. At least the trustees, who are parties in this case, have said nothing about it. The legacy, they therefore seem to think, must be paid according to its terms. Its terms seem to admit of no doubt. Failing Alexander Sinclair, who predeceased his father, his heirs, executors, and successors are conditionally instituted in the right of the legacy ; and this leaves the only question to be, who Alexander Sinclair's heirs, executors, and successors are. Sinclair's

Trustees v.
Sinclair, &c.

Now, as Alexander Sinclair left no heritage, his heirs, executors, and successors in mobilibus are his children, or next of kin, including the eldest son. This is apparently not disputed by the younger children in terminis, and, as I think, it seems to conclude the controversy between them.

But it is contended for Alexander Sinclair's younger children that although their father left no heritage, and although they are in no sense next of kin of Sir John Sinclair, whose succession is in question, they are entitled in the division of this legacy, when paid over, to exclude their elder brother, unless he throw in the entailed estate, which he did not derive from their father, and in which they cannot and never could have had the slightest interest through him.

It is too plain, I think, to require illustration, that if there could be room for this plea of collation as regards this legacy, it is one competent only to the next of kin of Sir John Sinclair. Had there been place for the plea at all, they, the next of kin of Sir John, might have insisted that the third party here was bound, as a condition of drawing his share of the legacy, to collate with them the value of the life interest in the entailed estate which he took as heir of his grandfather, or as alioquin successurus to him ; but this plea, if it had been effectual, would not have enlarged the shares of Colonel Sinclair's younger children, but would have increased the residue of Sir John Sinclair's estate.

But even if the demand had been so stated—and it may be that these younger children, as well as the eldest son, may by the failure of the rest of Sir John Sinclair's family be in a position so to state it—there would have been no ground on which it could have been maintained. It must have failed, first, because the third party here claims nothing as next of kin of his grandfather, and it is only to such claims that collation between heir and executor applies ; and secondly, because the conditions under which this legacy was left were dependent entirely on the testator's intention, and the settlement indicates no intention on his part so to limit the bequest, but, as I think, exactly the reverse. As regards the first of these points, it is necessary to recur for a moment to the principle, elementary as it is, on which this rule or law of collation between heir and executor depends. It is a matter entirely peculiar to the technical rules of the Scotch law of real property and personal succession. But its operation and limits have been very clearly fixed by authority. Collation—the right to collate heritage—is the privilege of the heir who has succeeded to the heritable property of a defunct. The right is a limitation of the general rule that the heir is excluded from sharing with the other next of kin in the pars legitima of a parent's moveable succession. The rules of our common law carry heritable estate to the heir to the exclusion of the other children, and the moveable estate to the other children to the exclusion of the heir. But, in a question with the other children or next of kin, the rule is the same, that the heir in heritage is excluded from sharing in the legitim, and, if the dead's part is not tested on, the right of the next of kin will exclude the heir there also. But, as the heir is in blood one of the next of kin, he is allowed the privilege of collating what he takes as heir, and betaking him-

No. 142. self to his character of next of kin on condition of throwing the heritage or its value into the general succession.

Sinclair's
Trustees v.

But this right is entirely in the option of the heir, and the next of kin cannot compel him to exercise it. One sentence from Lord Stair sufficiently explains the foundation of our law on this subject. He says—"Heirs are excluded from the bairn's part though in the family, because of their provision by the heritage, except in two cases—first, if the heir renounce the heritage in favour of the remanent bairns, for then the heir is not put in a worse position than they, but they come in pari passu both in heritable and moveable rights, which is a kind of collatio bonorum." The second case he refers to is when the heir is an only child, and combines both characters. Excepting in those two instances the heir is excluded from sharing in the personal estate. The same kind of doctrine is given at greater length by Erskine, b. iii, t. 9, s. 3, and by Bell in his Commentaries, vol. i., 5th ed., p. 101.

But, as the heir's privilege to collate is only available or necessary to enable him to assert his right as one of the next of kin, it cannot extend to rights from which the next of kin are excluded, and therefore cannot possibly have any place in testate succession. The best test of this is to take the case of a legacy left to the heir nominatim. The heir is not excluded, and has no privilege to assert and no claim to purchase. The next of kin have no claim to it, and have consequently no consideration to give. The legacy must be paid secundum formam doni, and the intention of the donor or testator is the only rule. In the passage I have already referred to Mr Bell states this as settled law. He says—"The privilege of collation may be excluded by the will of the deceased where he has the uncontrolled power of disposing of his moveables. Thus, if the will bequeath legacies, and leave the residue to an executor or residuary legatee, or clearly bequeath the succession to the next of kin as specifically under the will, the heir will have no right to demand collation." This passage touches the question very closely, for it exhibits so strongly the rule that collation cannot apply in testate succession that, if Sir John Sinclair had left his moveables by will to his next of kin as a class, Colonel Sinclair would not have been entitled to any share even by collating his interest in the entailed estate.

But here the case is wholly different. The legatees in this special legacy are not the next of kin of the testator, but certain children of another, who are described as the heirs, executors, and successors of their father. This is a mere designation, which, when its meaning is determined, is equivalent to nomination. But its meaning admits of no doubt, because, as Colonel Sinclair left no heritable property, his eldest son had from the first all the rights of one of the next of kin.

On this first head, therefore, I am of opinion that there is no room for the doctrine of collation here, because this special legacy is testate succession, taking effect solely by the expressed will of the testator.

But, secondly, it appears to me very clear that the intention of the testator was that the succession of the legatee to the entailed estate should not affect his right to the legacy. On the contrary, in the case of the institute the will bears that the legacy was given in the prospect of his succession to the entailed estate. I could have understood the younger children maintaining that the words "heirs, executors, and successors," as they related to moveable succession, were primarily to be understood of the younger children and not of the heir—in which case, as the heir was not included in the bequest, he could have no interest in a legacy which was not left to him. But that has not been maintained here, because the intention to the contrary very clearly appears. Here the legacy was expressly given in aid of burdens connected with the title to the land. The conditional institutes were simply to take in all respects as the institute would have taken, and I cannot read into this bequest a condition which seems equally opposed to the legal construction of the instrument and the manifest intention of the author of it. In a word, the fallacy of the argument for the younger children seems to me to consist in confounding two things which are entirely distinct—the designation of the legatees with the rights conferred only by the will. The legatees take no right of inheritance through their nearness of kin to their father; their right of succession comes to them solely by virtue of the bequest. Yet are they quite accurately designed, in the words of the will, the “heirs, executors, and successors” of their father, and would be so however barren the character might be. The identity of the persons favoured being ascertained, their patrimonial interest flows entirely from the intention of the testator.

Trustees v.

I must not conclude, however, without saying a word on the case of Blair, without which, indeed, the argument for the younger children could scarcely have been plausibly maintained.

The substance of that decision, as far as it relates to the present question, is this—a lady left a mixed succession to the heirs and successors of a relative. The eldest son claimed the whole on the faith of certain informal writings, which was not allowed. He was preferred, however, to a certain leasehold property to which he was entitled under the words of the will. He then proposed to collate this heritage and participate in the general succession. This was allowed, on grounds which I am entirely unable to follow. The decision is most imperfectly reported—Lord Cockburn strongly remonstrating against it; and the grounds stated by the Lord Justice-Clerk Hope are such that I can hardly believe he is accurately reported. He is reported as saying, in direct opposition to the law as laid down by all the institutional writers, and every case, as far as I am aware, decided on the subject, that “collation is not confined to intestate succession, for an heir of entail must collate.” I greatly doubt if he so expressed himself; for so far as the remark bears on the case it was inaccurate, and so far as it was accurate it has no application to it. The rule that an heir of entail must collate, coupled with the qualification required to make it accurate, proves, what indeed was not in question, that the heir's obligation to collate is in principle limited to intestate succession, seeing that the liability to collate entailed estate only applies when the heir of entail was aliocuin successurus to the last heir, and so in a sense taking up his succession. If he is not heir of line or aliocuin successurus, it has long been settled that he is not bound to collate. But, as I have said, the remark was wholly beside the only question in controversy. The eldest son was not aliocuin successurus to Miss Blair. The question was, whether by collating heritage acquired by a singular title he could obtain right to a share of a special legacy left to the next of kin? On this head the illustration used by the learned Judge has no application whatever, and the result, as I have said, is at variance with the nature of the right and an unbroken current of authority.

The learned Judge is also reported to have said that the eldest son succeeded to the heritage as the heir of his father. But the phrase is quite inaccurate. Strictly he succeeded to nothing as the heir of his father. He succeeded wholly and exclusively as a disponent under Miss Blair's settlement, and he had no other right to the succession. But he was found to be the disponent under Miss Blair's settlement, because he was the person who, if his father left heritage, would have succeeded to him ab intestato—a matter entirely turning on the meaning of the words of the settlement.

I do not trust the words of this report, which are evidently abbreviated. The Court, I imagine, must have gone on the footing that they could read in Miss Blair's settlement indications of an intention that if the heritage were renounced the right of the heir as one of the next of kin should take effect. If this were not the ground of it, I can only say I think it an erroneous decision, and am not prepared to follow it, with, I need not say, profound respect for the eminent Judges by whom it was pronounced, and from whom I should greatly hesitate to differ.

LORD YOUNG.—On the first question I am of opinion, with your Lordship, that it must be answered in the negative—the party of the second part is not liable in the payment of this sum of £1000. I am of that opinion, because I think it clear that by the agreement relied on the liability is not put upon the second party. The agreement is very inaccurately expressed whatever you take to be the meaning of it. That there is inaccuracy of expression is clear; but construing it with reference to the subject-matter, and with reference to the intention of the parties, as I collect it from the instrument itself and other deeds which are narrated there, I think it plain that there was no intention to put the obligation upon the executor of Alexander Young Sinclair, and that the deed does not admit a construction which would put it upon the executor of Alexander Young Sinclair. Why the party should have thought for one moment of putting the obligation upon the executor of Alexander Young Sinclair, who never succeeded to the estate, I do not know.

With reference to another sum which is not now here in question—the sum of £700—I think it was exactly in the same position as the sum of £1000, with no other difference than that the smaller sum was expended upon the erection of a mill, while the larger sum—slightly larger—was expended upon the construction of a farm-steading upon the entailed estate. With respect to the smaller sum, the parties expressed themselves clearly in an antecedent deed that it is the heir succeeding to the estate who is to relieve the grandfather of the immediate expenditure—that is to say, the son, the party to the agreement, is to relieve him if he succeeds—that the immediate proprietor, namely, the father, shall lay out the money and pay interest while he lives, but that on his death his son succeeding him in the entailed estate shall pay off the loan which was incurred for the purpose of making the expenditure. That, I think, was plainly the meaning and intention of the parties, according to the good sense of the thing, with reference to the sum dealt with by the second deed also. From that deed, and from what may be legitimately referred to, I, without any doubt or hesitation in my own mind, think that there was no intention of putting this obligation upon the second party, namely, the executor of Alexander Young Sinclair.

With regard to the heir whose liability is the subject of the second question, the parties were agreed, and as they were agreed I do not know why the question should have been put. They are not at variance about it at all. They think the heir is not liable.

Upon the third question, whether the third part or share of the residue of Sir John Sinclair is divisible equally among his children, the parties of the third and fourth parts, without collation by the third party, I have more to say. No. 142. But before addressing myself more particularly to that question, I should like to point out that the younger children—indeed the whole children—of Alexander Young Sinclair are of the next of kin and heirs in mobilibus of Sir John. His children all predeceased him, and therefore his next of kin were necessarily his grandchildren. A husband, after his own children, can have no nearer of kin than their issue, and they are the only grandchildren of whom we have any account in this case, although George, another deceased child of Sir John, may have left children, and if so, they would be of the next of kin of the grandfather also. Now, whatever the importance of it may be, the grandchildren were of the next of kin to the grandfather as well as of their father.

Trustees v.

One other observation I make upon this head, and it is this—that Sir John Sinclair, the eldest son of Alexander Sinclair, was his father's, and is at this moment his grandfather's, heir of entail or heir of heritage. Of that there is no doubt whatever. He is the eldest son of his deceased eldest son. Therefore he is his heir of heritage, and he has taken the heritage accordingly. And he has taken it none the less that his grandfather, Sir John, was, by reason of the entail, powerless to prevent it coming to him—coming to him as the family estate—coming to the family heir; that is undoubtedly the state of the fact. Now, Sir John Sinclair left a will as well as a deed of entail—a will to govern the succession to his personalty, as the deed of entail which he was not free to make or to refuse to make—for I take for granted it was an onerous deed—governed the succession to the only heritage which so far as we know he had. By the entail the heritage descended to his heir-at-law, the heir of the body of his eldest son, who predeceased him, and by the will his personal estate is given—it is only a third part of it with which we have to deal—to the heirs in mobilibus of his son, who were also his next-of-kin. Now, that is the whole family succession, heritage and moveables. There is an entail governing the succession to the one but carrying it to the heir in heritage; there is a will governing the succession to the other but carrying it to the heirs in mobilibus. The heir of heritage so taking and keeping the family estate seeks at the same time to share the personal estate as one of the heirs in mobilibus.

Now, I have considered whether the law compels us to take this view—I confess with some prejudice against it; all the more on account of that prejudice I have considered the law on the subject as I can collect it from the authorities and from the principles which govern the law in the case. I should point out that although in the grandfather's deed the first destination of his personalty—of the one-third in question—is to his son Alexander Young, if he desired to take it, he would, no doubt, have taken it without the least necessity for collating the entailed estate—for it never was doubted, so far as I know, that where a legacy or bequest of residue is given to an heir nominatim, he is free to take it along with the entailed estate, or along with an estate however coming to him, ab intestato or otherwise. Indeed, any father, or more remote ancestor—it does not signify—may give his worldly goods, if he is free to dispose of them, to his eldest son and cut off the others, except in so far as they are protected by legitim. Legitim preserves a certain amount of their father's estate to them, but any father is nevertheless entitled, if he wills, to give all his worldly goods and gear, heritable and moveable, to his eldest son, or to cut off his eldest son from both the heritage and the moveable estate, except in so far as he would have the legal right of legitim. There is no question about that.

Trustees v.

But here, failing Alexander Sinclair—and he did fail—the construction which the law compels us to put upon the will quoad ultra is that the bequest is to Alexander's heirs in mobilibus as a class. It is to those, leaving the law to designate them, upon whom the law impresses the character of Alexander's heirs in mobilibus. That, I think, is the only way we can read this bequest. It becomes immaterial therefore that by this will the father—I mean Sir John, the grandfather with reference to the present parties, but the father of Alexander—signified a clear intention to give him one-third of the residue of his personalty in addition to the entailed estate, and that the will would have had that effect. He was entitled so to will, and clearly expressing that will it would have received effect. But it is quite immaterial, for Alexander died, and his will, as expressed with reference to the circumstances as applied to those upon whom the law of succession—I mean the general law of succession—impresses the character of Alexander's heirs in mobilibus, says that one-third of the residue shall be due. If any effect were to be given, or any importance to be thought to attach, to the circumstance that he meant Alexander, if he survived, to take it in addition to the entailed estate, it would be that the conditional institution was of Alexander's heir in heritage—the heir of his body taking the entailed estate; and in that view the heir is to take the whole, just as the father would have done if he had lived. But that was not contended, and that circumstance, in my view of the law, is of no materiality at all.

Now, I stated to your Lordships that having a very strong feeling that the policy and equity of the law led to the result that the heir of the family—that is, the eldest son taking the family estate as such—shall be excluded from the class of those upon whom the law impresses the character of heirs in mobilibus, unless he chooses to purchase his admission into that class by collating what he has taken as heir of the family with what has fallen to the heirs in mobilibus—feeling, I say, very strongly that this was according to the equity and policy of the law—even although both heritage and moveables descended from the grandfather—the father having died young—I addressed myself on that account the more anxiously to the consideration of the law, and the result of my consideration, so far as I have not indicated it already, and perhaps with some degree of repetition, I shall now state.

The late Sir John Sinclair by his will directs his testamentary trustees to pay one-third of the residue of his estate to his son Alexander, “and to his heirs, executors, and successors.” Alexander predeceased the testator, leaving three children, who are parties to this case, and their father's undoubted “heirs, executors, and successors.” The question is, Whether the eldest, Sir John Sinclair, is entitled to a share of the bequest in his grandfather's (the late Sir John's) will without collating his life interest in the lands and estate of Barrock, to which he succeeded as heir of entail on his grandfather's death?

The entail of Barrock was made by the late Sir John in 1851, in pursuance of an arrangement by which it had immediately before been disentailed, and the destination under which the present Sir John succeeded on his grandfather's death in 1873 is in these terms—“whom failing, to Alexander Young Sinclair, . . . my second son, and the heirs-male of his body”—that is the destination under which the third party here, the heir of entail in possession, succeeds. It is under a destination to the heir-male of his father's body. He thus took the estate under a conveyance to the heirs-male of his father's body, and this conveyance was made, as it happens—though I think the circumstance immaterial —by his grandfather, to whom he immediately succeeded by reason of his father's predecease. And it is not doubtful that he thus had an advantage by primogeniture over his father's younger children, none the less that it was secured to him by deed of entail. The residue of the grandfather's estate immediately in question being personalty, it is clear, and was admitted, that the conditional institution of the "heirs, executors, and successors" of Alexander, who predeceased the testator, operates in favour of Alexander's personal representatives or heirs in mobilibus, just as certainly as the destination which I have quoted from the entail of Barrock operated in favour of his heir in heritage—the heir-male of his body.

Trustees v.

Now, although a man's children are all equally near of kin to him, and so prima facie are all entitled to share in his moveable succession as his heirs in mobilibus, or to take such a bequest by anyone, even a stranger, to their father's heirs in mobilibus, yet the law of primogeniture and our system of entails is modified by the familiar rule that the eldest son, if he has taken or succeeded to heritage by reason of his primogeniture, is excluded from the class of heirs in mobilibus, unless he shall choose to purchase his inclusion by collating the heritage with the younger children. Now, this again is a qualification upon his exclusion which I have represented as a modification of the law of primogeniture. He is excluded from the class to which he otherwise belongs as a modification on the law of primogeniture. But there is a qualification upon this exclusion, which is, that he may bring in the heritage and share it with the others who are equally near of kin with him, and then he shall share the moveables with them. Your Lordship has observed that it never was supposed that he could be compelled to collate. Certainly not; if he could be compelled to collate, there would practically be an end to the law of primogeniture or the advantages of it, because wherever he took more by the law of primogeniture than the share of the whole family property, heritage and personal together, he would be always called upon to collate. There would then be an equal division in almost every case, whether he had the lion's share or not. But he cannot be compelled to collate. And it is there that the law of primogeniture still operates—at least as a great many people think—of course we do not here express any opinion upon such questions—with injustice and hardship, and if the heritage is a great deal more than the share effeiring to one of the children of the family the heir takes it all the same, and the younger children may go with little, approaching to nothing. On the other hand, if there is very little heritage then the law enables the heir by giving it up—making it "hotchpot" with the moveables—to return into the position of one of the next of kin or one of the younger members of the family.

The question we have to decide is, whether or not this rule is applicable in the circumstances of this case? And before examining the arguments hinc inde on the question, I cannot avoid remarking that the case, in my view of it, is clearly within the policy and equity of the rule.

The first proposition on which the eldest son, the third party, relies is, that he took Barrock, not as heir to his father but as heir to his grandfather, which is true in this, more or less, material sense, that he served heir to his grandfather in conformity to the rule of our feudal law which requires that the service shall be to the proprietor last infeft, and he must have done so equally although his father had survived and possessed the estate for years, if he died uninfeft—a case of frequent occurrence. But his right was as heir-male of his father's body, i.e., as his father's eldest son, or by reason of his primogeniture among his father's children, and in this capacity he was served heir to his grandfather and took the estate.

Trustees v.

But in applying the doctrine of collation, it is the substance of the thing, and not the technicality of feudal title, that is regarded, and this is illustrated in various circumstances, but quite uniformly, by all the cases. Thus, it has long been settled that the heritage need not have been inherited, but that heritage taken by immediate voluntary conveyance (favouring the primogeniture) excludes the eldest son from the class of heirs in mobilibus unless he shall choose to collate. Now, I do not regard this as unimportant, and this, I think, is what Lord Justice-Clerk Hope meant in the case of Blair—that it is not necessary to collation that there shall have been intestacy; for it was decided long before the case of Blair, and was known as familiar law, that the heritage need not have been inherited, but may have come by voluntary deed, if it came to the heir.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—If he was heir of line.

LORD YOUNG.—Yes, surely. But it need not have been intestate. Intestacy was not required.

Again, it has been decided that the same result follows the taking of heritage under an entail made by a remote ancestor or a stranger—similarly favouring the primogeniture—although in that case the estate was taken neither by the law of succession, which the entail superseded, nor the will of the immediate predecessor, who was powerless in the matter, and except for merely technical purposes only a liferenter. Lastly, it has been held immaterial that the heritage taken by the heir or eldest son of a family never belonged to his father or other ancestor—was not his heirship at all—but was taken directly and immediately from a stranger who made a deed similarly favouring the primogeniture. It was so decided in the case of Blair. Agreeing with that case as according to the principle, policy, and equity of the rule under consideration, I must regard it as an authority, and I should not feel at liberty to depart from it, even if I had doubts about it. But if it is an extension of anything that had been decided before, it is an extension in conformity with the principle, and in conformity with the reason and the policy, of the rule which I have referred to—and the rule is not by any means unique. It is founded upon a principle which has received application under a variety of circumstances. It is well illustrated in English law as well as in ours, where they speak about equity requiring something to be brought into hotchpot if anything is claimed.

It was so decided, I say, in the case of Blair. In that case a stranger, by her deed, as the Court construed it, gave her heritage to the heir in heritage of Mr Blair, and her personalty to his heirs in mobilibus, and it was held that the heir, although undoubtedly one of his father's heirs in mobilibus, and taking nothing from his father at all, could not be included in the class with respect to the stranger's personalty except on condition of collating the heritage coming to him from the same stranger. I am unable to distinguish the present case from that of Blair, in a sense favourable to the heir's argument, by reason of the circumstance that both the heritage and the personalty came in that case from a stranger, and here from a grandfather. Nor, having regard to the case of Little-Gilmour, can I make a distinction on the ground that here the heritage is taken by deed of entail executed by the grandfather in pursuance of an onerous, as I assume, disentail arrangement, while there it was taken under a voluntary deed. No. 142. The substantial fact, material to the doctrine of collation—regarded as a reasonable and equitable doctrine—is the same in both cases, viz., that heritage is given to and taken by the eldest son and heir of a certain person as such, i.e., in that character, or by reason of his being so, and certain personalty to the heirs in mobilibus of the same person. The policy, equity, and reason of the doctrine require, in my opinion, that the heir shall, with respect to the personalty, be excluded from the class of heirs in mobilibus, unless on the equitable condition of collating. I am unable to think that the decision in Blair's case would have been different on the question of collation had the testator there made an entail of her heritage in favour of the heir-male of Mr Blair's body, and by separate deed given her personalty to Mr Blair's heirs in mobilibus. It would have made the conclusion simpler on another branch of the case, but would not have affected the question of collation. But how then would that case have differed from this? The gist of the decision undoubtedly is, that it is immaterial to the question of collation that both heritage and personalty have come from a stranger—provided the first is given to the heir in heritage, and the latter to the heirs in mobilibus—and that it is also immaterial that the ancestor to whom they are heirs has left nothing to be taken by either.

Trustees v.

Upon these grounds I am unable to arrive at the same conclusion as your Lordships on this third question. And I confess I think the result to which in law I am disposed to come is in accordance also with the equity of the matter as well as the policy of our law. The father of a family of three dies in their infancy, during the lifetime of his own father, the grandfather of his infant children. Upon his death the family heritage and the personalty come to them. In such circumstances I shrink from the notion that the heir who takes the estate is to share the moveable fund with the younger children without collation. The personal estate to be divided amounts to about £12,000, and the heritable estate to about £2000 or £3000 a-year. It is easy to see what the result will be. The genius of our law on this matter is that the heir taking the heritage shall not share the £12,000 with the younger children.

LORD CRAIGHILL.—There are set forth in the special case four questions on which the opinion and judgment of the Court are asked, but in reality there are only two upon which we have to come to a judicial determination. For the counsel for the parties of the first part admitted at the debate that the party of the third part—the heir of entail now in possession, the eldest son of Alexander Young Sinclair—was not bound to make payment of the £1000 in question. That question, therefore, upon this admission, may be answered in the affirmative.

The third and fourth questions again are alternative, and the answer to the one involves also the answer to the other. There are thus practically only two questions upon which parties have joined issue, and these I shall now proceed to consider.

1. The first is, whether the party of the second part, as representing the personal representatives of the late Alexander Young Sinclair, is liable for the sum of £1000 which is in controversy. This depends on the obligation undertaken by Alexander Young Sinclair in a deed called the minute of arrangement and agreement set forth in the special case. The import of this deed, however, cannot, as I think, be truly gathered from its provisions alone. It refers to previous deeds, and the character and comprehension of these must be taken into account in

No. 142. determining the true import of the last minute of arrangement and agreement.

Trustees v.

The first of the earlier agreements was concluded in March 1856, and was between Sir John Sinclair, of Dunbeath, the heir of entail then in possession of the estate of Barrock, and John Sinclair junior, his eldest son and next heir of entail. What we there find is that Sir John had built a meal mill at How, on the entailed estate, at a cost of £700; that he and his eldest son had agreed that this sum should be borrowed; that the interest thereof during his life was to be paid by Sir John, "the said John Sinclair junior becoming bound to pay the principal sum, and interest falling due thereon, after the death of his said father;" and that upon those considerations it was agreed (art. 3) "that the said principal sum, with the interest falling due thereon, shall be paid by the said John Sinclair junior on his succeeding to the said estate." The succession to the property was thus a condition of John Sinclair junior's liability, though the opening clause of the agreement sets forth no such condition, but simply bears that John Sinclair junior had become bound to pay the principal sum, and interest to fall due, after his father's death. This is the result, and the only result, which in the circumstances could be considered either reasonable or natural, and yet we only reach it by qualifying what is said in one part of the minute by what is elsewhere disclosed.

The second of the agreements to which Sir John Sinclair and his sons were parties was concluded in December 1856, between him and Alexander Young Sinclair, his second son. This agreement sets forth in the preamble the arrangement with John Sinclair junior relative to the cost of the mill at How, and, strange to say, his obligation is there described as one "by which he became bound to pay the principal sum, with the interest thereon, after the death of his father"—the condition of succession to the estate being left to be assumed—"and that it is proper that in the event of the said Alexander Young Sinclair succeeding to the property he should in a similar manner become bound to pay the principal sum, and interest falling due, after his succession." Parties agreed (art. 3) that in the event of Alexander Young Sinclair's succession the principal sum, and interest falling due after his succession, should be paid by him. This obligation, however, was limited by the condition (art. 4) that there should be no claim under this agreement if the debt should be paid by John Sinclair, the elder brother of Alexander. Thus, again, in the case of Alexander, as it had been in the case of John, we have succession to the entailed estate recognised as the condition upon the fulfilment of which the obligation undertaken was to come into operation.

The third of the deeds is a minute of arrangement and agreement concluded in 1861 between Sir John Sinclair on the one side, and his son Alexander, who by the death of his brother had become next heir of entail, and George Sinclair, his second surviving son, on the other side, being that the effect of which is submitted for our determination. The consideration set forth requires special attention, and it is, that "parties considering that an agreement was entered into during the lifetime of John Sinclair, the eldest son and nearest and lawful heir of entail of Sir John," whereby the said Alexander Young Sinclair became bound in the event of the death of his elder brother, and of Alexander succeeding to the estate of Barrock, to content and pay the £700, being the cost of the meal mill at How, with interest to become due after the death of his father; and further, considering that Sir John had also expended on another part of the entailed estate an additional sum of £1400, for which, or any part thereof, Sir John had not taken, and did not intend to take, any steps to burden the entailed property, it is just and reasonable that Alexander, his nearest and lawful heir of entail, and George, as at present the next in succession to him, should do something—though what should be done is not expressed—therefore the two sons engaged and agreed as follows:—Primo, to corroborate and confirm the said agreement between Sir John and Alexander in the whole heads and contents thereof, and of new Alexander, in the event of him or the heirs of his body succeeding to the entailed estate, and the said George in the like event, bound themselves respectively, and their heirs and successors, to content and pay the said sum of £700 to the executors of their father, with interest from and after his death. No. 142.

Trustees v.

Now, how are these two parts of this agreement to be reconciled—that in which the previous agreement with Alexander is corroborated, and that in which the foregoing obligation is expressed? The obligation corroborated bound Alexander only in the event of his succession to the property; the latter in words binds him, not only in that event, but in the event of the succession opening to heirs of his body. Was this last really intended? I think it was not, because the clause of obligation sets forth that the obligation is entered into of new. This it could only be if it was the same obligation as the one corroborated. In this contrariety of provision, and remembering that words of apparently general obligation had in the previous agreement to be restricted by words occurring elsewhere, my opinion is that an obligation for the £700 in the agreement in question was not intended to be operative unless upon condition that either Alexander in the one case, or George in the other, should succeed to the entailed succession.

Alexander and George, in the second place, by this deed of arrangement and agreement, in consideration of other improvements than the erection of the mill at How, “respectively, as aforesaid, became bound, and they obliged themselves and their heirs and successors succeeding to the entailed estate as aforesaid, for the further sum of £1000.” This is the obligation we are asked to construe. The task is perhaps more difficult than the interpretation of the obligation as to the £700, because some of the elements which exist in the latter are absent upon this occasion, but, on the other hand, there is one at least now present which previously was absent. Here the heirs and successors of Alexander and George succeeding to the estate are to be bound according to the mere words of the obligation. But this was a thing which neither could accomplish. Neither Alexander nor George was in possession, and, if either had been, he could not have bound the heirs of entail directly; he could only have burdened the estate in the way prescribed by statute. This obligation, if it was thought about, was therefore one which must be taken to have been known to be ineffectual. Alexander and George, however, bound themselves respectively, but, as I think, only in the event of their succession. The words referable to the obligation for £1000 are as open to construction as those which have relation to the £700, and, thinking that the former as well as the latter are susceptible of interpretation, I come to the conclusion that, as Alexander did not succeed, there is not on any ground an operative obligation by which his executors are affected.

2. The next question is, whether the third part of the residue of Sir John Sinclair's estate, payable to the heirs, executors, and successors of his son Alexander under his trust-deed, is divisible equally among the children of the latter —the parties of the third and fourth parts—without collation—that is to say, collation of his life interest in the entailed estate by the party of the third part—the eldest son of Alexander—who after his father's death succeeded as heir of entail to Barrock on the death of his grandfather, Sir John Sinclair, the testator. This question must, I think, be answered affirmatively.

We are dealing here not with intestate but with testate succession, and the terms of Sir John's settlement, as exhibiting his intention, are the things, and the only things, by which our judgment must be governed.

Now, Sir John left the third of the residue of the succession carried by his settlement "partly in consideration of the burdens his son Alexander will be subjected to at his succeeding to the said entailed estate of Barrock," to Alexander, his heirs, executors, and successors. These last were thus conditional institutes, and it happened that they became the legatees through the predecease of their father. The question, who were the heirs, executors, and successors of Alexander who have succeeded, is answered, as I think, once we know that the residue, the third of which forms the legacy in question, is moveable succession. The children of Alexander, who are his next of kin, are the legatees, and in this case the eldest son of Alexander must be counted as one of the number. Had he separated himself from the rest by taking something as the heir of his father, one of two things must have happened—either he could not claim a share of the legacy, or, if he did, the heritage he took from his father must have been thrown into the fund for division; but there was no heritage, and all the children are consequently of the next of kin.

This, apart from the explanation as to the making of the bequest, would have been the result, but when we turn to what is stated by Sir John as to the motive by which in part he was influenced we find that the inheritance of the entailed estate was not and could not be a condition contemplated by the testator as one by which the succession to the legacy was to be affected. It is said, indeed, that the eldest son of Alexander was the heir of entail, who took Barrock on the death of his grandfather, and that consequently, as the legacy in question is a part of Sir John's succession, he must be separated from his brothers and sisters, who alone are to be regarded as their father's next of kin. But this view is fallacious, and the fallacy consists in the assumption that the eldest son of Alexander took Barrock as the heir of his father, and not merely as the heir-at-law of his grandfather. And what he takes as such cannot change the rights or the character he possesses as one of the children, or heirs, executors, and successors of his father. There is another consideration which seems to me to be conclusive against the idea upon which the opposite opinion is rested. The succession to the entailed estate is said to be the succession of Sir John, and the succession to the legacy in question is also the succession of Sir John, and upon the conjunction of these two circumstances the argument for collation is rested. But, if this argument is to prevail, the next of kin of Sir John, and not a certain number of the children or next of kin of his son Alexander, are the parties for whose benefit collation is to be introduced. Such a result is not contended for by any party, and the effect of it would be to dislocate entirely the testamentary provisions by which the testate succession of Sir John is to be regulated. The case of Blair (Nov. 16, 1849, 12 D. 97) is not an authority against the conclusion at which I have arrived. Whether after the settlement which in that case gave rise to the litigation had been construed, and it was found that the portion of the residue consisting of heritage belonged to the heir-at-law of Colonel Blair, and the moveable part to the next of kin of the latter, the heir even on collation was entitled to claim a share of moveables, is a question as to which the Judges were not agreed, and upon it there is, as I think, room for difference of opinion. But, taking the decision as we find it, it here has no application. The heir of Colonel Blair did assert his character of heir-at-law to his father, and having done so he could not without collating what fell to him as such claim to participate in the moveable succession. But here the eldest son of Alexander Young Sinclair is never heard of as his father's heir-at-law, much less does he ask or get any share of the bequest in dispute in that character,—and, consequently, the doctrine of collation is outside the circumstances of the present case. There is, as I think, no authority for the opposite opinion. All authority, rightly understood, is, as I think, against it. We may, or may not, think it a right thing that the distribution should be in this way, inasmuch as the heir-at-law, or the man who should have been the heir-at-law, had there been anything for him to take in that character, is the heir of entail now in possession of the family property. It would seem more desirable, perhaps, in one way, that he should not be able to participate with brothers and sisters in the moveable succession; but this consideration cannot be allowed to affect the question, which must be answered according to the recognised rules of law.

Trustees v.
Sinclair, &c.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find, in answer to the first and second questions, that neither the party of the second part, as representing the personal representatives of Alexander Young Sinclair, nor the party of the third part, as heir of the body of the said Alexander Young Sinclair who has succeeded to the entailed estate of Barrock, is liable in payment of the sum of £1000; and, in answer to the third and fourth questions, that the third part or share of the residue of the estate of Sir John Sinclair, payable to the 'heirs, executors, and successors' of the said Alexander Young Sinclair, is divisible equally among his children, the parties of the third and fourth parts, without collation by the party of the third part, and decern."

Ronaldson,
&c. v. Drummond & Reid.

THE REV. JAMES RONALDSON and others, the testamentary trustees of George Gray, coalmaster, Leavenseat, by Whitburn, who died on 18th June 1873, as authorised by the trust-settlement, appointed one of their own number, Mr William Drummond, factor and law-agent for the trust, with right to the usual remuneration.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Lee.
M.

In June 1874 Mr Drummond became a partner in the firm of Drummond & Reid, and thereafter the business of the trust was transacted by this firm.

In 1876 Messrs Drummond & Reid were acting as law-agents for Mr Simpson, coalmaster, Benhar. At that date certain money belonging to

No. 143. the trust fell to be invested, and a sum of £6000 was lent to Mr Simpson at Martinmas in that year on a bond and disposition in security over two properties in Fifeshire.

Ronaldson,
&c. v. Drummond & Reid.

In May 1877 Messrs Drummond & Reid, acting on behalf of Mr Simpson, applied to the trustees for a further loan of the sum of £3500, offering as security the reversion of his lands and estate of Kinglassie, Fifeshire. This proposal was refused by the trustees, on the ground of the insufficiency of the security offered, there being prior securities over the said estate to the extent of £25,500. Subsequently another application for the same loan was submitted in the same manner to the trustees, offering, in addition to the security of Kinglassie, the security of the dwelling-house of Viewfield Villa, and offices and grounds, at Harthill, Lanarkshire, which was occupied by Mr Simpson himself. This application was agreed to by the trustees by minute of meeting, of date 10th May 1877, which was as follows:—"Recorded that the bond and disposition in security by Mr Turnbull to the trust for £3500 was to be paid at Whitsunday, as Mr Turnbull had sold the subjects, and resolve to lend the same on bond and disposition in security by Mr Simpson over lands at Kinglassie and dwelling-house at Harthill, there being a prior charge on the former, and the loan forming the only loan on the latter."

At Whitsunday 1877 the amount of the loan was paid over by Messrs Drummond & Reid to Mr Simpson, and, in return, a bond and disposition in security, dated the 4th, and recorded the 5th, of June 1877, over the said subjects was given. This bond and disposition in security bore "that the said George Simpson granted him on the 4th June to have instantly borrowed and received from the trustees the sum of £3500 which had been paid to him on the previous 15th May, and which sum he bound himself, and his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, without the necessity of discussing them in their order, to repay to the pursuers or their assignees whomsoever, with a fifth part more of liquidate penalty in case of failure, and the interest of the said principal sum at the rate of £5 per centum* per annum from the date thereof." It further bore that, in security of the personal obligation written in the said bond and disposition in security, the said George Simpson, in addition to the said lands and estate of Kinglassie, assigned to the trustees, heritably but redeemably as thereafter mentioned, yet irredeemably in the event of a sale by virtue thereof—" (First) A lease or tack of All and Whole that lot or piece of ground, part of the lands and barony of Harthill, lying in the parish of Shotts and shire of Lanark, consisting of 2 roods and 27 poles imperial measure or thereby, bounded as therein set forth; and (second) a lease or tack of All and Whole that lot or piece of ground, part of the lands and barony of Harthill, lying in the parish of Shotts and shire of Lanark, consisting of 3 roods and 38 poles imperial measure or thereby, bounded as therein set forth; but excepting always from the subjects contained in the said leases a portion thereof extending to 3 roods and 38 poles or thereby particularly described in an assignation by the said George Simpson in favour of the said James Watt, which is dated the 21st day of February, and recorded in the said General Register of Sasines the 5th day of March, 1867."

* The defenders, in objecting to a statement by the pursuers of the amount due, stated:—" (2) Interest is charged at five per cent, while the agreement between Mr Simpson and Mr Gray's trustees when the loan was made was that, till otherwise arranged, interest should only be charged at four per cent. This agreement was never altered."

George Simpson having become insolvent in 1879, his estates were No. 143. sequestrated, and a trustee appointed thereon.

On 29th April 1879 Messrs Drummond & Reid ceased to be agents for Gray's trust, and on 5th June the trustees intimated to them that they held them liable for the sum of £3500 lent to Mr Simpson.

June 7, 1881.
Ronaldson,
&c. v. Drummond & Reid.

Messrs Drummond & Reid having refused to pay the sum, the trustees raised an action in the Court of Session concluding for payment thereof, with interest thereon at five per cent from 15th May 1878.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 5) "The pursuers, in agreeing to grant the foresaid loan of £3500, relied on the defenders seeing that the money so lent was secured over the absolute property, not only of Kinglassie, but of the said villa, offices, and grounds at Harthill. They further relied on the defenders seeing that the security given by Mr Simpson was sufficient and ample. They trusted to the defenders' professional skill and capacity to examine and ascertain that the titles of the said properties were valid and correct; and they relied upon them obtaining, in exchange for the said loan of £3500, a valid bond and disposition in security embracing the property of the said lands and estate and villa and offices and grounds. In place, however, of so fulfilling their duty to the pursuers, the pursuers have now ascertained that the said defenders violated their instructions, and (by themselves or their clerks, for whom they are responsible) acted with gross negligence and want of professional skill and capacity in the following, or one or more of the following, respects—(1) They failed to observe, or at least to inform the pursuers, that the said villa, offices, and ground at Harthill did not consist of heritable estate held in fee-simple by the said George Simpson, as was relied on by the pursuers, but were only leasehold property—the portion first above mentioned being held by Mr Simpson for ninety-nine years from 1859 under said first lease, and the portion second above described for ninety-nine years from 1864 under the lease second above mentioned—and the deed they took in exchange for the said loan of £3500, so far as it affected the said villa, offices, and grounds at all, conveyed only right to leases. (2) Although the solum of the ground on which the said villa, offices, and grounds at Harthill have been erected and laid out extends to nearly 4 imperial acres, the said bond and disposition in security only conveys to the pursuers about 2 roods and 27 poles. Nearly the half of the said villa and the whole of the offices, consisting of coach-house, stables, washing-house, and others, and large portions of the grounds, are entirely omitted from the security in favour of the pursuers. (3) They took as security from Mr Simpson what, excepting through gross negligence or want of skill, they could not but have known to be worthless or, at least, wholly inadequate for the protection and safety of the pursuers, and the trust-estate under their management."

The defenders' answer was:—"Believed to be true that the pursuers relied upon the defenders obtaining a valid security over the subjects contained in the said bond. Quoad ultra denied. The building lease in question had been recorded in the Register of Sasines in terms of the Registration of Long Leases (Scotland) Act, 1857, and formed as good a security as if the subjects had been held in feu. The defenders cannot say whether or not the nature of Mr Simpson's title was specially discussed with the pursuers, but there was no desire to conceal its nature, and indeed the same was, it is believed, known to all or most of the pursuers. In regard to the extent of the ground embraced in the title, it is the fact, as it now appears, that a small part of Mr Simpson's buildings had been erected on ground outside his boundary, of which ground he had verbally arranged for a long lease, but this fact was not known to the defenders. As soon as it was ascertained arrangements were made without difficulty for bringing within the title the whole subjects occupied by Mr Simpson, and for Mr Simpson's trustee granting to the pursuers a supplementary conveyance in security. This was at once communicated by the letter dated 18th June last to the pursuers' agent, which is referred to. The pursuers, however, in place of taking advantage of these arrangements, have raised the present action. On 16th October Mr Simpson's trustee, who has made up a title to the whole subjects, addressed the following letter to the defenders:—'Edinburgh, 16th October 1879.—Gentlemen,—As trustee on Mr Simpson's estate I beg to say that I am prepared to concur in a sale by Mr Gray's trustees of Mr Simpson's villa at Harthill, with its offices and grounds, including the ground at the back, a building lease of which has recently been obtained, and the ground acquired by Mr Simpson from Dr Clark, and also of the effects included in their process of poinding the ground, to the effect that the proceeds be applied in the first instance to the sum due to Mr Gray's trustees, and the reversion in manner agreed on between you and me.—Yours truly, AD. GILLIES SMITH.' The defenders on 17th October transmitted a copy of this letter to each of the pursuers, and to their agent, accompanied by a letter from themselves in the following terms:—'With reference to the demands made by Mr Gray's trustees, we beg to send you as one of these trustees a copy of a letter from Mr Gillies Smith, the trustee on Mr Simpson's estate, stating his willingness to concur in the sale by Mr Gray's trustees of the whole subjects at Harthill, which they say should be the subject of security for their loan, to the effect that the proceeds be applied primo loco in payment of Mr Gray's trustees. Mr Smith has made up a title to the ground at the back, and is ready to execute a supplementary conveyance in security to Mr Gray's trustees of the whole subjects referred to. The above is of course following up what has been already tendered to the trustees. If the trustees continue to reject the tender made, we will of course use that circumstance in any question with them. We may add that we are willing that the present suit be sisted, reserving all questions until the property be realised, and it be seen whether the trustees have the least practical interest in adopting the course they have done.—Yours, &c., DRUMMOND & REID.' The supplementary assignation and disposition in security referred to has been executed by Mr Simpson's trustee and Mr Simpson himself in favour of the pursuers, and is ready for delivery, and delivery thereof has been tendered, and is hereby tendered to the pursuers."

The defenders further averred that the estate of Kinglassie was really of the value of £34,500, and averred that it would have sold at that or nearly as good a price had it not been for the stagnation in trade and general depression at the time when it was put up for sale, but was not sold.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having been authorised by the pursuers to make payment of the said sum of £3500 of trust-funds to Mr Simpson only in exchange for a bond and disposition in security conveying to them (in security), first, the lands of Kinglassie, and second, the villa, grounds, and others at Harthill, and having made payment to Mr Simpson without getting such a deed, are bound to make repayment of the said sum to the pursuers with interest. (2) The defenders having as agents for the pursuers been instructed by them to procure for a loan of £3500 ordinary heritable security over the said lands, villa, and others, and having failed to do so through gross disregard of instructions and negligence or want of skill on the part of themselves or their clerks, they are bound to restore the pursuers to the position in which they would have been had there been no such disregard of instructions or neglect of duty or want of skill. (3) The defenders having, while acting as the pursuers' agents, been guilty of gross negligence and want of skill in taking for the said loan of £3500 of trust-funds security which by the exercise of ordinary care they would have known to be worthless, or at least grossly inadequate, they are liable to the pursuers in the loss, injury, and damage thence arising to the latter. (4) The pursuers not having given the defenders authority, and, separatim, not having the power, to invest on the security of leases, are in the circumstances entitled to decree as concluded for.

No. 143.

Ronaldson,
&c. v. Drummond & Reid.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The averments of the pursuers being unfounded in fact, and, in particular, the defenders having been guilty of no negligence in the premises, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. (3) Separatim, The defenders are entitled to absolvitor, in respect the pursuers have suffered no damage by or through any act or default of the defenders.

On 5th November 1879, on the suggestion of the Lord Ordinary (Young), the following joint minute for the parties was put into process:—"The parties agreed that, without prejudice to their rights and pleas hinc inde, the whole subjects at Harthill, and the furniture and other effects in Viewfield Villa and offices there, should be sold by the pursuers, the nett proceeds thereof being applied, firstly, towards the debt due to the pursuers. And the parties agree that if a loss arise the liability for the same or any part thereof shall be determined under the present action."

The subjects at Harthill realised £2110, and the furniture £1119, 7s. 5d.

After a proof, the import of which appears in the opinions of the Judges, the Lord Ordinary (Lee) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Edinburgh, 28th February 1881.—The Lord Ordinary having considered the cause, finds that on or about 10th May 1877 the defenders, as law-agents for the pursuers, as trustees under the trust-disposition and settlement No. 99 of process, were authorised and employed by the pursuers to lend the sum of £3500 belonging to said trust to Mr George Simpson, coalmaster, Benhar, on the security of his lands at Kinglassie, in the county of Fife, and dwelling-house at Harthill, in the county of Lanark, known as Viewfield Villa: Finds that in giving instructions for said loan the pursuers knew that the defenders were acting also as law-agents for Mr Simpson, were aware that there was a prior charge on the estate of Kinglassie, and were informed of the fact that the loan would form the only loan on the dwelling-house at Harthill, and that Mr Simpson had expended upwards of £10,000 on that property: Finds that the borrower, Mr Simpson, was a person known to several of the trustees, and then in good credit; that the subjects at Kinglassie consisted of an estate recently purchased by him for £34,500, yielding a nett agricultural rental of over £1000 per annum, without being over-rented, and which had been accepted as affording first-class heritable security to the amount of £25,500; and the subjects at Harthill consisted of a dwelling-house and offices, with garden, greenhouse, and vinery, erected at an expense of about £12,000, upon ground extending to between three and four acres, held partly under the registered lease, No. 14 of process, for the period of ninety-nine years from 1859, partly under the registered lease, No. 15 of process, for the period of ninety-nine years from 1864, partly upon an arrangement with the proprietor to grant another ninety-nine years' lease followed by possession, and to a small extent as a feu from the estate of Polkemmet, in terms of the disposition, No. 76 of process: Finds it not proved that the defenders represented to the pursuers that the subjects at Harthill were the property of Mr Simpson by virtue of a feudal title, or that they gave the pursuers any ground for believing that the title thereto was other than that which was actually possessed, and which has been made good to the pursuers by the supplementary disposition and assignation, No. 8 of process : Finds that the defenders having obtained the completion of a title to the dwelling-house, &c. at Harthill, in the persons of the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, in terms of said supplementary disposition and assignation, and writs therein referred to, and having offered before the action was raised to obtain such a title, cannot be held to have failed to obtain security for said loan in terms of their instructions : Finds it not proved that the said security was insufficient, or that the pursuers, as trustees foresaid, have suffered loss and damage through negligence or want of skill on the part of the defenders in making the said loan or in taking security therefor : Therefore sustains the defences, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the action, and decerns : Finds the pursuers James Ronaldson, James M'Kelvie, and David Waldie liable to the defenders in expenses of process, and remits to the Auditor to tax the account when lodged, and to report.*"

* "NOTE.—The object of the present action is to make the defenders responsible for a loan of £3500 from the trust-funds of the deceased George Gray, coalmaster, Levensseat, Whitburn. The transaction was entered into in May 1877. The defenders were at that time law-agents for the trust, and it is said that in taking authority from the trustees they failed to communicate to them the fact that one of the subjects of the security was held under a ninety-nine years' lease, and represented that the whole belonged in absolute property to the borrower. It is also said that after obtaining authority to carry through the transaction, the defenders, through gross negligence, failed to obtain a complete title, even of lease, to a part of the subjects on which the loan was to be secured, and that loss was thus occasioned.

"If it were the fact that the trustees, through any mistake or neglect for which the defenders are responsible, misunderstood the proposed transaction, it might follow that they would be entitled in law to repudiate it altogether, and to demand of the defenders repayment of the money upon an assignation to the security. For in this view the transaction as actually proposed was never authorised.

"If, on the other hand, the loan was authorised upon the security ultimately accepted, the responsibility of the defenders as law-agents would be of a different kind. It is not disputed by the defenders that every such authority is granted subject to the title of the borrower being found sufficient; and if the agent fail, through gross negligence, to obtain a satisfactory title, he must be answerable for the consequences. If the title to the subjects of the security should be only the remainder of a lease, it would appear to the Lord Ordinary to be, in the general case, a proper measure of precaution on the part of the agent, to obtain the instructions of his clients as to accepting it; but the Lord Ordinary cannot say that, an agent advising his client that such a title as a building lease of ninety-nine years, duly registered, affords a valid heritable security, and is legally sufficient if the margin of value be satisfactory, would be chargeable with gross ignorance or want of skill. Nor is the Lord Ordinary of opinion that in no case can a law-agent, without express authority, accept a ninety-nine years' lease as a satisfactory and sufficient title. Some consideration must be given to the circumstances of the case, and if these shew that there is a substantially good and marketable title to a building lease of ninety-nine years, on the strength of which valuable buildings have been erected by the lessee, an agent, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, could not be held responsible for the loan, merely because he accepted the title without special instructions from his client. The subjects may fail to realise sufficient to meet the debt, owing to other causes, and from no weakness or insufficiency in the title.

"The facts of the present case, when considered apart from the colour reflected on them by subsequent events and by the allegations of the pursuers, are simple enough. Mr Simpson's proposal of loan, as originally submitted, offered in security only a postponed bond over Kinglassie. The meeting at which the proposal was submitted was attended by all of the trustees. It was submitted by Mr Drummond as Mr Simpson's agent, and according to the Lord Ordinary's view of the evidence (which, however, is somewhat conflicting on this point) the margin of security was considered, the proposal was discussed upon its merits, and the trustees unanimously, and with the concurrence of Mr Drummond, if not by his advice, rejected it. But what followed seems to shew that the trustees must have parted on the footing that an amended proposal, by which the villa at Harthill should be included in the security, should, if made, be entertained, and that the agents were to communicate with Mr Waldie as to whether it should be agreed to. Mr Drummond's evidence is quite distinct to this effect, and it appears to the Lord Ordinary to be corroborated rather than contradicted by the terms of the letter No. 100 of process. The evidence of Messrs Waldie and M'Kelvie, when contrasted with that of Mr Ronaldson, appears to the Lord Ordinary to be insufficient to throw doubt upon the positive statement of Mr Drummond. Mr M'Kelvie's recollection of what occurred was evidently far from complete, and Mr Waldie's reply to the letter No. 100 of process, agreeing to the proposal 'as now altered,' can scarcely be explained consistently with the other evidence without believing that there must have been a good deal more before the meeting than he states. It is the fact, however, that the trustees were not informed of the nature of the title upon which the villa property at Harthill was held. Mr Drummond knew it to be leasehold, and the trustees, generally, seem to have had some knowledge of the subjects, and were acquainted with Mr Simpson. The only information, however, which they can be said to have had, or which they thought necessary, was that the subject was a villa, and not land yielding agricultural rental, and that Mr Simpson had expended £10,000 upon it. This appears to have been thought by the trustees sufficient. They considered it, as regards value, an excellent security. And the result was, that the minute bearing date 10th May 1877 was written out, and Messrs Drummond & Reid as agents proceeded to act upon the resolution as authorising the completion of the transaction. At the same time, it is undisputed that the authority, as understood by them to have been given, was subject to their being satisfied that the title was such as they could recommend as legally sufficient. They accordingly paid over the money by transferring it to Mr Simpson's account, and procured from him the deed referred to in condescendence 4, being a postponed bond and disposition in security over Kinglassie, and an assignation or disposition to the two leases, Nos. 14 and 15 of process, of ground at Harthill, the one portion being 2 roods and 27 poles, and the second portion extending to 3 roods 38 poles, but excepting 3 roods 38 poles said to be described in an assignation by George Simpson to James Watt.

"Now, two mistakes were undoubtedly committed in the preparation of this deed. In the first place, it was overlooked that the two leases referred to did not contain the whole ground occupied by the villa, offices, and garden. A considerable part of the subjects stood upon ground to which Mr Simpson's only title was a memorandum by the agents of Mr Halkett Craigie Inglis, followed by possession. In the second place, the excepted portion of ground was erroneously stated to be 3 roods and 38 poles instead of only 9 poles, which had been transferred to James Watt, and 25 poles sub-let to one Brockett. The pursuers also contend that there was a gross breach or neglect of professional duty on the part of the defenders in not informing them that Mr Simpson's only right to the ground was of the nature of a lease, and was not a feu. But, however this may be in point of law, it does not appear from the evidence that there was any mistake about it in point of fact, so far as the agents were concerned. For they knew the nature of the title, and did not consider it seat, who died in 1873 leaving a settlement by which the reclaimers were appointed trustees and executors on the trusts specified in the deed. These, after

"What followed was, that in November 1878 Mr Simpson became insolvent, and was sequestrated. No interest was paid at Martinmas 1878. Other events affecting the value and saleableness of property occurred about the same time, from which the country has not yet recovered. Kinglassie, though proved by very reliable evidence to be still of the value of upwards of £31,000 at thirty years' purchase upon a moderate rental, has been exposed for sale three times at the upset prices of £30,000, £27,000, and £25,000, and has not been sold. A title to the Harthill subjects was completed in the persons of the trustees in manner shewn by the supplementary assignation and disposition No. 8 of process, and writs therein mentioned. This title corrects the misdescription in the original deed of security, and includes the whole ground occupied in connection with the villa, the defenders having obtained from Mr Craigie Halkett's commissioner a ninety-nine years' lease, including the ground to which no formal title had previously been procured. Under the arrangement contained in the joint minute, No. 17 of process, these subjects have been sold with the concurrence of Mr Simpson's trustee, and the price of £2110 has been made available to the pursuers towards payment of the loan and interest. A sale of the furniture in the villa has also been effected for behoof of the lenders, and the nett proceeds, amounting to £1119, 7s. 5d., have been received by the pursuers to account of the loan. The defenders appear to have offered to complete the necessary arrangements for realising the subjects for the trust before this action was commenced. But the pursuers appear to have been advised to insist in their claim to repudiate the whole transaction, and they maintain the present action to the effect of recovering the balance and the expenses of the sale on that footing. The question is, whether the circumstances justify this demand.

"There seem to be three points which require to be considered—Firstly, what was the extent of the authority implied in the resolution of the trustees as expressed in the minute of 10th May? For it is not disputed that that minute correctly records the conclusion that was reached by them. Secondly, if that resolution implied authority to complete the transaction, subject only to the title being such as the law-agents could recommend as good in law, and capable of being made effectual as a security for loan, was there anything in the steps by which the trustees were led to grant such authority which entitles the trustees to repudiate their act, and renders the defenders responsible for it? Thirdly, if the trustees cannot repudiate the transaction altogether, a subordinate question arises, viz., whether any loss or damage has been suffered by the trust for which the defenders are responsible, in addition to the expense incurred by them in completing the security as it ought to have been completed at the beginning?

"On the first question the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the defenders were justified in assuming that they were authorised to complete the loan and to accept the 'dwelling-house at Harthill' as with Kinglassie a sufficient security, provided the title, whether feu or leasehold, was good in law, and available as a security for the debt. The trustees knew that it was only a villa property, and not land yielding agricultural rental, and they had shewn themselves to be apparently satisfied, as regards value, with the fact that Mr Simpson had expended £10,000 upon it. House and villa property is not always held in feu. It is not unfrequently held upon building lease, and such a lease, if duly registered under the Act of 1857, is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, recognised by the law as affording a title of property, and as capable of being dealt with as affording heritable security for debt. The statute and relative schedules leave no doubt upon this point, and it appears to the Lord Ordinary that it must depend upon the conditions of the tenure whether such a lease does not afford as good a security as a feu. The same piece of ground, with the same buildings upon it, may be less valuable as a security under feu-holding than it would be under a long lease upon favourable terms. The question therefore is, the payment of debts, were the payment of the income of the estate to the trustee's sisters, and upon their death the division of the fee or corpus of the estate

whether there was anything in the character or conditions of Mr Simpson's right which should have deterred the defenders from accepting it without special authority? Upon this point the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the two existing leases, together with the right to obtain a similar lease for the additional ground if duly completed, might be regarded as all one lease for ninety-nine years. The conditions are the same in each. The rate of ground-rent (about £5 per acre) cannot be said to be high, or to be more burdensome than was expected, and, in short, the title, had it been complete at the beginning, would have been quite unobjectionable. It would to some extent affect the value of the subjects in case of sale that the right was limited to the eighty or ninety years remaining under the leases. But even putting the difference at from twenty to twenty-five per cent, as contended for the pursuers, there seems to have been no ground in 1877 for doubting the substantial character of the right as a supplementary security for £3500. It must be remembered, that notwithstanding the depressing influences of 1878, and of the great amount of property thrown upon the market by the stoppage of the City of Glasgow Bank, the place has actually realised £2110. It may well be doubted whether a higher price could have been obtained had it been a feu. Unless the feu had been on equally favourable terms—as to which no inquiry would appear to have been thought by the pursuers necessary—there is really no reason to suppose that more could have been made of such a security. But according to the pursuers' view it would not have been incumbent on the defenders to make any report on the subject had the title been a feu. The feu-duty might have been higher than the ground-rent exigible under the rights as they stood, and the conditions otherwise more stringent and unfavourable. But the agents might in that case have gone on to complete the loan as they did without exposing themselves to any observation. But because the title was leasehold they are said to be liable to have the whole transaction thrown upon their hands, by the trustees, in consequence of their not reporting that fact for instructions. The position is, in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, a little unreasonable on the part of Messrs Waldie, M'Kelvie, and Ronaldson. They were not qualified to form an opinion upon the comparative merits of the titles in point of law, and they plainly enough, in point of fact, considered the value of the subjects as a villa, and were satisfied with that, and with leaving the matter of title to their agents.

"On the second question, the Lord Ordinary cannot hesitate to say that the allegations which suggest that the trustees were induced to agree to the minute by inaccurate representations on the part of the agents as to the title are not supported by the evidence. Even if it should be held that the non-disclosure of the leasehold character of the right was a mistake, the keenness which seems to have dictated some of the pursuers' allegations was, in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, unnecessary, and calculated to mislead. The defenders appear to have had no motive in what they did excepting the usual desire on the part of a man of business to obtain an investment for one client and a loan for another at the same time. They seem to have arranged for five per cent interest being payable to the trustees, and to have obtained what at that time must have been considered very good security for a loan of £3500 in these terms. The evidence of the trustees themselves proves that, apart from the character of the tenure, they considered the security ample, and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion, as to the tenure, that they have adopted a worse opinion of it than it deserved. It is perhaps not surprising that they should have adopted a somewhat prejudicial view of the title considering the alarming and very unfavourable report upon it which was given to them by their present agent. All of the objections, however, which are noticed in that report have turned out upon examination to be more apparent than real, unless the leasehold character of the tenure be held to be a good objection. The mistake in the extent of the excepted ground was discoverable upon reference to the assignation to which reference was made in the bond, and could not affect the right of the trustees to the subjects held by

among the appointed fiars. The trustees were left with a discretion as to the investment of the funds; but for their guidance so far the truster empowered them to invest on heritable securities. The defender Mr Drummond was one of these trustees, and he, as did the reclaimers, accepted, and has acted under the appointment. But though a trustee he was named agent of the trust—power to make this nomination having been conferred on the trustees by the truster, and Mr Drummond's right to remuneration for his services as agent being declared to be the same as if he were not a trustee. The result has been that from the commencement of the trust until April 1879 Mr Drummond and the firm of which he was a partner acted as agents for the trust.

One of the most important duties of trustees and their agents is the investment of the moneys of the trust. The first occasion on which, in the administration of Mr Gray's trust, this duty had to be performed, so far as appears in these proceedings, occurred at Martinmas 1876, when £6000 was lent to George Simpson, coalmaster, Benhar, on a bond and disposition in security over two properties in the west of Fife. This bond was not a first, but only a second security. This was known to the trustees at the time the proposal for the loan was accepted, but the other circumstances submitted to their consideration have not been stated. No reflection, however, upon Mr Drummond or his firm is made by the reclaimers in connection with this transaction.

Mr Simpson in connection with his villa. And the omission of the ground to which a formal title had not been obtained by Mr Simpson admitted of correction in the way in which the defenders, by their letter of 18th June 1879, intimated their willingness to correct it. It appears to the Lord Ordinary that the only effect to which these objections could legitimately be pressed, was that the defenders should be held personally responsible to put these matters right. With regard to Dr Clark's feu, the pursuers appear to have authorised the loan before it was added by Mr Simpson to the grounds held as a part of his villa property; and it might perhaps have been contended by the defenders that they were not bound to bring that piece of ground within the security right. But as it had become a part of the garden before this question arose, it is quite natural and proper that no question should have been raised as to extending the security over it. On this point the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that nothing in the conduct of the defenders justifies the contention that they are responsible for the loan, as having induced it either by inaccurate representations or by gross negligence and want of professional skill.

"On the third question it is scarcely necessary, after what has been said, to add anything. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the defenders were clearly responsible for their mistake in not including the whole villa ground as a part of the security, and also for the correction of the error in the description of the excepted subjects, although this last was copied from a bond taken some years before over the same subjects by a different creditor acting by different agents. But he cannot find that any damage has been sustained through these mistakes which has not been made good by the correction of them.

"Nor can he say, upon his view of the evidence, that he believes one farthing of damage was caused by the title being leasehold and not feu. He is satisfied that any difficulty which has arisen in the realisation of the securities for this loan is fully accounted for by the circumstances which have affected other securities of a higher class, and yielding a different rate of interest, as, for instance, the first bond on Kinglassie.

"The following cases were referred to by the pursuers' counsel, viz.,—Haldane v. Donaldson, 14 Sh. 610, affirmed 1 Rob. App. 226; Campbell v. Clason, 1 D. 270, 2 D. 1113, 5 D. 1081; Graham v. Hunter's Trustees, 9 Sh. 543; Stuart v. Miller, 3 D. 255; Sim v. Clark, 10 Sh. 85, 6 Wil. and Sh. 452. But the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that none of them is applicable to the present question."

In May 1877—that is to say, six months after the previous loan—a proposal on the part of Mr Simpson for another loan was made through Mr Drummond to the reclaimers. The reason why he was the intermediary is explained by the fact that not only was Mr Drummond the agent of the trust, but he was the agent also of Mr Simpson. This obviously rendered his position one of delicacy, perhaps one of difficulty, but to this no complaint is made by the defenders, as they knew that Mr Drummond was also agent for Mr Simpson.

No. 143.

Ronaldson,
&c. v. Drum-
mond & Reid.

The proposal which was submitted to the reclaimers in May 1877 was for a loan of £3500; and the minute of the trust in which the consent of the trustees to lend this sum is recorded bears that it was resolved “to lend £3500 of trust moneys about to come into the hands of the trustees on bond and disposition in security by Mr Simpson over lands at Kinglassie and dwelling-house at Harthill, there being a prior charge on the former, and the loan forming the only loan on the latter.”

The character of this investment, and the circumstances in which it was authorised, will be considered in the sequel. Meantime it is only necessary to mention that the money passed from the trust to the credit of Mr Simpson; and that what was given in exchange was a deed by which, in addition to the personal obligation, which as usual was the first thing granted, there were disposed, heritably but redeemably, under burden of two previous bonds for £25,500, the lands of Kinglassie in the county of Fife, and there were assigned the two leases of ground at Harthill in the county of Lanark, the one portion extending to 2 roods and 27 poles, and the other to 3 roods and 38 poles, but excepting 3 roods and 38 poles said to be described in an assignation by Mr Simpson to a person called James Watt. The pieces of ground so conveyed were supposed by Messrs Drummond & Reid to be the whole of the villa ground of Harthill. The bond thus given in security was afterwards registered in the Register of Sasines, and the security, such as it was, thereby rendered real. Interest on this loan was paid at Martinmas 1877 and Whitsunday 1878, but not at the rate specified in the bond and disposition and assignation in security. What was stipulated there to be paid was five per cent, but four per cent was all that was paid, it having, as is alleged by Messrs Drummond & Reid in answer to the minute of amendment, been agreed between Mr Simpson and Mr Gray's trustees when the loan was made, that until otherwise arranged interest should be paid only at four per cent. This agreement, it is added, was never altered. All this is of importance, because it shews how the investment was regarded by the trustees. Had five per cent been the rate to be exacted, the inference would have been that they must have known the security was not first class, as five per cent on a first class security could not have been obtained—four per cent having at the time been the full market rate on such investments.

At Martinmas 1878 no interest was paid, nor has any been paid since; Mr Simpson indeed became bankrupt in 1879, and thenceforward all that could be looked to either for interest or principal was the subjects conveyed by the disposition and assignation in security.

In existing circumstances it was thought better that Messrs Drummond & Reid should not continue as the agents, and accordingly in April 1879 the agency was transferred to the present agent, Mr Hill. The particulars connected with the loan in question subsequently became known to the reclaimers, and extrajudicial demands by them that they should be relieved of this loan by Messrs

Ronaldson,
&c. v. Drum-
mond & Reid.

The summons concluded that the defenders should be decerned to pay the £3500 in question, receiving on so doing an assignation to the security granted to the trustees, but as by agreement of parties Harthill Villa has been sold for £2110, and as the furniture in the house, under a poinding of the ground, has brought in £1084, 18s., the difference between these two sums and the £3500 with interest, and the expenses connected with the realisation, has come to be the pecuniary value of the controversy maintained in this litigation. This is set forth by the pursuers in their minute of amendment.

1. The grounds on which the defenders' liability is maintained are—first, that the security on which the trust-money was lent was of a different kind and class from that which was brought before the trustees by the defenders; second, that 2. the security was insufficient, and ought not to have been offered by the defenders for the acceptance of the trustees; and third, that the giving of the loan and the consequent loss are to be ascribed to want of reasonable care and skill 3. on the part of the defenders, who neither ascertained for themselves nor communicated to the trustees all that ought to have been ascertained and communicated. The defence, again, is to be found in the second of the defenders' pleas, in which it is set forth that "the averments of the pursuer being unfounded in fact, and, in particular, the defenders having been guilty of no negligence in the premises, they are entitled to absolvitor."

The issues raised by these grounds of action, and this plea in defence, are those to be tried and decided, and they are truly issues of fact to be disposed of upon the proof before the Court. For it can scarcely be said that the parties are in controversy as to the law of the case. If the security was different in kind and class from that for which the pursuers gave authority, if it was insufficient, and if there was want of reasonable care and skill on the part of the defenders in their conduct of the transaction, it could not be, and it has not been, contended that sufficient ground for the defenders' liability has not been established.

On a consideration of the facts which appear to me to be proved, my opinion is that the pursuers ought to have judgment. I acquit the defenders of all intention to deceive, and of any conscious failure to perform their duty to the pursuers. Moral impropriety, indeed, has not been charged against them by the pursuers; but good faith on their part may co-exist with admission or commission of something involving amenability for consequences such as those of which the pursuers seek to be relieved. On this point reference may be made to the case of Haldane v. Donaldson (14 S. 610, and 1 Rob. App. 226) referred to in the note of the Lord Ordinary. That there was in many things connected with this loan transaction want of care in inquiry, and in doing what was required, is too clear to be gainsaid. For example, the trust-money was put to the credit of Simpson, on the Whitsunday term-day of 1877, though the deed by which this money was to be secured was not signed until the 5th of June following. Again, only a part of the villa ground of Harthill, all of which was to be covered by the security, was embraced in the security conveyance, and one of the lots purporting to be conveyed was unwittingly taken out of this conveyance by a clause in which this quantity of ground was excepted. Nay more, Simpson the borrower had at the time a completed title to only a portion of this ground; and last of all, even one of the deeds subsequently granted to rectify previous deficiencies or errors in the title, being the disposition to the bit of ground No. 143. unexpectedly discovered to be held in feu, is inaccurate, because the subject conveyed to the reclaimers is so described as to convey minerals, while in the deed by Clark to Simpson and his trustee, which is their title to convey, the minerals are excepted. It is not, however, upon these errors and oversights that my opinion in this case is rested, these in the end having been substantially remedied. But I by no means suggest that they might not afford ground for a judgment in favour of the reclaimers. There are other oversights and mistakes not remedied, by which, as I think, such a judgment is necessitated. The first duty of an agent of trustees, when an offer by an intending borrower is under consideration, is to give them full information on all particulars, and especially to advise them whether the transaction is one into which they ought to enter, and this duty is shewn by the proof—parole and documentary—as I read it, to have been throughout neglected by the defenders. Mr Drummond, on the part of Mr Simpson, first offered a second bond over Kinglassie as the security for the £3500 wanted. In other words, he as good as recommended the proposal to the trustees; for the agent of a trust who introduces a proposal for an investment, saying nothing against it, must be taken to represent it as satisfactory. But this offer was rejected by the trustees in consequence of the doubts of Mr Waldie. And what was the next? It was the second bond over Kinglassie previously offered, and a first bond over Harthill. Was this a suitable investment? Kinglassie, no doubt, had been bought in 1875 for £34,500, and there had been, subsequent to the purchase, a valuation which represented this sum to be even less than the full value of the property. But what it would bring should a sale be forced was only conjectural. Nor was this uncertainty the only objection, for the rental of the lands was no more than was required to meet the interest of the prior bonds. And what of Harthill Villa? Mr Drummond knew, only because Mr Simpson had told him, that the buildings had cost over £10,000, and he put this fact before the trustees as if the cost price could safely be taken as the measure of its value. The contrary is known to every professional man, and the remarks on this subject of Judges by whom reported cases have been decided ought to have operated as a warning to the defenders.

The uncertainty as to value was not the only drawback. Simpson, who wanted the loan was in occupation of the premises, and thus there was no rent by which value could be gauged, or to which lenders could look as a source from which interest might be derived. Mr Drummond says the trustees were satisfied with the information which was given by the mention of the cost. They may have acted wisely or unwisely in not requiring a valuation, but their omission to do this did not relieve the defenders or the agents of the trust of the duty of furnishing all needful information and advice. These they did not supply. Had they said to the trustees, as they might have said, that the selling price, or in other words the fund which was to constitute the security, was uncertain, and at any rate could not safely be calculated on as sufficient to cover the loan, increased as the debt might be by the accumulation of interest and the expense of realisation, the trustees on advice by the defenders to this effect never would have entered into the transaction; and this omission alone would be enough to bring liability on the defenders. But there were other omissions. Mr Drummond knew that a portion, and he assumed that the whole, of the ground at Harthill was leasehold; nevertheless he left the trustees to conclude, and they were in the circumstances warranted in concluding, that the subject was a feu. That is the ordinary tenure, and if the tenure of Harthill was different the trustees were entitled to the information. They say—and there is no reason to doubt the statement—that if they had been aware that the subject of the proposed security was leasehold, they would not have agreed to lend the £3500 to Mr Simpson. The objection would not have been fanciful or sentimental. There is substance in it, because coming to a reasonable conclusion on the evidence of the witnesses who have been examined on this subject, Harthill is fully 20 per cent less valuable than it would have been if a feu. Of course, had there been a valuation, this difference would have been allowed for, and so far as the mere value is concerned this objection would in that case have been obviated, but there was no valuation, and the defenders were left without information and without advice to lay out the trust-money on a subject which was 20 per cent less valuable than it would have been had Harthill been such a subject as they took it to be, nothing to the contrary having been suggested or represented.

There still remains to be noticed another omission of the defenders, viz., to inquire and communicate, what burdens in the shape of rent or feu affected Harthill. This was not inquired into, and was not made matter of communication to the trustees. Why Mr Drummond did not communicate these particulars he explains in his evidence by saying that no questions were put to him on the subject. But this is no excuse. His business and his duty were to make the trustees aware of everything material, even without solicitation. Why he did not inquire is not explained. Perhaps the reason is that he assumed the rent charge was disclosed in the two leases handed to him by Mr Simpson, which he took to be a title covering the whole ground, but these in the end proved to be only leases of comparatively small parts of the ground, and so it came to pass that the annual return to be paid for the ground, in place of being only £11 as Mr Drummond supposed, was more than £29. From all which it appears that the subject of the security was a subject of a different kind, and was of a different value, from that on which the money of the trust, as he misunderstood, was to be invested.

The defenders resist judgment on another ground. They say that as Kinglassie remains unsold it has not been proved that the loan transaction will in the end result in a loss to the trust. As things look at present, there seems little probability that loss will be avoided. But even if better hopes could be entertained than any wise man in the circumstances would adopt, this consideration would not obviate the ground on which, as I think, the pursuers are entitled to judgment. They were led into a transaction into which they would not have entered if the duties incumbent on the defenders had been performed, and the defenders' neglect to fulfil these duties entitles the pursuers to be relieved of the transaction, the defenders obtaining by the assignation they are to receive any benefit which may in the end be derived from the second bond held over Kinglassie. On this point the case of Stuart v. Miller, Dec. 12, 1840, 3 D. 255, may be consulted. I have only to say further that in proposing that the defenders should be ordained to take over the loan on an assignation I suggest nothing which is inconsistent with the judgment in Campbell v. Campbell & Clason, Dec. 20, 1838, 1 D. 270, where the agents' failure was to discover and communicate a perpetual burden. The subject of the security was otherwise what was represented. Therefore when the inhibition was discharged the subject of the lenders' security was all that was expected. But here the subject of the security originally was, and still is, different from that on which the loan was authorised; and therefore the defenders, in my opinion, must relieve the trustees from all consequences resulting from their connection with this transaction.

 &c. v. Drum-

LORD YOUNG.—When this case was before me in the Outer-House at its earlier stage, I recommended parties to concur in having the subjects of the security sold, so that the question in dispute between them might have regard only to the loss incurred if there should be a loss. Parties took that advice, and the subject of security being sold upon that arrangement, it has been found that loss has actually resulted, and they are agreed that in that case the liability for the same, or any part thereof, shall be determined in the present action. I think the exact amount of the loss was explained to us by the pursuers' counsel at the debate as being something under £1000, taking the principal and interest together. The question before us is, whether the defenders are liable for that loss or not?

The facts upon which the question depends are within very narrow compass indeed. They are found in terms by the Lord Ordinary in a short interlocutor. I can find no ground for taking exception to the facts as found by him, except (but it is a large exception, for it is the most material of the findings) that he finds it not proved that the said security was insufficient, or that the pursuers, as trustees aforesaid, have suffered loss and damage "through negligence or want of skill on the part of the defenders in making the said loan, or in taking security therefor." With that exception, all the other findings in point of fact are unexceptionable, and I think they exhaust the case.

Now, on the law of the case, as my brother Lord Craighill has said, there is hardly any controversy between the parties, the question being how the admitted law of the land is to be applied to the facts as they exist in this case. The Lord Ordinary, applying that law, is of opinion that the defenders are not liable, and it appears from his note that he has been influenced chiefly, if not altogether, by these two considerations. In the first place, he has been influenced by the fact that the trustees had a meeting to consider the proposal for the loan in question, or the proposal which immediately preceded it—that they took it into their consideration, themselves judging of it, and in the exercise of their judgment, and not relying upon their law-agent, they agreed to it, and that with information from their law-agent of all material facts that he was bound to communicate to them, except only that one subject of the security, and, as it turned out, the most material one, was leasehold and not feu, which the Lord Ordinary, having regard to the nature of the property—a villa—thought was not such a material omission as to infer liability,—I mean the omission on the part of the agent to inform his lending clients that it was leasehold.

The second circumstance to which the Lord Ordinary seems to have attached importance, and which, therefore, may be taken to have governed his judgment, appears to be that the loss which has actually occurred was reasonably to be attributed to the recent, and since the date of the loan, fall in the value of property.

I am free to confess that I was originally not disinclined to be influenced by these considerations; but further consideration of the matter has removed that original inclination, and I am now satisfied that the Lord Ordinary has fallen into error, and that the conclusion arrived at by Lord Craighill is the right one.

No. 143. I think the trustees, who are testamentary trustees, and of whose number Mr Drummond, one of the partners of the defenders' firm, is one, did not so act as to take the liability upon themselves and relieve their man of business of that liability. Being testamentary trustees engaged in a duty so important as that of investing trust-funds, if they had so acted as to relieve their man of business of responsibility for the sufficiency of the security in such respects as are here in question, the result would have been that they personally would have been liable for the loss thence arising. I can find nothing in the case to suggest the idea that the trustees other than Mr Drummond have so acted as to relieve their man of business from his liability for the proper discharge of his proper duty, thereby taking personal liability upon themselves as in a question with their beneficiaries. I can hardly say that the position of Mr Drummond was, so far as my opinion goes, a delicate one. As himself one of a body of testamentary trustees, and as a man of business upon whose advice others who were not men of business—I mean professional men of business—necessarily relied, he had no delicate duty to advise them as to the investment of trust-money—I mean his course was obvious, especially in advising them to lend the trust-funds to another client of his own. I suppose it is quite clear that a testamentary trustee could not lend trust-money to himself. That is quite clear upon the ordinary law; and if he happens to be a man of business with clients, I think the transaction a very questionable one, upon other considerations than we have occasion to determine here, whether he could lend trust-money for which he was a guardian, as in a question with beneficiaries, to a client of his own—at all events the greatest circumspection of conduct would be required from him in such a case; and we would look at it not at all narrowly, but expecting, nevertheless, to be thoroughly satisfied as in a plain case that he, acting as a trustee and the professional adviser of the other trustees, had not lent the trust-funds to a client of his own, except under circumstances and upon a security which any independent man of business would have recommended.

Now, regarding the conduct of the defenders here—for Mr Drummond was the “defenders here,” he was their partner acting for them in this matter—I cannot think that he made proposals and gave advice to the testamentary trustees which can be upheld. It is quite true that the trustees did not consent to act blindfolded, but exercised some judgment for themselves; and it is very lucky for the defenders that they did so; for if they had not, they would have accepted Mr Drummond's first proposal, with the advice which such a proposal always implies, and have invested £3500 of trust-money upon Kinglassie alone. That was the proposal that he made to them, and the advice which he gave to them; and, I repeat, it is very lucky that the trustees exercised judgment enough to reject that proposal and advice by their man of business, for if they had not, the liability would have been for the full amount of the loan, for it would all have been lost.

Now, just consider for a moment what the proposal and the advice implied in the proposal given by a professional member of the trust acting as agent for the trust was:—Kinglassie had a rental of £1000 a-year. That was the whole rental. The estate had, no doubt, a few years before, brought £34,500. But, as I think, there is no suggestion that it was under-rented, and we, of course, frequently find that people, if they fancy a property, are willing to give thirty-four years' purchase for it. But notwithstanding all that, the rental was £1000 a-year. The property was already burdened with £25,500, and the proposal and advice given is that this property with a rental of £1000 a-year would carry £3500 more, affording a safe security for the whole amount, that is, £29,000. The advice, therefore, given to the testamentary trustees about to invest trust-money is that a landed estate is a good and safe security for twenty-nine years' purchase of the rent. I say it is lucky that that advice was not taken or acted on blindly, for then the loss would have been £3500. But then Mr Drummond consults with his client who was requiring the accommodation, and, as he himself expressed it, the client is willing to throw in a villa leasehold. Well, are Kinglassie and the villa together security for the money which these testamentary trustees were advised to lend their ward's money upon? I think, very clearly, they were not. It has proved insufficient within a very short period. It is not very much to the purpose to say that Kinglassie cost £34,000, and was valued at £35,000. Properties, when they are brought to the hammer upon pressure by a creditor wanting payment of his debt do not bring valuation prices, or at least they may not. They are not security for them; and it is because of that, that in taking a security men of business always allow a large margin. There may be security and safety at the time the purchase is made, by which large prices are got; but when a debt remains unpaid by a debtor, when the debtor is unable to pay the principal, and the creditor has to bring the estate to the hammer, it may be with considerable difficulty that the same price is got for it—it may be difficult indeed to secure the amount of the debt alone. The creditor cannot wait for a favourable opportunity although the property may be sacrificed. Now, thirty years' purchase of the rental would be only £30,000, and this estate in question was already burdened with £25,500. The trustees, or rather the trustees other than Mr Drummond, told Mr Drummond—"We don't like a second security over this property, and we won't lend money on that." As I have said, it was considered advisable to add the villa leasehold. Well, what is that value that is thrown in? It is a property which within two years realised £2110. Is it possible to think that an independent man of business advising these trustees would have told them that this Kinglassie, already burdened up to the very teeth—that is to say, up to the amount that in ordinary circumstances a man of business would lend upon it—with this villa, was a security for testamentary trust-money up to the amount of £3500? I cannot conclude that it was; and without dealing with the matter of leasehold, which is a new one, but looking only to the sufficiency, or rather the insufficiency, of the two subjects, I am unable to arrive at the conclusion which the Lord Ordinary has reached—that these testamentary trustees were rightly advised in this matter by a member of their own body who was at the same time their professional adviser.

I do not wish to indicate any view which would reflect upon that course which is generally attended with much practical convenience—that a man of business may act for both borrower and lender. I should myself say that the case of a testamentary trust of which the agent is a member ought to be an exception to that rule. But in truth I think the rule is only followed where it is quite clear that it is a thoroughly safe security which is recommended for the money. Where you come to run fine, as in the most favourable view to the defenders you are doing here—sailing very close to the wind—not leaving anything like the margin which is customarily left even upon valuation prices, it is not convenient that the same party should act for both borrower and lender. A man who has no other security to go upon than a property already burdened

Now, these are the features of this case, and I think the whole of the features of this case. I have upon reconsideration—I confess very much in deference to what I knew to be the opinion of both your Lordships—been brought very strongly to a different conclusion from the Lord Ordinary. I think, with Lord Craighill, that upon these grounds, but upon these only, liability for the loss ascertained upon the realisation of the security here attaches to the defenders, and that the pursuers are entitled to decree accordingly.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I entirely concur in the result at which both your Lordships have arrived, and indeed in the observations you have made. With what Lord Young has added, Lord Craighill's opinion has my entire approval, and I therefore think it unnecessary to add anything more.

SUBSEQUENTLY the following interlocutor was pronounced:—"21st June 1881.—Recall the said interlocutor: Find that the defenders are bound to pay, and accordingly ordain them to pay to the pursuers (first), the sum of £643, 8s. 7d., being the balance due as at 11th November 1880 on the bond p. £3500, mentioned in the record, after deducting the sums realised from the subjects at Harthill, all as brought out in the account or state No. 125 of process, with interest on the said sum of £643, 8s. 7d. at the rate of four and a-half per cent per annum from said 11th November 1880 till the date of this interlocutor, and thereafter at the rate of five per cent per annum till paid; and (second) the sum of £120, 12s. 3d., being the cumulo amount of the sums disbursed by the pursuers for advertising and other charges connected with the realising the said subjects at Harthill, as set forth in the said account or state, with interest on the said sum of £120, 12s. 3d., at the rate of five per cent per annum from said 11th November 1880, till paid," &c.

Bankruptcy—Appeal against Sheriff's deliverance refusing sequestration—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 79), secs. 19, 31, 169, 170.—An appeal to the Court of Session is competent against a deliverance of a Sheriff refusing a petition for sequestration.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.
M.

ON the 2d April 1881 John S. Marr & Sons, stationers, Glasgow, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire for the sequestration of the estates of Robert Lindsay, bookseller, Glasgow.

Lindsay opposed the application.

There was a good deal of discussion in the Sheriff Court, extending over several days, and on the 30th April the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) dismissed the petition for sequestration, and found the petitioner liable in expenses, which he modified to £5.

The petitioner appealed to the Court of Session.

When the case was called in the Single Bills, the respondent objected to the competency of the appeal.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question as to the competency of this appeal depends upon the operation of the Bankruptcy Statute of 1856, and it is necessary to attend to several sections of that statute, in order to arrive at a decision upon the point, which is one of great importance.

No. 144.

June 7, 1881.
Marr & Sons
v. Lindsay.

The matter of appeal is regulated by the 169th and 170th sections of the statute. The 169th section provides for appeals against resolutions of the creditors, and deliverances of the trustee or commissioners, to the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff, and the 170th section provides for appeals against deliverances of the Sheriff, but only after sequestration has been awarded, and consequently it does not embrace this appeal. The petitioners have therefore no direct authority in the statute, entitling them to appeal in a case of this kind. But on the other hand, there are no express words taking away the right of appeal.

The sections of the statute which bear specially upon this matter are (1) the 31st, which provides that "the deliverance awarding sequestration shall not be subject to review." The remedy provided in that case is a petition to the Lord Ordinary for recall of the sequestration. The words are that "any debtor whose estate has been sequestrated without his consent, or the successors of any deceased debtor, whose estate has been sequestrated without their consent, . . . or any creditor, whether the sequestration has been awarded by the Lord Ordinary or by the Sheriff, may, within forty days after the date of such deliverance, present a petition to the Lord Ordinary, setting forth the grounds for recall, and praying for recall." That section does not apply to the present deliverance, but to a deliverance which might have been made in this case, namely, a deliverance awarding sequestration.

The only section which deals with the case of a refusal to sequester is the 19th, in which it is provided, amongst other things, that "in any case in which the Sheriff has refused to sequester it shall be competent to present a petition for sequestration to the Court of Session, notwithstanding such judgment of refusal." It is contended by the respondent that these words imply a provision that a deliverance of the Sheriff refusing sequestration shall be final, and not subject to review. The section certainly does not expressly enact that, and the general rule is that the right of appeal from an inferior to a superior Court cannot be taken away except by express words. That is a rule which may be said to be subject to some qualification, because, if the jurisdiction exercised by the Sheriff is a jurisdiction which is specially given to him by statute, and in which this Court has not previously had jurisdiction, it may be much more easily implied that the Sheriff's jurisdiction is not only privative, but final, and not subject to review. But that consideration cannot apply in the present case, because the sole jurisdiction in matters of bankruptcy and sequestration was vested in this Court, and exclusively vested in this Court until the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 gave the Sheriff the power of awarding sequestration. The rule, therefore, that express words are required to exclude jurisdiction seems to me to apply directly to the present case, and there being none such, either in the 19th section or in any other part of the statute, I am of opinion that this appeal is competent.

But further, I think, that to hold otherwise would not only be inconvenient but might also be mischievous. It is to be observed that we are dealing with a deliverance which, besides refusing sequestration, finds the petitioners liable in expenses. It would be no redress against that to allow them to come to this

v. Lindsay.

Court and apply for sequestration, for they could not recover expenses by such a process. And a still more formidable objection would be that, if the sequestration had been improperly refused, the creditors of the bankrupt generally would be deprived of the benefit of the first deliverance, which would otherwise be the date of the sequestration, when it afterwards came to be awarded. That difficulty could not be got the better of by a fresh application for sequestration in this Court. The present case is a very good example of the mischief which might thereby be done. The first deliverance was pronounced upon the 1st April, but the Sheriff did not refuse the petition until the 30th of the same month. And so a long time would have necessarily elapsed before a new petition could have been presented here, and a first deliverance pronounced upon it. During that interval there would have been opportunity for many preferences being established which would have been excluded if an appeal were competent and had been taken.

Some difficulties have been raised as to the form of the appeal, the time and conditions of presenting it, and whether it should come through the Bill-Chamber or through this Court. To all such difficulties I make one answer: If the right of appeal be not taken away, and if the statute prescribes no particular form of appeal, then a party cannot be deprived of his right by any technicalities of that kind. They must be met by an order of Court. But no such objection can interfere with the petitioner's right of appeal, unless it has been taken away by statute.

LORD DEAS concurred.

LORD MURE.—The question here raised appears to me to be attended with some nicety, owing to the terms of the 170th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1856, which regulates the right of appeal from the Sheriff to this Court. That section is limited to deliverances "of the Sheriff after sequestration has been awarded (except where the same is declared not to be subject to review)," and it would at first sight, therefore, seem to be implied that until sequestration has been awarded, there is to be no review of the Sheriff's judgment. But I agree with what your Lordship has said upon this subject, for I am of opinion that, as a general rule, review cannot be excluded by implication. So that if the matter had rested upon that section alone I should have had no difficulty.

But the 19th and 31st sections have been referred to as confirming the view of the respondent that this interlocutor is not appealable; and the 31st section, which declares that "the deliverance awarding sequestration shall not be subject to review," when taken in connection with the 170th, is said to support the contention that the Legislature meant to exclude review where the Sheriff has declined to grant sequestration. But I rather think the implication is the other way. Because this express exclusion of review would seem to lead to the inference that the framers of the Act supposed that but for the terms of the 31st section there would have been nothing to prevent review of a deliverance awarding sequestration, and the provision of that section cannot be extended to the present case.

With reference to the 19th section, there is no doubt some remedy there provided for the case where the Sheriff has refused to sequestrate. But it is not a very complete remedy, and it is clear that there may be cases in which such a course of procedure as that of presenting a petition for sequestration to the Court of Session after refusal of a first petition by the Sheriff, might be very prejudicial to the interests of the parties concerned, because the preferences of creditors fall to be regulated by the date of the first deliverance on the petition for sequestration. Now, it is quite possible that in many cases a considerable time might elapse between the date of the first deliverance and the date of a Sheriff's judgment refusing sequestration. In the present case the whole month of April was taken up in disposing of the question, and if the only remedy had been that of a new application in the Court of Session it is plain, assuming the judgment refusing sequestration to be wrong, that the preferences of the creditors at whose instance that application proceeded might be defeated if that judgment were not appealable.

I am therefore of opinion that, as there is no express exclusion in the statute of the review by this Court of interlocutors refusing sequestration, there is no incompetency in this appeal.

LORD SHAND concurred.

THE COURT repelled the objection to the competency, and sent the case to the roll.

Poor—Pauper Lunatic—Relief—Lunacy Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 54), secs. 14 and 15.—A family consisted of a father and mother and nine children, five being sons and four daughters. One of the sons was an imbecile. The father had an annual income of £120; two of the sons contributed between them £65 per annum to the household expenses; and two of the daughters were in service. Held that, in the circumstances, the father had no claim to be relieved by the parochial board of the maintenance of his imbecile son in an asylum.

DAVID HUNTER OLIPHANT, who had been an imbecile from his birth in 1858, was sent in November 1870 to the Larbert Institution for the Training of Imbeciles, where he remained till January 1878, when he returned to his father's house in Barony Parish, Glasgow. He resided for a month there, and was then removed on 19th February 1878 to the lunatic asylum at Woodilee, in Cathcart Parish, where his father had a residential settlement. His removal there was at the instance of the inspector of the Barony Parish, to whom the father had applied. After inquiry, the inspector presented a petition, accompanied by the necessary certificates, to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, under the 14th section (not under the 15th, which deals with applications in the public interest regarding the custody of dangerous lunatics) of the Lunacy (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 54),* praying for authority to transmit

Grozier.

This was an action by the inspector of Barony against the inspector of Cathcart for relief of the expenses incurred in maintaining the pauper at Woodilee. The defence was (1) that the pauper was not a proper object of parochial relief, and (2) that, in any case, the pursuer ought to have presented his petition under section 15, and not under section 14, of the Lunacy Act, 1862, and on that ground could not recover.

It appeared from the proof that at the date of the imbecile's alleged chargeability to Cathcart his father, Robert Oliphant, was a clerk in Glasgow at a salary of £120 a-year, and was residing with his wife and family at Park Road, Glasgow, in the Barony Parish. They had three rooms and a kitchen there, at a rent of about £26 a-year. The family consisted of Mr and Mrs Oliphant and eight children besides the imbecile, six of whom resided there. The eldest, Robert, was twenty-one years of age, and had a salary of £50 per annum, which he gave to his mother for the expenses of the establishment. The two next were daughters, nineteen and seventeen respectively, who were at home, but were of an age to do something for themselves. The next was a boy of fourteen, who earned 6s. a-week as a message boy. The two youngest, eleven and eight respectively, were boys at school.

Up to June 1876 Oliphant had paid a sum for his son's maintenance at Larbert, but in that year his estates were sequestrated, and he no longer contributed. In March 1879 he went to Bowmore, Islay, with the view of bettering his position. He admitted that he was no worse off at Bowmore than he had been previously.

A good deal of evidence was led at the proof as to the actual mental state of the imbecile, but that question was not argued.

The Lord Ordinary, on 11th February 1881, assoilzied the defender. *

hended, charged with assault or other offence inferring danger to the lieges, or when any lunatic shall be found in a state threatening danger to the lieges, or in a state offensive to public decency, it shall be lawful for the Sheriff of the county in which such lunatic may have been apprehended or found, upon application by the procurator-fiscal or inspector of the poor, or other person, accompanied by a certificate from a medical person bearing that the lunatic is in a state threatening such danger, or in a state offensive, or threatening to be offensive, to public decency, forthwith to commit such lunatic to some place of safe custody, &c.

* "NOTE.—(After stating the facts)—In this state of matters the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the pursuer was not called upon to interfere in this case. It is not a little startling that the child of a man in receipt of £120 a-year should be treated as a pauper lunatic, and the expense of his maintenance in a large measure thrown upon the public. It is a heavy affliction in a family to have an imbecile child among its members. The burden of having to support him in an asylum, out of limited means, is no doubt a heavy one, but it appears to the Lord Ordinary that it is a burden which a person in Oliphant's circumstances cannot and ought not to throw upon the public.

"Had this been a case where the lunatic was dangerous to the lieges, and it had been necessary to take proceedings under the 15th section of 25 and 26 Vict. cap. 54, the pursuer would have had relief against the parish of settlement; but there is no case of that kind. The proceedings were taken under the 14th section of the Act.

"The pursuer further maintains that, even if the lunatic's father be able to provide for his maintenance, it lies with the parish of Cathcart, as the lunatic's parish of settlement, to enforce his liability—Dinwoodie v. Graham, January 27, 1870, 8 Macph. 436. But this is quite a different case from that of Dinwoodie. If in this case the lunatic's father was able to provide for his main-

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued that his interference had been justified by the insufficiency of the father's means, and that he had proceeded according to the usual practice under the 14th section of the statute, which saved the expense attending procedure under the 15th.¹

Beattie v.
Grozlar.

The defender argued that the father's circumstances did not warrant the pursuer's interference, and that, in any event, the pursuer should have proceeded under the 15th section of the statute quoted above.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is no doubt that in the administration of the Lunacy Acts the parochial boards and the poor-law inspectors have very important and somewhat delicate duties to discharge, and I should be very sorry if any judgment which we were to pronounce had the effect of interfering unnecessarily with the way in which they administer them, or of discouraging these boards or inspectors from taking up any case that may properly fall under their charge. And I am therefore very unwilling to assume that the proceedings of the inspector in this case, which were taken under the 14th section of the statute, were unauthorised. We were told that in practice inspectors present similar applications under that section, and I have no intention of expressing an opinion adverse to that practice. But I think that, primarily at least, the 14th section was intended to apply to the parents or guardians or friends of the person whom it is desired for their benefit to send to an asylum, and if an inspector proceeds under that section I think he must take care that he does so without merely stepping into the shoes of such parents or guardians with the object of saving them at the expense of the parish from the charges for which they must otherwise have become liable.

The defence to this action is that the lunatic is not a pauper, or, in other words, is not a proper object for parochial relief under the Poor-Law and Lunacy Acts, and if that is made out I cannot entertain a doubt of the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. If the parochial board has taken up a case in which the party relieved is not a proper object of parochial relief it cannot expect to recover the expenditure from the parish of settlement. It seems to be established beyond dispute that there comes into this house an income of £185 a-year. No doubt the father is said to be in difficulties, and to have incurred debts to other establishments where his son had been placed for treatment. But that does not interfere with the fact that along with his two sons he had the income of which I have been speaking, and the question which presents itself to my mind is whether a person in receipt of an income of £120 can be said to be in a position entitling him to relief at the expense of the rates,—that is, at the joint expense of all the ratepayers in the parish, rich and poor, in many instances I may say infinitely poorer than the person whose son it is proposed should be thus maintained. The ratepayers, in my opinion, ought to tenance, he was not a proper object of parochial relief, and ought not to have been so treated. The pursuer had all the facts before him at the time when he removed the lunatic to the asylum, which ought to have led him to that conclusion, and the defender is not bound to relieve him of a burden which he ought never to have incurred."

No. 145. be secured against any such burden. An annual payment of £40 a year will no doubt reduce the father's income, and will interfere to some extent with some home comforts with which he might otherwise be supplied—in fact, he will have to reduce his expenditure to that extent. But that is only one of the misfortunes which attend persons in that rank of life who may have a lunatic child. The leading rule of parochial law is that where the father is not himself a pauper he must bear his own burden. The Lunacy Acts provide that the sufferer must be sent to an asylum, and if it is clearly established that the father is unable to pay for the son's maintenance it is only in such a case that the parish can be called upon. That does not appear to be the case here, and the expense must be met by the father, even although it cause him some sacrifice.

Beattie v.
Grozier.

I quite agree with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—While I arrive at the same result, I do so on the single ground that the father is, at all events, quite able to maintain his imbecile son in his own house and family—that humanity and expediency require that, for the benefit and comfort of the imbecile, he should be allowed to remain there for the present—that, so far as regards safety to the rest of the family and to the public, there has been no reason in the past, and there is none now, to apprehend danger, and it will be time enough to consider what should be done under a change of circumstances for the worse, if such should unhappily and unexpectedly occur.

Scottish Property Investment
Company Building Society, Limited.

Superior and Vassal—Sub-vassal—Feu-duty—Liability of Sub-vassal to Over-superior.—Held that an over-superior has not a direct personal action for the whole cumulo feu-duty against a sub-vassal holding part of the feu.

Opinion, per cur., that the over-superior is entitled to enforce for his own benefit the obligations come under by the sub-vassal to his own immediate superior.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Rutherford
Clark.
B.

By feu-contract, recorded 23d February 1876, Frank Stewart Sandeman feued out for building purposes to William Stiven, accountant, and Henry Gibson, solicitor, Dundee, five acres of the lands of Clepington, being part of a larger piece of ground held by himself from William Neish of Clepington. The stipulated feu-duty was £480 per annum.

By feu-contract, recorded 26th February 1876, Stiven and Gibson sub-feued to Alexander McCulloch, architect, Dundee, a small part of the ground held by them from Sandeman, extending to 22½ poles, at an annual feu-duty of £22, 12s. 4d. The feu-contract contained this clause:—"And declaring farther, that these presents are granted always with and under the real burdens, conditions, provisions, and declarations specified in (first) the feu-contract entered into between the said William Neish of Clepington on the one part, and the said Frank Stewart Sandeman . . . on the other part; . . . and (second) the foresaid feu-contract entered into between the said Frank Stewart Sandeman on the one part, and the said William Stiven and Henry Gibson on the other part, dated as aforesaid, and recorded as aforesaid, . . . in so far as the same are applicable, and which are likewise appointed to be, in all transmissions and investitures of the said piece of ground hereby disposed, No. 146. validly referred to as contained in the said feu-contract respectively, otherwise the same shall be void and null."

On 24th March 1876 M'Culloch disposed his sub-feu to the Heritable Securities Investment Association by disposition ex facie absolute. And the Heritable Securities Investment Association, with consent of M'Culloch, subsequently disposed the sub-feu to the Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society, also by disposition ex facie absolute, which was recorded on 24th January 1877.

Sandeman v.
Scottish Property
Investment Company Building Society, Limited.

The feu-duty due to Sandeman was paid by Stiven and Gibson up to and including Martinmas 1877. But thereafter both Stiven and Gibson became bankrupt, and no further payments of feu-duty were made by them, or on their behalf. The trustees on their sequestrated estates refused to take up the property. With the exception of M'Culloch's subfeu, no part of the ground had been built upon.

The feu-duties having run in arrear for three years, Sandeman raised an ordinary petitory action, inter alios, against the Scottish Property Investment Society, concluding for payment of six half years' feu-duty, with corresponding interest. He averred that the Investment Society had been proprietors infest in M'Culloch's sub-feu, and had received the rents and profits therefrom during the three years to which the summons referred.

This the investment company substantially admitted. They stated that they had paid the subfeu-duty for the first of the years in question to Stiven and Gibson, but that they had withheld the subfeu-duties for the last two years, and they tendered the amount of the said two years subfeu-duties as the measure of their liability to the pursuer as over-superior.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The defenders having been owners infest in parts of the lands contained in the said feu-contract during the whole period for which the feu-duties claimed are payable, they are liable therefor, and decree should be pronounced in terms of the summons.

The defenders pleaded;—2. The defenders, being sub-vassals of the pursuer in a small portion of the lands feued out by him, cannot be called on to pay the feu-duties effeiring to the whole lands, as concluded for.

The Lord Ordinary, on 28th January 1881, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Assoilzie the defenders, The Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society, from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns, reserving to the pursuer all claim competent to him for sub-feu-duty: Finds the pursuer liable in expenses," &c.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The opinions in Hyslop v. Shaw, 1 Macph. at 551, and Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees v. Earl of Haddington, ante, vol. vii., at p. 627, though of great weight, were, in regard to the questions raised in this case, obiter dicta merely, and, though treating of the superior's remedies against a sub-vassal and others, where his

* "NOTE.—The question in this case is whether a superior has a direct petitory action against a sub-vassal for the whole feu-duty payable for the lot of ground of which the property of the sub-vassal forms a part.

"It is conceded by the pursuer that the opinion of the Lord President in the case of the Marquis of Tweeddale, 7 R. 620, and of the majority of the Judges in the case of Hyslop, 1 M. 535, is against him. But he says that this opinion is expressed obiter, is inconsistent with the older authorities, and is contrary to the decision of the Court in Wemyss, 14 S. 233, and Moncrieff, M. 4185. But it appears to the Lord Ordinary to be so direct and authoritative as to be binding on him. He has given judgment accordingly.

"The said defenders do not dispute their liability for the subfeu-duty in so far as in arrear. The pursuer contended that he was entitled to exact the sub-feu-duty even though it had been paid. But as this question is not raised in the record, the Lord Ordinary did not think it proper to decide it."

own vassal was in arrear with his feu-duties, did not pretend to give an exhaustive statement of those remedies, so as to exclude that here claimed. The question was an open one, whether the sub-vassal infert in part of a feu was personally liable to the over-superior for the whole cumulo feu-duty. The contention of the pursuer was that the personal liability was commensurate with the real liability, that as the superior was unquestionably entitled to attach the ground of the sub-feu or any part of it for the whole cumulo feu-duty, his right of personal action against the sub-vassal extended also to the whole cumulo feu-duty. It might be assumed that the sub-vassal lay under some liability to the over-superior, as that was admitted in the two opinions above referred to.* The question was, what was the limit of that liability? Did it (1) extend to the whole cumulo feu-duty; or (2) was it limited to the value of the subject possessed by the sub-vassal as represented by the yearly rents or profits; or (3) was it confined to the amount of the subfeu-duty? In order to give an answer to these questions it was necessary to consider the ground of the sub-vassal's admitted liability. Was it (1) intromission; or (2) contract; or (3) tenure? It was submitted, in the first place, that it was not intromission; for if it was intromission it must cease the moment the intromission ceased, which, unquestionably, was not the case. Intromission was certainly a ground of liability in some cases, and as such had been recognised,¹ but it was not the ground of a sub-vassal's liability, for the reason above stated,—that the sub-vassal could not get rid of his liability by ceasing to intromit. On the other hand, if the ground was held to be intromission, then the liability must extend to the full amount of the intromission, and the measure of liability must be the amount of the yearly rents or profits reaped by the vassal. Neither (secondly) was it contract. For the only contract was between the sub-vassal and his own superior. Yet it was maintained that the consideration to be given annually by the sub-vassal under that contract was the measure of his liability to the over-superior, as if the over-superior were the contracting party. While, at the same time, it was apparently assumed that if that consideration was illusory or not the true value of the sub-feu, then the superior would be entitled to get something more than the mid-superior had contracted for, viz., a proportional part of his cumulo feu-duty, as if it had been allocated. It was difficult to see how either of these results could arise on the theory of contract, or how they could both arise without inconsistency. But there remained, in the third place, the ground of tenure—possibly only another name for contract, but that contract the one on which alone the superior gave out his ground, viz., that the payment of feu-duty should be a condition attaching to the entire estate and every part of it, that every one who held directly or indirectly of him should take his estate subject to that burden as one of the conditions of his tenure. By his infeftment the sub-vassal at once puts himself in the feudal relation to the superior out of which this obligation arises. By his possession on a feudal title he adopts those obligations of the tenure under which he possesses. The property is truly reserved to the superior to the extent of his feu-duties. The sub-vassal possesses or intromits, knowing the condition of the tenure under which he possesses or intromits. He does so, therefore, at his own peril, and by taking the land takes on him personally all the obligations which run with the land.² The principle of tenure, therefore, gave a ground, and the only intelligible ground, for the personal liability of the sub-vassal. If this was not the ground of liability, then it was not possible to find any principle on which to account for the liability which admittedly did exist, and still less for the limitation of that liability which was proposed. No. 146.

The view contended for by the pursuer had been recognised in the early case of Moncrieff,¹ and had been adopted without limitation by all the standard authorities on conveyancing.² The case of Creditors of Eyemouth,³ which was founded on by the Lord President in the case of the Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees, was not really to the contrary effect, for there the superior had actually entered the dispoonees of his vassal for a proportional, though indefinite, part of the feu-duty, and the only question was how it was to be allocated. An argument had been founded on the inconvenience and interference with the commerce in land which would result from giving effect to the pursuer's contention. But that was an argument to which no effect could be given in a matter of right. Besides it applied with equal force to the admitted real remedy which the superior had against every part of the ground.

Argued for the defender;—The sub-vassal was undoubtedly liable to have his lands and the effects upon them carried off by real diligence or action to satisfy the over-superior's demand for his feu-duty. But what the pursuer in this case sought was to bring his whole fortune under the same liability. Such an attempt had never previously been made, and its success would be to interfere very seriously with the commerce in land. Admittedly the sub-vassal was under a certain personal liability to the over-superior, but the limitations on that liability were distinctly and correctly laid down in the authoritative opinions delivered in the cases of Hyslop and Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees, referred to by the Lord Ordinary. Whatever the ground of liability was, whether intromission or implied contract, it was well settled that the extent of that liability was the extent of the sub-vassal's obligation to his own immediate superior. So that all that the over-superior was entitled to do was to enforce for his own benefit the obligations come under by the sub-vassal to the mid-superior. The cases referred to on the other side did not support the principles attempted to be deduced from them. And of the standard writers, Duff and Menzies had been misled by the unsatisfactory and manifestly incomplete report of the case they founded on, while Stair and Erskine laid down no such broad doctrine as was assumed, but one quite consistent with the defenders' contention. Bankton did not directly deal with the point, but what he says (1, 621) with reference to the liability of heirs-portioners leads to the necessary inference that a fortiori he would have attributed a similar limitation to the liability of a sub-vassal.

At advising,—

LORD PRES. ENT.—In this case the original feu was granted by the pursuer Frank Stewart Sandeman to William Stiven and Henry Gibson, and the feu-contract was dated 9th, 12th, and 18th February 1876. The subjects conveyed were of considerable extent, and the feu-duty agreed to be paid was £480 per annum.

In the same month of February 1876 there was a sub-feu granted by William Stiven and Henry Gibson to Alexander M'Culloch of a small portion of the original subject. There was no prohibition against subinfeudation in the original feu-contract, nor indeed could there be, for by the Act of 1874 all such prohibitions are made illegal, and, therefore, under the existing law it must always be contemplated that the purpose of taking a feu of a large piece of ground may be—and where the ground lies in close proximity to a town in all probability is—to feu it out, or sell it off in smaller lots for building. Accordingly in subfeuing to M'Culloch, Stiven and Gibson were quite within their right. The feu-duty agreed to be paid was £22, 12s. 4d., which seems fairly proportional to the amount of ground given out. The feu-contract declares, however, “that these presents are granted always with and under the real burdens, conditions, provisions, and declarations specified in . . . the foresaid feu-contract entered into between the said Frank Stewart Sandeman on the one part, and the said William Stiven and Henry Gibson on the other part, dated as aforesaid, . . . in so far as the same are applicable, and which are likewise appointed to be, in all transmissions and investitures of the said piece of ground hereby disposed, validly referred to as contained in the said feu-contract, otherwise the same shall be void and null.”

M'Culloch's sub-feu came, in January 1877, to be vested in the defenders the Scottish Property Investment Building Society, on a title ex facie absolute.

Stiven and Gibson have become bankrupt, and, according to the 5th article of the condescendence, they were at the date of the summons in arrear three full years' feu-duty, and that is the sum concluded for in this action against the sub-vassal. The result of the pursuer's success would be to compel the defenders in the meantime to pay at the rate of £480 a-year, with interest, for the past three years, and the further result would be to make them liable in the same sum for every future year during which they remained proprietors.

In these circumstances the question has arisen which is stated by the Lord Ordinary in his note—“Whether a superior has a direct petitory action against a sub-vassal for the whole feu-duty payable for the lot of ground of which the property of the sub-vassal forms a part.”

Now, there are some principles of the feudal law as applicable to the rights of superior and vassal that are now incontrovertible. There is, no doubt, for instance, that, notwithstanding the granting of a feu-right, the superior remains dominus of his estate, and, therefore, being creditor in an obligation for payment out of it of a sum of money, which is a debitum fundi, he has right to attach any portion of the estate by any real diligence, and, in particular, by an action of poiding the ground. Indeed, a mere security holder has rights of the same kind. And the rights of the superior are much higher than those of a mere security holder. All that is perfectly clear in so far as real diligence is concerned. But it is quite different when you come to a question of personal liability. A sub-vassal must certainly submit to have his estate carried off by real diligence, but is he, beyond that, liable to be compelled to employ his whole means, wherever situated, in satisfying the demands of the superior.

That is a very serious question, and it is one which I have had occasion to consider more than once. In the case of Huslop (1 Macph. 535) I concurred with Lords Cowan, Benholme, Neaves, and Mackenzie, in giving an opinion (p. 551) that the right of personal action could not be carried to that length, but was limited to the enforcement, for his own benefit, of the obligations come under by the sub-vassal to his immediate superior, with reference to that portion of the original feu of which he had got possession and a title.

Again, in the case of the Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees (ante, vol. vii., p. 620), I repeated this opinion (p. 627), qualifying it with a statement that if the obligations come under by the sub-vassal were not proportional to the portion of the original subject sub-feued to him as compared with the original cumulo feu-duty, the superior would be entitled to exact from the sub-vassal that portion of the cumulo feu-duty which would correspond to the extent of the sub-feu.

I have, however, listened attentively to all that has been urged on behalf of the superior in this case, and have carefully reconsidered the question, irrespective of the opinion I had already formed and expressed, and I am bound to say that the result of my reconsideration has been not to shake, but rather to confirm, that opinion.

If the superior was entitled to go not merely against his own vassal, but also against any sub-vassal by personal action, I should expect to find some statement of that right in our institutional writers. Craig may be supposed to state the rights of the superior in their strictest and strongest aspect. Walter Ross, on the other hand, was very jealous of any extension or exaggeration of the claims of the feudalists, and was constantly stating what he conceived to be the extreme demands of the superior for the purpose of bringing the system into disfavour. Yet in neither of these writers do I find the slightest mention of such a right.

Stair and Erskine are equally silent, and Bankton, though he does not mention this particular point, does touch on an analogous subject in a way which indicates pretty clearly how he would have dealt with it had the question occurred to him. In treating of the succession of heirs-portioners, and the separation which then by operation of law takes place, Bankton gives it as his opinion that each is only personally liable for his or her own proportion of any duty that consists in money, while the ground remains liable for the whole.

It is quite true that in some modern books of practice the rule has been laid down somewhat more broadly, and I am not disposed to undervalue the opinion given either by Mr Duff or Professor Menzies. But I think that they have stated the law on this point in reliance on two authorities which are not sufficient to warrant their conclusion.

The first of these is the case of Moncrieff, 1630, M. 4185, as reported by Spottiswood. The report is in these terms:—"The King having feued the half land of the barony of Gaynes, by virtue of the Act of Annexation, to the laird of Balnagowan, he set sub-feus thereof to be holden of himself, to others. The King disposed to Mr Archibald Moncrieff a pension of £224, to be paid out of the same feu-duties of Balnagowan. Mr Archibald pursued one of Balnagowan's sub-vassals for payment of the whole pension. He alleged he could be convened for no more than the feu-duty of his subaltern infeftment. The Lords found, that as the King might seek his feu-duty out of the whole lands, or any part thereof, it being debitum fundi, so might the pensioner, against any one of the sub-vassals." Now, it is apparent that this report is not complete or satisfactory. The King might seek his feu-duty by real action out of the whole lands or any part thereof. That is indisputable. And one is led to doubt whether after all the case was not one of pointing of the ground, and not a personal action, in which case the decision would be no authority for the present pursuer. At all events, a decision of that date, so imperfectly reported, can hardly make law unless supported by the institutional writers and practice, or followed in subsequent cases.

The next case is that of Wemyss, 14 S. 233. But that, to my mind, does not decide the question we have here. I do not dispute that there are some observations by the Judges which touch the subject, but they are not so distinct as to lay down a rule that the superior has a right of personal action for his whole feu-duty against every sub-vassal who comes to be infeft in any portion of the

No. 146. feu. The point there raised was the condition on which the superior was bound to receive vassals who came to him as part-purchasers. He insisted that his charters by progress should contain obligations on each of the disponees to pay the full cumulo feu-duty, with right of relief against the rest for their share. That contention on the part of the superior was adjudged to be a reasonable one in the circumstances, and charters were adjusted accordingly. But that does not amount to a decision that proper sub-vassals are under the same obligation.

June 8, 1881.
Sandeman v.
Scottish Property Investment Company Building Society, Limited.

I, therefore, retain my opinion expressed in the cases of Hyslop and Marquis of Tweeddale's Trustees, and am for adhering to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD DEAS.—Your Lordship has correctly stated the nature of the case. I am of opinion that the superior is entitled to resort to real diligence, by which he may probably attain the same end as that which he has here in view, but that he has no personal action against the sub-vassals for the feu-duties due to him by his immediate vassal.

In the case of the Marquis of Tweeddale's Executors v. Earl of Haddington I did not enter upon the consideration of what might be the general law as to the liability of sub-vassals apart from contract, because I was of opinion that the general law did not rule that case. The ground of my judgment there was that the obligation of relief on which the pursuers founded their claim against the Earl was by the Earl's titles expressly made a burden upon him as an inherent condition of his right. I had no occasion to question the general law as stated by your Lordship, but the Marquis of Tweeddale's trustees were not suing as superiors but as vassals for relief of what they had paid on account of their co-vassal.

The following passages in my opinion (as it is correctly reported in the Session Cases) will best shew that this was its import, and I shall therefore make no apology for quoting them. After stating the terms of James Hamilton's sasine of 1837, and of Earl Thomas's sasine of 1849, I went on to say,—“It was the title thus obtained and completed by Earl Thomas in December 1849 which enabled him to execute the entail dated 22d April 1851, and recorded in the Register of Tailzies 8th March 1859, on which entail his successors, since his death on 25th June 1870, have possessed and continue to possess the lands.” After farther observing that the acceptance of this title implied an unequivocal obligation of relief as to the burden in question, I added,—“Neither can I see any doubt that the burden thus imposed on Earl Thomas was an inherent condition of the right conveyed to him, his heirs and successors, and consequently ran with the land in accordance with the authority of the case of Coutts v. The Tailors of Aberdeen, decided in the House of Lords 3d August 1840 (1 Robinson's Appeals, 296), and the case of Stewart v. The Duke of Montrose, decided in this Court 15th February 1860 (22 D. 755), and affirmed in the House of Lords 27th March 1863 (4 Macqueen, 409).”

Having thus rested my opinion in the Marquis of Tweeddale's case substantially on the footing that the obligation sought to be enforced was an inherent condition of his right, I took occasion to observe that while a properly constituted real burden for debt had the advantage of creating an absolutely indefeasible preference to the creditor named, which was not conferred by an inherent condition of the right—“on the other hand, an inherent condition of the right has the advantage of being enforceable by personal action against the proprietor or proprietors for the time being, at the instance of whomsoever has an interest to enforce it, whether named in the deed or not.”

On this footing I was of opinion in the Marquis of Tweeddale's case that personal action lay to enforce the claim of his trustees and executors, who were pursuers, against the Earl of Haddington, who was defender. But the reasoning throughout that opinion inevitably leads me to the result that in the present case the pursuer, while I see no objection to his right and title to proceed by real diligence against the land for recovery of his feu-duties, has no personal action for them against the defenders, and consequently cannot obtain decree under the conclusions of this summons.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—In the case of the Marquis of Tweeddale, I reserved my opinion on the question raised by the present case. But having now considered that question carefully, I have come, without hesitation, to the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived.

If the over-superior had been, by real diligence, seeking to adjudge the property in question for the arrears of feu-duty due to him, there could be no doubt of his right to do so. The principle and reason of this is, that by the original feu-contract, which is a necessary part of the defenders' title, he has made the feu-duty a debitum fundi on every portion of the feu. But here the point in dispute is whether the sub-vassal has come under a personal obligation for the original feu-duty. Now, one thing is clear, namely, that there is no express obligation, for the only obligation undertaken is for a feu-duty of £22, 13s. 4d. a very small amount compared with £480 a-year. If so, how, then, is this personal obligation said to arise? It can only be from the relation said to subsist between the superior and the sub-vassal. But there is no direct relation between them, and I see nothing in the indirect relation which does subsist to create such an obligation. It may be quite just that the superior should get the benefit of any personal obligation undertaken by the sub-vassal to his own superior—that the superior should have right to enforce against the sub-vassal by personal action the payment of the subfeu-duty due to the mid-superior; and to that extent the defender admits the pursuer's right. It may even be that the right goes farther, so that when the sub-vassal having paid a price down, undertakes payment of a blench feu-duty only, the superior may, nevertheless, be entitled to exact from him a portion of the cumulo feu-duty proportional to the extent of his feu. That is a more difficult question, on which it is unnecessary to express an opinion. But the superior's personal remedy against the sub-vassal appears to me to be founded on an equitable right to the benefit of the personal obligation which the sub-vassal has undertaken to his own superior, and I am not inclined to stretch it farther. The law has gone as far as reason can carry it.

Two cases were relied on by the pursuer. In the case of Wemyss (14 S. 233) subinfeudation was prohibited. Accordingly the superior was not bound to receive a disponee in part of the subject, except under a personal obligation for the whole feu-duty. He was not bound to split his feu-duty, and to seek from many what he had stipulated for from one. The disponees came to him asking an entry, and he was entitled to make conditions with them which would secure his right, and these conditions the Court approved. That case does not affect a case like the present, where sub-feuing is not prohibited, and where the parties against whom liability is sought to be enforced are not disponees asking an entry, but sub-vassals, possessing on the title from their own superior. With reference to the case of Moncrieff (M. 4185), I may add to what was said by your Lordship, that I think the question raised depended in all probability on the particular terms of the feu-contracts. It may be that these terms entitled the Crown, or the Crown donatary, to go against the sub-vassals personally, and, in any view, the reason given by the reporter for the judgment, that because there is a debitum fundi there is also a personal action, is most unsatisfactory.

Revenue—Inhabited House-Duty—Hotel—Hydropathic Establishment—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1871, 34 and 35 Vict. c. 103, sec. 31.—Held that section 31 of the above Act restricting to sixpence per pound the inhabited house-duty on houses occupied by any person who shall carry on therein “the business of a hotel-keeper or an innkeeper or coffeehouse-keeper,” although not licensed, &c., applied to a house occupied as a hydropathic establishment.

THE STRATHEARN HYDROPATHIC COMPANY, LIMITED, who carried on the usual business of a hydropathic company near Crieff, were assessed, under the Inhabited House-Duty Act, 1851 (14 and 15 Vict. c. 36), by the Commissioners of Property and Income-tax, at the usual rate of 9d. in the pound on the rental of the establishment for the year ending Whit-sunday 1881. They appealed against this assessment, and maintained that the establishment should be assessed at the rate of 6d. in the pound, the usual rate for a hotel which is not licensed for the sale of exciseable liquors under section 31 of 34 and 35 Vict. c. 103.

The Inhabited House-Duty Act, 1851 (14 and 15 Vict. cap. 36), provides, in the schedule thereto attached, that inhabited house-duty shall be payable “for every inhabited dwelling-house which, with the household and other offices, yards, and gardens therewith occupied and charged, is or shall be worth the rent of £20 or upwards by the year. Where any such dwelling-house shall be occupied by any person in trade, who shall expose to sale and sell any goods, wares, or merchandise in any shop or warehouse, being part of the same dwelling-house, and in the front and on the ground or basement story thereof, and also where any such dwelling-house shall be occupied by any person who shall be duly licensed by the laws in force to sell therein by retail beer, ale, wine, or other liquors, although the room or rooms thereof in which any such liquors shall be exposed to sale, sold, drunk, or consumed, shall not be such shop or warehouse as aforesaid, . . . there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of such annual value of any such dwelling-house the sum of sixpence. And where any such dwelling-house shall not be occupied and used for any such purpose, and in manner aforesaid, there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of such annual value thereof the sum of ninepence.”

The Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 103), sec. 31, provides—“From and after the 5th day of April 1871 every inhabited dwelling-house which, with the household and other offices, yards, and gardens therewith occupied and charged, is or shall be worth the rent of £20 or upwards by the year, which shall be occupied by any person who shall carry on in the said dwelling-house the business of a hotel-keeper or an innkeeper or coffeehouse-keeper, although not licensed to sell therein by retail beer, ale, wine, or other liquors, there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of such annual value of any such dwelling-house the sum of sixpence.”

The Commissioners having confirmed the assessment the company No. 147. appealed to the Court of Exchequer. In the case stated by the Commissioners the following statements were made:—“(3) The object of the June 14, 1881. Strathearn Hydropathic Company, Limited, v. Inland Revenue. hydropathic establishment is the treatment, under the advice of a resident physician, of patients by hydropathy, and for the boarding and lodging of them in the establishment. The company board and lodge visitors who may not desire to undergo hydropathic treatment. (4) The patients and visitors are subject to the strict rules of the establishment. They are rung up in the morning at a fixed hour. The meals are served only at certain fixed hours, and any inmate sitting down to table after grace is said, or making allusion to hydropathic treatment during meals, is fined. Family worship is held morning and evening. The front door is locked at 10.30 p.m., and the gas turned off at 11 p.m., when perfect quietness must be maintained by all. (5) By the rules and regulations of the company, which are hung up in the bedrooms of the establishment, for the information of the public, the officials of the company are empowered to refuse admission and to send away such as they judge unsuitable. No children under six years of age are admitted except under special arrangement. (6) The company board and lodge patients and visitors at a certain fixed rate per day or per week. Visitors wishing to invite a friend to the table d'hôte, or to spend the evening, require to give notice at the office. The company decline to say that they are bound to supply the travelling public with meals at odd hours, but they stated they had never refused to do so. (7) The company have no signboard, and they have never, in their official papers, nor in their advertisements to the public, designated themselves as hotel-keepers or as inn-keepers, nor their establishment as a hotel or an inn.”

Argued for the company;—The hydropathic establishment was just a temperance hotel. No doubt it was also a medical establishment, but the fact that a hotel-keeper carried on another business did not deprive him of the privilege of being a hotel-keeper.¹

Argued for the Inland Revenue;—The establishment differed in many ways from a hotel, and should be assessed as an inhabited house. The main object was the cure of disease by hydropathic treatment. The guests were not treated like the guests of a hotel, but had to submit to restrictions of their liberty which no hotel-keeper would impose.²

LORD PRESIDENT.—It is of course conceded that a person carrying on the business of a hotel-keeper in any dwelling-house is liable in respect of that dwelling-house to be charged only at the rate of sixpence in the pound for inhabited house-duty. But it seems to have been thought, prior to the year 1871, that it depended in some degree upon whether the hotel-keeper held a licence for the sale of excisable liquors; and by the statute which was passed in that year, section 31, it is provided that for the future every “inhabited dwelling-house which . . . is or shall be worth the rent of £20 or upwards by the year, which shall be occupied by any person who shall carry on in the said dwelling-house the business of a hotel-keeper, or an innkeeper, or coffee-house-keeper, although not licensed to sell therein by retail beer, ale, wine, or other liquors, there shall be charged for every twenty shillings of such annual value of any such dwelling-house the sum of sixpence.” Now, this section in itself contains from the date of this statute the whole law applicable to the particular kind of hotel here mentioned—a hotel in which there is not a licence to sell exciseable liquors, and therefore I think we may confine our attention to the construction of this particular clause. And upon that I observe, in the first place, that if the dwelling-house be occupied by any person who shall carry on in the said dwelling-house the business of a hotel-keeper, he is to be charged only at the rate of sixpence per pound. It certainly is not necessary in order to enable him to claim the lower rate that he shall carry on no other business or no other occupation in that dwelling-house. He must carry on the business of a hotel-keeper there, but I should suppose that he might carry on another business also; and in many hotels which have licences to sell exciseable liquors we know very well that the hotel-keeper carries on the business of a wine-merchant as well as that of a hotel-keeper. That is quite a common thing; and I suppose where the hotel-keeper has a conscientious objection to selling exciseable liquors he might deal in provisions, and that would not prevent him from being a hotel-keeper within the meaning of this section. Therefore the circumstance that the people who dwell in this house that we are dealing with, to a certain extent come there for medical treatment, is, I think, not by any means conclusive as to its not being a hotel, or conclusive against the keepers of this establishment carrying on in the building the business of a hotel-keeper.

In the next place, it must be observed that the essential business of a hotel-keeper is entertaining guests at bed and board, and it certainly is very difficult to say that the appellants in this case do not carry on that kind of business. Every person that comes to their house is entertained at bed or board. Some of them get, in addition to that, medical treatment, but that does not prevent them being guests who use this house just as other persons use a hotel, viz., by sleeping and eating and drinking in it, and sleeping and eating and drinking nowhere else. So that the business carried on, independent of and in addition to the medical treatment, is undoubtedly of the nature of the business of a hotel-keeper. But then it is said that the rules and regulations of this establishment are such as no hotel-keeper could be allowed to make or to carry into effect, and that a hotel-keeper is bound to open his house to all lawful travellers, unless there be any special objection to particular individuals who claim admission; that he is liable for the property of the persons in his establishment under the edict nautæ carpones; and that the guests who resort to his house are not liable to have their liberty infringed or limited in the manner that is proposed in the regulations of this establishment. Now, in the first place, with regard to the obligation of a hotel-keeper to receive all lawful travellers unless there is some special objection to individuals, I do not find in the regulations of this establishment anything at all inconsistent with that. It is said that the officials—by which, of course, are meant the persons who under the company are carrying on this business—have power to refuse admission and to send away such as they judge unsuitable—and that those “suffering from infectious diseases or intoxication cannot be received or allowed to remain in the establishment.” It does not appear to me that that, properly construed, would enable the keepers of this establishment to refuse guests capriciously or maliciously; and every hotel-keeper must have a certain power of selecting his guests, or, perhaps, to speak more precisely, of rejecting certain guests. He is bound to attend to the decency and order of his establishment. That is one of his obligations, and that would be inconsistent with admitting certain classes of guests. He is bound also to attend to the health of his guests and salubrity of his house, and that would lead to his rejecting certain guests. He is bound, also, I think, to exercise a discretion as to the class of people whom he will admit to his hotel. A man who is carrying on business as a hotel-keeper in a first-class establishment is not bound to admit to his hotel persons in every rank and condition of life. Sometimes persons in the condition of working-men become for the time very rich and very extravagant. We have heard tales of navvies drinking up all the champagne and eating all the spring chickens of a whole neighbourhood; and if any of that class of people presented themselves to a hotel-keeper of the character we are supposing, I cannot doubt that he would have a discretion to reject them, because their manners and habits are not suitable to the class of people whom he receives. So that there is a pretty wide discretion in hotel-keepers as to rejecting guests that are not suitable, which are the very words used in this regulation; and I do not think, therefore, that that regulation is intended, or can be fairly construed as meaning anything more than the exercise of such a discretion as the law allows to every hotel-keeper. It is said, further, that they do not admit their liability under the edict for the property of their guests. Now, it does not appear to me to be at all material whether they admit that or not, because I should not have much difficulty in holding that they were liable under the edict if the case arose. Then, as to all those little regulations about hours and the like, I cannot say that I think there is anything in that to shew that this differs from the business of a hotel. I can quite understand a hotel-keeper saying to his guests and to the public—"My establishment is of such a limited character that I cannot afford and have not the means of giving dinners in private apartments—you must all dine in the public room when you come to my hotel." I can quite understand that, and if he can say that, he can also surely fix the hour at which the dinners in the public apartments are to be prepared. People cannot expect to have a table-d'hôte every hour for a great number of hours. They must be satisfied with one or perhaps two dinners being allowed in the course of a day in a hotel of that kind. Then with reference to the fines, I must say that appears to me to be ridiculous. Whether they are in practice exacted we do not know, because the case does not tell us, but I am very clear of this, that if they were attempted to be exacted and were resisted this hotel-keeper would have no means of enforcing them. And therefore I do not attach any importance to that. Upon the whole matter I cannot say that this company are not carrying on the business of hotel-keepers. They are carrying on the business of a hydropathic establishment, which may be represented as having for its primary use the cure of disease, but that is not inconsistent with carrying on in the same building, and with reference to the very same people who come there to have their diseases cured, the business of a hotel-keeper. I think, therefore, the determination of the Commissioners is wrong, and that the rate should be reduced.

LORD DEAR.—I confess I have had a good deal of difficulty about this case, according as I directed my attention to one clause or another of the statute; but I have come latterly to think that it all depends on section 31, and that the other clauses of the statute have very little to do with the question. Section 31 deals with inhabited dwelling-houses, and it enacts that every one who lives in an inhabited dwelling-house, if he carries on certain kinds of business, shall on that account, and that account alone, pay sixpence in the pound in place of ninepence. and I think it is hardly contested that if a party carries on in his inhabited dwelling-house a temperance hotel he is liable only at the rate of sixpence. As your Lordship has observed, there is no restriction upon a man who has an inhabited dwelling-house in which he carries on the business of a hotel-keeper as to what kind of other business he should carry on in that dwelling-house. A hotel-keeper may also carry on the business of a horse and carriage hirer, and that would not make him liable for any higher rate than he would otherwise be liable for. If that is the right construction of the statute, what does it matter what other kind of business it is that a party carries on? And if he can carry on a temperance hotel and only be liable at the rate of sixpence, I think that comes very near the case of this hydropathic establishment. It comes more under the category of a temperance hotel than any other; and therefore, on the whole matter, I come to the same conclusion as your Lordship.

LORD MURE.—The words of section 31 are very broad. They expressly provide that any person who shall carry on in the said dwelling-house the business of a hotel-keeper, or an innkeeper, or coffee-house keeper, although not licensed to sell by retail intoxicating liquors, shall be assessed in the sum of sixpence per pound instead of ninepence. It extends to every one who carries on the business of a hotel-keeper, and I confess I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship. I do not see how it is possible to say that what is carried on in this house, according to the admitted facts of this case, is not, in part at all events, the business of a hotel-keeper. People are received and lodged there and fed, and they are charged for that a certain sum. No doubt there are certain specialties. They are said to be treated hydropathically. That is so, but the establishment is not exclusively for that—because it is admitted that people go there who are not so treated. It seems, in fact, to be a kind of temperance hotel, where, besides conforming to the rule of abstaining from alcoholic liquors, the guests are treated hydropathically by means of the water cure, and I cannot see how that puts the case in a different category from that of a hotel-keeper. I cannot see how that can be maintained under the words of section 31, and although there may be some rather absurd rules, as it seems to me, I do not think that they are so inconsistent with the carrying on of the business of a hotel-keeper as to take the case out of the exemption in the 31st section.

LORD SHAND.—Throughout the discussion in this case I thought the question rather attended with difficulty and doubt, but at the same time, having heard the reasons stated by your Lordships, I do not feel that I am in a position to differ from the judgment which your Lordship proposes. If the case had been one in which the building was exclusively devoted to the reception of persons for medical treatment, although an incident of that treatment was that they should be boarded and reside in the house, I should certainly have been of opinion that this was not in any reasonable sense within the meaning of section 31 a carrying on of the business of a hotel-keeper, or an innkeeper, or coffee-house keeper. But it appears there is a large class of persons coming as visitors who do not want medical treatment, but who merely come to a beautiful district to live for a time, as people live in hotels in the country, paying for their rooms and for their board, or for separate meals if they choose to have them. In that respect, undoubtedly, the establishment is substantially of the same kind as a hotel. The difficulty I have felt in the case has arisen from the two circumstances that I do think the rules leave some power in the hands of those who are managing their business to exclude guests as in their opinion unsuitable, and in addition to that when guests are received they are put under some very remarkable restrictions, which are not, I think, to be found in any hotel in this country. At the same time, I am not disposed to give undue weight to these circumstances. The broad features of the case are, as your Lordship has put it, that people are there living temporarily in a house which is practically open to the public, and they are living there as at a hotel at bed and board, paying hotel charges or what may be represented as hotel charges; and therefore, looking to the whole matter, I do not differ from the judgment which your Lordship proposes.

Expenses—Proof—Copies of evidence for debate before Lord Ordinary.—Exceptional circumstances, under which the charge for one copy of the evidence for use of counsel at an adjourned hearing on evidence in the Outer-House was allowed against the losing party.

The defence was adoption.

Proof was led on 13th and 14th December 1880 before Lord Craighill. The evidence was directed to the proof of what occurred at certain meetings between the parties during the currency of the bill, and to collateral matters bearing on the credibility of the witnesses, upon which the decision of the case mainly turned, as the evidence in chief was contradictory. The proof was, in consequence, led at considerable length, the shorthand writer's notes occupying 150 manuscript pages.

At the close of the proof the Lord Ordinary indicated his opinion that counsel should have an opportunity of considering the proof led before being heard on the evidence, and he accordingly pronounced an order appointing parties to be heard on the proof adduced and whole cause, and intimated that, as he could not give a day for the hearing before the Christmas recess, he would cause the case to be put out on the earliest possible day after the Court met in January.

Owing to the illness of Lord Gifford, Lord Craighill was called on to sit in the Second Division continuously until the retirement of Lord Gifford, when he took his seat there permanently. The present case was then transferred from his Outer-House roll to that of Lord Rutherford Clark, who appointed parties to be heard on the proof on 16th February.

Lord Rutherford Clark decided against the respondent, with expenses, and the First Division refused a reclaiming note against his interlocutor, with additional expenses.

In taxing the complainer's account of expenses, the Auditor struck off Powrie v.

Louie.

The complainer objected to the Auditor's report in respect of the disallowance of these charges.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the general rule laid down in the case of Birrell v. Beveridge, Feb. 15, 1868, 6 Macph. 421, is a very salutary rule, and must be adhered to. While it was distinctly laid down there, both by my brother Lord Deas and myself, that in the general case the discussion upon the evidence led at a proof ought to take place at once and without postponement, we both intimated that there might and would be exceptional cases in which delay might be for the interest of parties, and conducive to the ends of justice, and where counsel would, therefore, require written or printed copies of the evidence.

As regards the present case, I am not quite sure that its circumstances would have warranted its being considered an exceptional case if counsel had spoken upon the proof within a day or two subsequently to its being led. It does not appear to me that any study of the evidence here would have been likely to lead to a better or more useful discussion. It would have been much more satisfactory if the Lord Ordinary had at once heard the parties. But his Lordship seems to have at once made up his mind that the hearing must stand over till after the Christmas recess. That creates a specialty in this case which, I rather think, ought not to have occurred, but which makes it in some degree a matter of necessity that counsel should be furnished with a copy of the evidence. Counsel cannot be expected to carry in their minds all the details of the evidence in a case like the present for any length of time. In addition, we have also this fact occurring, through no fault of the party, that the Lord Ordinary who decided this case was not the same Lord Ordinary who heard the evidence. It was therefore necessary for counsel to go into the evidence with much more detail and elaboration than would otherwise have been required.

It accordingly appears to me that the lapse of time which took place between the leading of the evidence and the discussion upon it, and the fact that the Judge before whom the discussion took place was not the same Judge who took the proof, make this just such an exceptional case as was contemplated in the opinions which were delivered in Birrell's case. At the same time I do not think that more than one copy of the evidence was required—one counsel only is allowed to be heard, and it should be arranged beforehand which counsel is to take the debate, and he only need be supplied with the copy of evidence. I think, therefore, that the charge for one copy should be allowed.

LORD DEAS.—I see no reason for not adhering to the general rule laid down in the case to which your Lordship has referred. I should not be disposed to think that the mere fact that the case turns mainly upon the credibility of the witnesses makes it an exception to the general rule. There is the greater reason for a case of that kind being heard at once. But the matters referred to by your Lordship as causing the delay in the hearing do appear to introduce a specialty, and I therefore concur.

Bankruptcy—Bills—Lien—Pledge—Bills accepted against goods; bankruptcy of both drawer and acceptor while bills in hands of onerous holder; how goods to be dealt with—English rule of ex parte Waring inapplicable.—When A accepts the drafts of B against B's goods in A's hands, if both A and B fail while the goods are still in A's hands, and the bills are in the circle, (1) the billholder is entitled to claim against the estate of each for the amount of the bill, to the effect of recovering on the whole full payment; (2) A's estate has a lien over the goods to the effect of entire relief and indemnification against any payments which A's estate may be required to make in respect of the bills; and (3) B's estate is entitled to demand the goods after such indemnification has been given out of the proceeds, or on full security being given to relieve A and his estate of the bills.

The English rule of ex parte Waring, 19 Ves. 345, is inconsistent with the rules and principles of the Scotch bankruptcy system, and has not been adopted in Scotland.
